Mr. Burns argues that those are defensive steps that are not intended to provoke Iran, though there has been a vigorous behind-the-scenes debate in the administration over whether the more aggressive policy could provoke Iran to strike back. The State Department has tended to counsel caution, while some more hawkish aides in the Pentagon and the White House say the increase in American forces in Iraq could be neutered unless the American military forcefully pushes back against the Iranian aid to the militias.

To many in Washington, especially Mr. Bush's Democratic critics, the new approach to Iran has all the hallmarks of an administration once again spoiling for a fight.

Some see an attempt to create a diversion, focusing the country's attention away from a war gone bad in Iraq, and toward a country that has exploited America's troubles to expand its influence. Others suspect an effort to shift the blame for the spiraling chaos in Iraq, as a steady flow of officials, from the C.I.A. director to the new secretary of defense, cite intelligence that Iranians are smuggling into Iraq sophisticated explosive devices and detailed plans to wipe out Sunni neighborhoods. So far, they have disclosed no evidence. Next week, American military officials are expected to make their most comprehensive case — based on materials seized in recent raids — that Iran's elite Quds force is behind many of the most lethal attacks.

But as they present their evidence, some Bush administration officials concede they are confronting the bitter legacy of their prewar distortions of the intelligence in Iraq. When speaking under the condition of anonymity, they say the administration's credibility has been deeply damaged, which would cast doubt on any attempt by Mr. Bush, for example, to back up his claim that Iran's uranium enrichment program is intended for bomb production.

"It's never stated explicitly, but clearly we can't make the case about Iran's intentions," said a senior strategist for the Bush administration who joined it long after evidence surfaced that Iraq had none of the illicit weapons that the administration cited as a reason to go to war.

It has not helped that even as the administration is making its case against Iran, the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, was opening just a few blocks away.

The early testimony in that trial has laid bare again how Mr. Cheney, among others, carefully selected intelligence for use in a political campaign to make the case against Iraq. Now, several years later, the administration is paying the price in dealing with a country whose ability to project power and to build a sophisticated nuclear program is far greater than Saddam Hussein's was in 2003.

The administration does not have definitive evidence that Iran is moving toward producing a nuclear bomb, but next week it will unveil what officials say is evidence of Iran's meddling in Iraq.

In interviews over the past several weeks, officials from the Pentagon to the State Department to the White House insist that Mr. Bush's goal in Iran is not to depose a government, Iraq-style, but rather to throw a series of brushback pitches.

Officials familiar with the intelligence prepared for Mr. Bush say American assessments conclude that Iran sees itself at the head of an alliance to drive the United States out of Iraq, and ultimately out of the Middle East. Other briefings have included assessments that Russia and China will never join meaningful economic sanctions against a country that they do business with, so if Mr. Bush wants to apply military and economic pressure, he must do so outside the United Nations.

One result was a strategy that Mr. Bush approved in the fall to push back on all fronts and to force Iran to recalculate what administration officials call its cost-benefit analysis for challenging the United States. The effort to stop European and Japanese banks from lending money to Iran's oil sector is part of the equation. So is pushing down the price of oil, though administration officials grow silent when asked whether Mr. Cheney or others have discussed with Saudi Arabia the benefits of pumping enough oil to push the price down and deprive Iran of revenues.

But it is the military component of the strategy that carries the biggest risks. Two aircraft carriers and their accompanying battle groups were sent into the Persian Gulf, a senior military official said, "to remind the Iranians that we can focus on them, too." American military forces in Iraq were authorized to move against Iranian operatives, though it is unclear what kind of evidence is needed, if any, that they are conspiring against American forces before military action is authorized.

American officials describe those measures as purely defensive. "We are definitely looking to protect our interests in the gulf, in Iraq itself, and to protect the lives of our soldiers," said Mr. Burns, who insisted that there was no effort to stop Iran from ordinary exchanges with Iraq.

Yet administration officials clearly worry that the Iranians may not back down, and that a confrontation could build up — especially if a midlevel American commander or a member of Iran's military or paramilitary forces in Iraq miscalculated. Both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates have warned against that risk, officials say.

Administration officials say that while all of Mr. Bush's advisers have signed on to the strategy of more forceful confrontation with Tehran, there is considerable debate about how far to push it. Some Iran experts at the State Department have warned that encounters between Americans and Iranians inside Iraq could strengthen the hand of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad by allowing him to change the subject from his failure to produce jobs and the rising cost of nuclear defiance.

Over the longer run, there is a continuing debate about whether military action may some day be necessary to set back Iran's nuclear activities. For now American officials say they do not believe they have a good set of targets or the ability to contain Iran's reaction. "It's not a question of ideology," one senior military official said, refusing to talk on the record about military planning. "We simply don't have the forces to deal with the reaction. They're busy."

At the Pentagon, military officials say there are still arguments over the rules for confronting Iranian operatives. Are they legitimate targets simply because they are identified as part of Iran's military? Or do American forces need evidence that they are importing weapons or sowing chaos? Publicly, officials say the answers to those questions are classified. Privately, a senior official said, "It's all still a matter of debate."

In coming weeks, administration officials say, more escalation is likely. The Iranians have told the International Atomic Energy Agency that they will announce in February that they are beginning industrial-scale efforts to produce uranium. It will probably be years before they can produce enough fuel for a bomb.

But the debate over whether the United States should stick to diplomacy or take more forceful action is bound to begin right away, and will sound familiar. Democrats, even while accusing the administration of failing to engage with Iran, are positioning themselves to sound tough.

"To ensure that Iran never gets nuclear weapons, we need to keep all options on the table," former Senator John Edwards recently told an Israeli security conference. "Let me reiterate — all options."

For Mr. Bush, this is not only about options but about legacy. Already bloodied in Iraq, he will come under increasing pressure to show that he has not left the United States weakened in the Middle East. He does not want to be remembered for leaving Iran more powerful than he found it when he came to office.

Iran Condemns U.S. Raids Against Its Operatives (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

TEHRAN, Iran - A top Iranian lawmaker denounced the United States on Saturday for allowing its troops to kill or capture Iranians in Iraq whom U.S. forces believe pose a threat.

"This is support for terrorism. It is against all recognized international treaties to order the death of nationals of another country in a foreign land," Alaeddin Boroujerdi, the head of Parliament's Foreign Policy and National Security Committee, said on state television.

On Friday, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said U.S. forces "are authorized to go after those who are trying to kill them."

The more aggressive policy — evolving over a period of months — was described as the result of mounting evidence that Iran is supporting terrorists inside Iraq and is a major supplier of bombs and other weapons used to target U.S. forces.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told journalists Saturday that "bullying and threatening" were part of the U.S. strategy in Iraq and said Iran was a "part of resolving Iraq's problems, not a part of the problem itself."

At least eight Iranians have been detained in Iraq recently, including two diplomats in a Dec. 21 roundup. They were interrogated and released to Iranian officials eight days later.

The six others were captured Jan. 11 at an Iranian liaison office in the northern city of Irbil. One was released and five are still believed in U.S. custody.

The U.S. ambassador to Iraq said last week that one of the detained Iranians was the director of operations for Iran's Revolutionary Guard Quds faction, the organization responsible for funding and arming Iraqi militants.

Whose Iran? (NYT)

By Laura Secor

The New York Times Magazine, January 28, 2007

The Mahestan mall in South Tehran is sometimes called "the honeycomb" of the Basij, the Iranian youth militia, because it is here that Basijis, as the militia members are known, buy and sell banners for the Shiite festival of Ashura, as well as religious books and posters. Somber, bearded young men in collarless shirts linger over tea behind stands selling tapes of religious singers — cult celebrities who belt out tear-jerking laments for the martyrdom of Hussein and make a small fortune performing at memorial services. Omid Malekian, a 28-year-old employee of a Tehran petrochemical refinery and the son of a carpenter, was shopping at Mahestan on Dec. 16, the day after Iran's elections for city councils and for the Assembly of Experts, the 86-member clerical board that will select the next supreme leader should anything happen to the current leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. In the 2005 presidential election, Malekian voted for the winner, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and when I asked if he was happy with the president, he answered frankly.

"Sometimes I am analyzing myself and thinking, Oh, we have done wrong," he mused. "He is very popular and friendly with the people, but sometimes when he is expressing his ideas, he doesn't think about the future or the consequences. He is a simple man."

In particular, Malekian suggested that Ahmadinejad had been incautious in his promises to improve the economy — promises he has yet to keep. There was another area, too, in which Ahmadinejad had faltered: "About the Holocaust," he said. "I don't know much about it, but from the reaction of the world, it seems he should have said something different."

Still, Malekian said that he voted for the most severe fundamentalist among the candidates running for the clerical Assembly of Experts. The campaign turned on the competition between two incumbents, Ayatollah Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi — widely reputed to be Ahmadinejad's spiritual leader — and Ayatollah Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, the pragmatic former president who lost the presidential race to Ahmadinejad in 2005. Each hoped to increase his share of the vote and thus his power on the assembly.

South Tehran is Ahmadinejad's heartland. It is here, in the less affluent neighborhoods of the city of 14 million where he was once mayor, that he rose from the obscure end of the seven-candidate roster in 2005, only to become one of the most popular figures in the Muslim world. Because liberal-minded Iranians boycotted the 2005 presidential election, and because Ahmadinejad so adeptly played the populist card, the militants, the unemployed and the cultural conservatives of neighborhoods like this one were in the driver's seat, steering the politics of this crucial nation while their opponents warned of their presumed doctrinaire views and political naïveté.

Early on, Ahmadinejad's faction was expected to win last month's elections handily. But the results contradicted the conventional wisdom about the Iranian electorate. The president put forward his own slate of candidates for the city councils. It was trounced. By some reckonings, reformists won two-fifths of the council seats and even dominated in some cities, including Kerman and Arak. Some conservative city-council candidates did well, particularly in Tehran, but they were not the conservatives associated with Ahmadinejad: rather, they belonged to the rival conservative faction of the current Tehran mayor, Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf. And most significant, the vote for Rafsanjani for the Assembly of Experts dwarfed that of Mesbah-Yazdi by nearly two to one. By mid-January, Ahmadinejad's isolation even within his own faction was complete: 150 of 290 members of parliament, including many of Ahmadinejad's onetime allies, signed a letter criticizing the president's economic policies for failing to stanch unemployment and inflation. A smaller group also blamed Ahmadinejad's inflammatory foreign-policy rhetoric for the United Nations Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran. As if that were not enough, an editorial in Jomhouri Eslami, a newspaper that reflects the views of the supreme leader, accused the president of using the nuclear issue to distract the public from his failed policies. Ahmadinejad's behavior was diminishing popular support for the nuclear program, the editorial warned. The Iranian political system seems to be restoring its equilibrium by showing an extremist president the limits of his power. But is it an equilibrium that can hold?

In part, last month's election results reflected the complexity of Ahmadinejad's skeptical, conditional and diverse constituency. They also demonstrated his isolation within the powerful conservative establishment, whose politics, however opaque, are determinative. At its center, Khamenei commands a faction known as the traditional conservatives. No elected leader can serve, let alone execute a policy agenda, without the acquiescence of the supreme leader and his associates. But was Ahmadinejad one of the leader's associates? Or was he, like his predecessor, Khatami, something of a political rival? The answer to this question should determine the extent to which Ahmadinejad's foreign-policy extremism and authoritarian tendencies are taken seriously as a political program. But it is a puzzle that has vexed political analysts since the president took office in August 2005, bringing with him a faction that was largely new to the post-revolutionary political scene. Composed partly of military and paramilitary elements, partly of extremist clerics like Mesbah-Yazdi and partly of inexperienced new conservative politicians, those in Ahmadinejad's faction are often called "neoconservatives." But to the extent that they have an ideology, it is less new than old, harking back to the early days of the Islamic republic. Since that time, the same elite has largely run Iranian politics, though it has divided itself into competing factions, and the act of wielding power has mellowed many hard-liners into pragmatists. Ahmadinejad's faction, on the other hand, came into power speaking the language of the past but with the zeal of the untried.

In 2005, many analysts believed that Ahmadinejad's elevation to the presidency must have been sanctioned by the supreme leader — indeed, that it reflected a hardening agenda among the traditional conservatives. He would be the "secretary" of Khamenei, a number of reformists said to me that summer in Tehran. But the way Ahmadinejad governed was nothing if not divisive. He undertook the most far-reaching governmental housecleaning since the revolution itself, reportedly replacing as many as 20,000 bureaucrats. And when it came time for the elections last month, he offered his own slates of candidates, disdaining to ally himself with the traditional conservatives or with anyone else. For the Assembly of Experts, Ahmadinejad endorsed a ticket of scholars from what is known as the Haqqani circle, a group of clerics who cleave strongly to the notion of the divine state and disdain popular sovereignty and democracy.

The senior figure in this circle, Mesbah-Yazdi, already belonged to the assembly. But in the fall of 2006, buoyed by association with the populist president, his group put forward a wave of candidates in a bid to transform the assembly. Even after the Guardian Council — an appointed body that answers to the supreme leader and that vets candidates and legislation — had disqualified almost half the proposed candidates, including most of the reformists and a large number of Mesbah-Yazdi's students, clerics associated with Mesbah-Yazdi still stood a reasonable chance of winning dozens of the 86 seats. It was here that the ideological contest of the Ahmadinejad presidency was starkest. Were the public and the leadership ready to accept Mesbah-Yazdi's brand of extremism along with the populism Ahmadinejad had served up? And what did it mean if they were not?

The 97-mile stretch of highway from Tehran southwest to Qom passes through a cratered landscape of magnificent desolation to the basin between a salt marsh and a desert at the foot of the Zagros Mountains. Middle-class, educated Tehranis often scorn and even fear Qom as the center of religious Puritanism and political repression. But for pious Shiites in Iran and elsewhere, the city is a pilgrimage destination, home to one of the holiest Shiite shrines, most of the living Shiite marjas (senior religious figures, literally "sources of imitation") and more than 50 seminaries, institutions that long pre-existed universities in Iran and where the works of the Greek philosophers have for centuries been studied alongside religious texts. Students, who number some 40,000, enter Qom at an average age of 17. Some of them continue their studies for decades, as Shiite religious learning has no set end point. Since the Islamic revolution, the seminary city has thrived as the government has spent lavishly on mosques and dormitories, nearly all with the same pale brick and blue tile facades. In recent years, Qom has absorbed waves of Shiite immigrants from Afghanistan and Iraq. There is an Iraqi bazaar not far from the holy shrine, and the sight of men in Arab dishdashas is commonplace.

Mesbah-Yazdi has a major presence here in the form of the Imam Khomeini Institute, the enormous seminary of which Mesbah-Yazdi is the head scholar. It holds Iran's most extensive library of scholarly books in English, totaling 11,200 volumes. It is the envy of the universities in Tehran. Mesbah-Yazdi, a fellow cleric told me, believed that it was important to understand Western ideas to better resist and refute them.

Born in 1934, Mesbah-Yazdi is an éminence grise among the ayatollahs of Qom, but age has not mellowed him. In the last decade he has become famous less for his learned philosophical exegeses (he posts his entry in the Routledge Encyclopedia of Philosophy on his Web site) than for his jeremiads at Friday prayers against popular sovereignty, free speech, women's rights and Islamic reform. Public execution and flogging are "a basic principle of Islam," Mesbah-Yazdi has said, and the government should regulate the content of speech "just as it checks the distribution of adulterated or contaminated foodstuffs." Because "Mesbah" sounds like the Farsi word for crocodile, he is known by his critics as Ayatollah Crocodile. (A cartoonist was once imprisoned for depicting him as a reptile, shedding crocodile tears as he strangled a dissident writer with his tail.)

At Ahmadinejad's invitation, members of Mesbah-Yazdi's Haqqani circle occupy several key government posts. But before Ahmadinejad came to power, they had been pushed mostly to the margins of Iranian politics, where they complained bitterly about the efforts of the reformist Khatami and his colleagues to advance their agenda through the elected branches of government. To the Haqqani scholars, it seemed that the reformists were challenging the doctrine of velayat-i-faqih, which is based on the sovereign power of the chief jurist, the supreme leader. "We shall wait to see what place these foxes who claim to be the supporters of reform will occupy in hell," Mesbah-Yazdi proclaimed. If Iranians believed in their supreme leader as the agent of God, second-guessing his judgment through elections was tantamount to holding a referendum on whether or not Damavand was the highest peak in Iran. What if 51 percent of the public said that it was not? "It doesn't matter what the people think," Mesbah-Yazdi was quoted as saying. "The people are ignorant sheep." He has also said, "Islam was the government of God, not the government of the people."

Mesbah-Yazdi's most open and media-friendly acolyte, Ayatollah Mohsen Gharavian, did not put the matter quite so strongly when, draped in the encompassing Iranian chador, I met with him in an unadorned office at a small seminary on one of Qom's dusty side streets.

"In the name of God, the beneficent and merciful," Gharavian intoned, "before coming to the main question and answer, I want to know where you got this chador. Is it from the United States or Iran?"

From Iran, I told him.

"Congratulations on seeing you in a very Islamic manner," Gharavian replied.

For a cleric who had been quoted as saying that despotism was not all bad and that public opinion was meaningless, Gharavian, who teaches philosophy at the Imam Khomeini Institute, did not have a severe presence. Rather, he was a big, courteous man of 54 with a reddish beard. The election to the Assembly of Experts was just a day away, and Gharavian was the hard-line candidate for the hard-line city of Qom. Still, he expected to lose, and he did lose. Amiably, he remarked that he had run and lost before, and that to win would have required a financial outlay of which he disapproved.

When it came to politics, he spoke mostly in evasions and platitudes. Democracy, he explained, was acceptable within the boundaries of Islam, and human rights were contained within Islam, but such rights should not include freedom of worship or freedom to believe things that are untrue or unwise. (His examples were the misguided beliefs of Nietzsche and Machiavelli.) The Islamic penal code required no modification in the modern era; its harshest punishments, he asserted, were no more violent than some American and European spectator sports. He appeared shocked by the suggestion that Iran held political prisoners and demanded an example. I offered the journalist Akbar Ganji, imprisoned for six years on account of his critical writings. Gharavian replied: "Did you read Mr. Ganji's manifesto? He questioned the whole establishment." Freedom of expression, he explained, did not include the freedom to "breach the peace of the society." He demanded, "Don't you have prisoners in your country?"

Mesbah-Yazdi's statements on most of these matters were a matter of public record, and they were even blunter. "If someone tells you he has a new interpretation of Islam, hit him in the mouth," he said in 2000. Two years later, he said, "The prophets of God did not believe in pluralism. They believed that only one idea was right." On Sept. 4, 1999, he said: "Killing hypocrites does not require a court order, as it is a duty imposed by the Shariah on all genuine Muslims. The order of Islam is to throw them down from a high mountain and kill them outright." He spoke the following month of the need to break the unnecessary taboo on violence.

If such a taboo existed in the Islamic republic, it had been broken. That year, a string of dissidents were murdered under suspicious circumstances. In the writings that led to his prison sentence, Ganji accused Mesbah-Yazdi of sanctifying such actions with whispered fatwas and members of the Haqqani circle of direct involvement in the murders. A member of the shadowy vigilante group Ansar-e Hezbollah, which had violently attacked student demonstrators in July 1999, lent credence to Ganji's claims with videotaped testimony in which he said that Mesbah-Yazdi had encouraged the group to assassinate a reformist politician. "Now, on the issue of whether I authorized the assassination of individuals," Mesbah-Yazdi declared unapologetically in March 2001, "I must say that Imam Khomeini, may God be satisfied with him, issued a decree saying that shedding Salman Rushdie's blood was a religious obligation and, therefore, he advocated resorting to violence as well."

Why Ahmadinejad would ally himself with these clerics remains something of a mystery. Contrary to popular belief, says Nasser Hadian, a political scientist at Tehran University and a childhood friend of the president, Ahmadinejad never expounded a particularly conservative moral or social agenda. Rather, says Hadian, Ahmadinejad was and continues to be inspired above all by Ali Shariati, the mid-20th-century theorist of radical Islamic egalitarianism. The president's agenda is redistributionist and anti-imperialist, Hadian says. That doesn't make him a democrat. Nonetheless, "he is basically using Mesbah," Hadian says. It is an alliance of political convenience.

Alireza Haghighi, a political scientist who teaches at the University of Toronto at Mississauga, agrees that the association between Ahmadinejad and Mesbah-Yazdi has been overstated. But in an article he wrote with his colleague Victoria Tahmasebi in International Journal, Haghighi documented yet another Ahmadinejad genesis story. Young Ahmadinejad led a politically and religiously conservative Islamist student group during the Islamic Revolution, the writers claim. When the leftist Islamist students proposed seizing the American Embassy in 1979, Ahmadinejad opposed the action as imprudent, but he suggested that if they went ahead with it, they should seize the Soviet Embassy as well. His plan rejected, Ahmadinejad found himself excluded from historic events and spurned by the Islamic left, which was at that time a powerful faction within the regime. His opposition to that faction ossified into a vendetta.

Soon after Khomeini's death, the Islamic left lost the factional battle for dominance. Its members wandered eight years in the political wilderness before returning as the reform movement. That, too, Ahmadinejad was anxious to crush. In that aspiration he would have found ample common ground with the Haqqani circle.

As president, Ahmadinejad looked to the extreme right rather than seeking allies among the traditional conservatives, and in so doing, he exposed himself politically. "They were very arrogant," Hadian said of Ahmadinejad and his camp. "They didn't want to make any compromises. He has stood against the entire political structure in Iran, not inviting any of them, even the conservatives, to be partners. You don't see them in the cabinet; you don't see them in political positions."

And for that there was a price to be paid. This fall, Rafsanjani, who had suffered a humiliating defeat at Ahmadinejad's hands in the presidential election of 2005, was reportedly persuaded to run again for the Assembly of Experts by the supreme leader or people close to him. Rafsanjani is a divisive figure in Iranian politics. He is widely perceived as a kingmaker, the power behind the rise of Khamenei to the position of supreme leader and that of Khatami to the presidency. But though he remains highly respected among clerics, Rafsanjani is not a beloved figure in Iranian public life. During his presidency, he adopted an economic liberalization program that involved extremely unpopular austerity measures; meanwhile, through pistachio exports, he had himself become one of the richest men in Iran. Political and social repression did not ease until Khatami, his successor, came into office.

Nonetheless, in the Assembly of Experts elections in December, Rafsanjani emerged as the compromise candidate of the reformists and traditional conservatives. One reformist activist described him to me as the very last line of defense against the extreme right. And Rafsanjani delivered a staggering blow, winning nearly twice as many votes as Mesbah-Yazdi. The neoconservatives, it seemed, had been slapped down much the same way the reformists had: the traditional conservatives had decided that the threat they posed was intolerable, and the voters had decided that the president associated with them could not deliver on his promises.

On the morning of Election Day, Dec. 15, there were long lines outside the polling places in central and east Tehran. A crowd milled about the front courtyard of Masjed al Nabi, a large mosque in the east. There were children, a television camera and a seller of balloons in the shape of rabbit ears. A middle-aged couple stood by the sinks normally used for ablutions; the woman wore a long, tailored raincoat and a conservative black scarf. Her husband explained that the election was very important to them. “We are choosing our future,” he said through an interpreter. He was too sick, really, to move, but he had told his doctor that he could not forgo his civic duty to participate in the election.

Then I asked him if he saw big differences among the candidates for Assembly of Experts. “No,” he said, “they are all the same.”

What about the ones for city council?

“No,” he replied. “They are all the same, too.”

It is nearly impossible to have a political discussion with only one person on an Iranian street. Outside Masjed al Nabi, the first interloper was a clean-cut 35-year-old man in a plaid shirt who gave his name as Ali. “How can you say they are all the same?” he nearly shouted at the man who had been speaking. “We have candidates who are like the Taliban and others who are practically liberals. We have candidates who think women should be free and others who do not think so at all.”

“I never heard of a thing like that,” the first man said calmly. “The country has laws to decide these matters.”

To my right, a woman in a chador heatedly exclaimed: “He’s right! How can you say they are all the same? That’s why we’re here to vote, because they are all different. Our new president, Ahmadinejad, before the election he said women were free and equal. Now he says we should just make babies. Because he wanted our votes, he said good things.”

The original couple took advantage of the hubbub to slip away. Mohammad, a 37-year-old in a running jacket, pushed his way into our circle. “I am not voting,” he told me. “I want to choose my freedom. I don’t want to vote for them. I’m sure that whether I vote or not, it makes no difference. I don’t accept the Constitution of this country, and I hope I can change it without voting.”

Ali was listening intently. “The people who are good in this thing accept the vote of the people not just for show and not just on Election Day,” he told Mohammad. “Even in America it is the same; everywhere in the world it is. Everywhere in the world there are some people who are pro-democracy and others who are against it. Now people are more educated. One day, our democracy will be better than democracy in the United States, if we believe in it. We like our religion, our imams, God and Islam. We want democracy next to this. We don’t believe in democracy and freedom the way it exists in other parts of the world. We want something of our own.”

It was 5 o’clock when I left the crowded mosques of middle-class central and east Tehran for the deserted polling places of the affluent northern hills. In Tajrish, an election official told me that he had seen just 200 voters — far fewer than in the presidential election less than two years ago. “All the mullahs are the same,” he confided. “Everything always gets worse. Ahmadinejad is like a catalyst, speeding it up. The philosophical foundation of the state is not good.”

The debates among ordinary voters go to the heart of a structural weakness in the Iranian state. Founded on two conflicting ideas — the sovereignty of the people and divinely inspired clerical rule — the Islamic Republic of Iran has suffered from a decadelong crisis of legitimacy. Nothing forced that crisis quite the way the reform movement did, despite, or perhaps even because of, its cautious temperament and legalistic methods. Over the course of Khatami’s presidency, Iranians were faced with an inevitable question: What use was a supreme leader in a democracy, and what use were elections in a theocracy? The rise of Ahmadinejad, then his comeuppance, have forced those questions from the other direction. How far could the conservatives go in the authoritarian direction, and if not all the way, why not?

Later, he added: “Either Khamenei is infallible, or he’s not. If he’s not, then he is an ordinary person like Bush or Blair, answerable to the Parliament and the people. If he is, then we should throw away all this nonsense about Western values and liberal democracy. Either we have Western liberal philosophy, republican government and checks and balances, or we should stick to Mesbah. But to combine them? Imam Khomeini was so popular and charismatic. People rallied behind him and believed he was infallible. We never thought, What if the supreme leader is not supported by the people? The answer to this was brilliantly made by Mesbah: to hell with them.”

Zibakalam described Mesbah-Yazdi’s reading of velayat-i-faqih as a radical version of the one first proposed by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini. But when I looked back through the lectures in which Khomeini first delineated the theory in Najaf in 1970, I found a vision strikingly similar to Mesbah-Yazdi’s. At that time, Khomeini had little truck with popular sovereignty. He quoted the Koran and sayings attributed to Muhammad: “The prophet has higher claims on the believers than their own selves” and “The scholars are the heirs of the prophet.” The only legitimate legislation was that which had already been made by God, and this would be administered by the learned jurist, who would rule over the people like a guardian over a child.

Nine years later, from his Paris exile during the revolution, Khomeini would approve a constitution drafted by more liberal associates. It was the blueprint for a parliamentary democracy, in which a council of clergymen would play an advisory role. This draft became the basis for the debate that occupied the first Assembly of Experts, convened to revise and approve a final constitution. After much discussion of the contradictions it engendered, the experts, many of them clerics, nonetheless yoked velayat-i-faqih to the republican structure they had been handed.

To this day, the structure of the Iranian state remains too liberal for the authoritarians and too authoritarian for the liberals, but the traditional conservatives at the center of power cannot resolve this obvious paradox at the republic's heart without relinquishing their own position. The best they could do was to revise the Constitution after Khomeini's death, greatly expanding the powers of the clerical councils and of the supreme leader at the expense of the elected offices.

Clerics I spoke to from the traditional conservative camp associated with Khamenei were paternalistic in their view of the state rather than outright authoritarian. They seemed to genuinely believe in a limited form of popular sovereignty — guided, of course, by Islamic scholars so that the people would not fall into error but nonetheless necessary for the legitimacy of the state.

It was this traditional conservative establishment that the reformists, many of them clerics, hoped to transform by introducing new policies through the legal channels of the state and by persuading jurists to assimilate new ideas about rights and freedoms into their interpretations of the sacred texts. One of the leading reformist theorists, Mohammad Mojtahed Shabestari, explained to me: "Many nations have influenced our jurisprudence. We could set aside some of the decrees of Islam today and bring some Western laws to replace them. This doesn't make us infidels."

After eight years in power, the reform movement found itself blocked by the conservative establishment, hamstrung by its own mistakes and unwilling or unable to shore up the failing economy. Ahmadinejad rose in its wake, campaigning not on ideological extremism but on populist blandishments. He would ease the financial pain of his countrymen, he promised, by bringing Iran's oil wealth to the people's tables.

As Omid Malekian had intimated to me at the Mahestan shopping mall, however, this was not a promise to make lightly. The Iranian economy has been mismanaged at least since the revolution, and to fix it would require measures no populist would be willing to take. Under Ahmadinejad, inflation has risen; foreign investors have scorned Iranian markets, fearing political upheaval or foreign invasion; the Iranian stock market has plummeted; Iranian capital has fled to Dubai. Voters I talked to pointed to the prices of ordinary foodstuffs when they wanted to explain their negative feelings about the government. According to Iranian news sources, from January to late August 2006 the prices of fruits and vegetables in urban areas rose by 20 percent. A month later, during Ramadan, the price of fruit reportedly doubled while that of chicken rose 10 percent in mere days. Housing prices in Tehran have reached a record high. Unemployment is still widespread. And Ahmadinejad's approval rating, as calculated by the official state television station, had dipped to 35 percent in October.

Iran is not a poor country. It is highly urbanized and modern, with a sizable middle class. Oil revenues, which Iran has in abundance, should be channeling plenty of hard currency into the state's coffers, and in fact the economy's overall rate of growth is healthy and rising. But as Parvin Alizadeh, an economist at London Metropolitan University, explained to me, what ultimately matters is how the state spends its influx of wealth. The Iranian government has tried to create jobs swiftly and pacify the people by spending the oil money on new government-run projects. But these projects are not only overmanned and inefficient, like much of the country's bloated and technologically backward public sector; they also increase the demand for consumer goods and services, driving up inflation.

Ahmadinejad has continued this trend. He has generated considerable personal good will in poorer communities, but hardly anyone I asked could honestly say that their lives had gotten better during his presidency. He fought to lower interest rates, which drove up lending, leading to inflation and capital flight. The government cannot risk infuriating the public with the austerity measures that would be required in order to solve its deep-rooted economic problems. But as long as its short-term fixes continue to fail, the government will go on being unpopular. The last two presidents have lost their constituencies over this issue. And so officials seek to distract people from their economic woes with ideological posturing and anti-Western rhetoric. Not only has this lost its cachet with much of the Iranian public, it also serves to compound Iran's economic problems by blackening its image abroad. "Iran has not sorted out its basic problem, which is to be accepted in the international community as a respectable government," Alizadeh said. "Investors do not take it seriously. This is a political crisis, not an economic crisis."

For a Western traveler in Iran these days, it is hard to avoid a feeling of cognitive dissonance. From a distance, the Islamic republic appears to be at its zenith. But from the street level, Iran's grand revolutionary experiment is beset with fragility. The state is in a sense defined by its contradictions, both constitutional and economic. It cannot be truly stable until it resolves them, and yet if it tries to do so, it may not survive.

Report: Iran Denies Centrifuge Work (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 28, 2007

An Iranian nuclear agency official has denied claims made by a top lawmaker that the Islamic Republic had begun installing 3,000 centrifuges at an uranium enrichment plant, Iran's state-run news agency reported late Saturday.

Hossein Simorgh, head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization public relations department, said "no new centrifuges have been installed in Natanz," referring to the nuclear facility in central Iran, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

Earlier Saturday, lawmaker Alaeddin Boroujerdi said Iran was currently installing the 3,000 centrifuges, underlining that the country would continue to develop its disputed nuclear program despite U.N. sanctions.

Iran faces the prospect of additional United Nations sanctions unless it stops uranium enrichment by the end of a 60-day period that ends next month.

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously in favor of economic sanctions Dec. 23 after Iran ignored an earlier deadline to halt enrichment.

Large scale use of centrifuges makes it possible to produce more enriched uranium in a shorter period.

Enriched uranium is used to fuel nuclear reactors and to make nuclear weapons. Many countries, including the United States, believe that Iran is using its nuclear program as a cover to produce an atomic weapon. Iran says its program is only for generating electricity.

Cracks In Iran (WP)

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

THE BUSH administration's recent steps against Iran, which have included the dispatch of a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf and the arrest of Iranian agents in Iraq, have worried a lot of people in Washington, who fear that the White House may be gearing up for another war. Fortunately, some influential people in Tehran appear to be getting nervous, as well. The stock market is dropping, and capital flight is accelerating. Some influential voices have begun publicly suggesting that flexibility as well as toughness is needed in dealing with the West. Pressure is growing on radical President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has been rebuked by voters in recent elections, by parliamentary resolutions and by editorials in newspapers that reflect the views of the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

All this suggests that the U.S. measures, compounded by a U.N. sanctions resolution, may be having an effect on the mullahs. If so, the impact is sorely needed. During the past year Iran and its ally Syria have behaved as if they can defy the United States and United Nations with impunity. They have pressed a broad and violent offensive against Western interests across the region, from Baghdad to Beirut to the Gaza Strip, even as Iran has rejected Security Council orders to freeze its nuclear program.

It's too early to tell whether Iran will back off from that belligerent agenda: Last week its ally Hezbollah renewed its attempt to stage a coup against Lebanon's pro-Western government. But it's not too soon for the Bush administration to begin working on the next stage of its strategy. That's because the pushback tactics, while necessary to change the atmosphere of hubris in Tehran, aren't likely by themselves to achieve the administration's goals. The pressure needs to be carefully measured, since Iran, too, has the capacity to escalate, both in Iraq and elsewhere. While the threat of military action is useful, this president should not have to resort to that option.

What's needed is a mix of pressure with avenues for moderation by Tehran. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has offered to meet with Iranian officials and discuss a broad agenda of issues but only after the nuclear program is suspended -- a retreat Iran appears unlikely to undertake anytime soon. The administration doesn't help its cause by describing the Islamic regime as a Soviet-like monolith and publicly dividing the Middle East between pro- and anti-Iranian blocs. That ignores the very differences between extremists and moderates that can now be glimpsed in Tehran, and it invites Mr. Ahmadinejad to rally the country on a nationalist platform.

The most promising way of refining the current policy would be to return to a strategy that worked when the Bush administration tried it in 2001, which is engaging Iran in a regional forum. Five years ago the United States and Iran quietly cooperated within a larger group of nations to fashion a new regime in Afghanistan; now they have the possibility to work with Iraq's other neighbors to head off the escalation of sectarian war in Baghdad. To pursue such an initiative while simultaneously stepping up military and economic pressure on Iran, the Bush administration would have to forswear the Manichaeism it is so prone to in foreign affairs. But it might get better results.

20 Killed In Baghdad On Eve Of Holiday (NYT)

By Marc Santora, Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 27 — Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad came under fierce assault once again on Saturday, following two weeks of violence that left at least 300 dead and many hundreds more wounded.

Many of the recent attacks, nearly all of them in heavily Shiite areas, have occurred during the period of commemoration that leads to one of the holiest days for Shiites, an intense day of mourning known as Ashura that falls this year on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0123470

Three American soldiers died when a roadside bomb exploded near their vehicle on Saturday north of Baghdad, [a news agency] reported. The news service said that the military confirmed the deaths of two other soldiers who were killed Thursday when their patrol was attacked in eastern Baghdad, and said that two additional soldiers died in separate episodes on Friday in Diyala Province.

Sunni militants have previously staged attacks on Shiites on Ashura, and fears are especially pronounced this year because it will be the first observance of the holy day since the sharp rise in sectarian killings after the bombing of a revered shrine in Samarra last February.

Basim Shareef, a member of Parliament and part of the Shiite coalition that controls the government, said the attacks might be timed to coincide with the Shiite holy days. But he thought it was more likely that militants were taking advantage of the relative lull in activity by Shiite militia leaders, who might be worried about becoming the targets of the new Baghdad security plan.

"I think the parties that might retaliate believe that they are targeted in the new security plan, and that is why they have not taken any retribution," he said.

In Saturday's deadliest attack, at least 15 people were killed and 55 wounded when twin car bombs exploded near a busy market and movie theater in eastern Baghdad, according to an Interior Ministry official.

The first car exploded after barreling into a crowded intersection, where many Shiites had gathered to perform rituals common in the period leading to Ashura, including self-flagellation.

A second bomb, in a vehicle parked nearby, exploded moments later. It was timed to inflict maximum damage just as a crowd gathered to help the victims of the first blast, according to an Iraqi security official.

Women in black chadors helped victims covered in blood reach rescue workers as militia members flooded the area.

At the time of the attack, the neighborhood, known as Jadida, was being guarded by Shiite militiamen as well as the Iraqi Army and the police, residents said.

Although it is unclear who was behind the attack, coordinated car bombings are considered to be a hallmark of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which includes foreign fighters.

The spate of recent attacks appear to have been intended not just to inflict the maximum amount of civilian suffering, but also to grind all aspects of daily life closer to a halt. In a little over a week, schools, busy markets and even an animal market have been targets.

Saturday's violence came on a day when President Bush discussed the new security plan by telephone with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. According to a statement released by Mr. Maliki's office, Mr. Bush "renewed his commitment to the Iraqi government."

Despite the violence and the threat of even worse attacks, Iraqi officials said they did not expect ceremonies associated with Ashura to be altered.

Ashura marks the seventh-century death of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson, Hussein, in the battle of Karbala, where the biggest gatherings will be held Monday. Last year's holy day was marked by scattered violence in which fewer than a dozen people were killed, but the two years before that were deadlier.

Two years ago, on the eve and the day of Ashura, 11 suicide bombers killed at least 74 people. In 2004, more than 180 people were killed during Iraq's Ashura commemorations.

In other violence in Baghdad on Saturday, gunmen killed five people from the same Shiite family and wounded three more after storming a home in the Amil neighborhood, the Iraqi authorities said.

Forty bodies were found around the city, most tortured and executed.

And in the Shiite area of Karada, gunmen stormed the office of a computer store and kidnapped at least eight people.

The attack began when four camouflaged S.U.V.'s swept into the crowded street of computer shops just outside the capital's Technology University shortly after noon, witnesses said. Men in camouflage commando uniforms poured out, witnesses said, fired into the air, shouted for people to get into their homes and stormed the Al Basra computer company, situated on the second floor of a nondescript concrete house on the main thoroughfare. They seized the workers and fled.

It was unclear whether the abductors were the police or Iraqi soldiers, or impostors.

Elsewhere, American forces continued to clash with militants, killing 14 insurgents in an airstrike early on Saturday in Diyala Province.

The attack was directed against "a known foreign-fighter safe house" as the men inside tried to flee, a military statement said.

There was also an explosion in the early evening Saturday in the Green Zone that set off alarms, activating a mechanized voice warning people to duck and cover. It shook houses blocks away and followed an attack on Friday, when two rockets left six non-American workers wounded, according to an American official.

U.S. Troop Deaths Cap Iraq's Bloody Week (AP)

BAGHDAD (AP) — The U.S. military reported the deaths of seven more soldiers Saturday, while Sunni insurgent bombers struck yet another market in a predominantly Shiite district, killing at least 13 people in their bid to terrorize Baghdad days before a U.S.-Iraqi military crackdown.

The latest market attack capped a week in which more than 150 people, mostly Shiites, were slain in bomb attacks.

Death squads, believed to be primarily Shiite militiamen, continued their butchery on the other side of Iraq's deepening sectarian divide, with police reporting the discovery of 40 bodies dumped in Baghdad alone. Two of the victims were women and most of the bodies showed signs of torture, police said.

In all, at least 61 victims of Iraq's sectarian warfare were killed or found dead across the country.

Of the seven service members reported dead on Saturday, two died in Diyala province northeast of the capital on Friday, three in an unspecified location north of Baghad on Saturday and two in east Baghdad on Thursday.

The latest reported deaths raised to at least 3,079 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. The figure includes seven military civilians. At least 2,471 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military.

U.S. airstrikes killed 14 insurgents and destroyed a safe house for foreign fighters during a raid south of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Two suspects were captured, the military said.

The Americans said the raid had targeted a foreigner they believed responsible for a series of attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces in the extremely violent Baqouba region. The military there has been caught in the midst of some of the bloodiest sectarian fighting of the war.

Saturday's bombings employed what has become a classic insurgent tactic. First a suicide car bomber drove into the crowded market stalls in the busy New Baghdad commercial area shortly after noon, then detonated his explosives among the stores and kiosks selling food, clothes, household appliances and birds.

As people rushed to help the victims, a parked car bomb exploded. The 13 killed included two policemen; four officers were among the 42 wounded, police said.

Burned-out hulks of cars and vans littered the market. A bag of fruit lay in the twisted metal on the bloody pavement.

Farooq Haitham, the 33-year-old owner of a watch repair shop, said the area had been targeted by bombers before but shopkeepers had no choice but to keep opening their doors.

"What can we do? We want to live. We need the money so we come to work," Haitham said.

It was the latest in a series of attacks against commercial targets, in which more than 150 people have died since last Sunday. The attack signals a tough battle ahead as U.S. and Iraqi forces prepare for the security operation, a third bid to pacify the capital since Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki took power on May 25.

The week's deadliest attack killed 88 people Monday when a suicide car bomber crashed into a market in the central neighborhood of Bab al-Sharqi.

Shortly before sunset Saturday, a rocket slammed into the Green Zone, wounding two people slightly. It was the second time in three days that rockets hit the area, home to the U.S. Embassy, the Iraqi government and thousands of American troops.

In central Baghdad, police said armed men in police commando uniforms and driving cars with license plates commonly used by the Interior Ministry raided a computer shop in a Christian section of the Sina'a neighborhood. They took away four employees and three customers.

"The group pointed their guns at the victims and the passersby, then they forced the victims into the cars and they sped away," Younis Kadhim, 36, who owns a small restaurant nearby.

Two mortar shells also slammed into a residential district in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriyah, police said, killing two people and wounding seven others.

A taxi driver was shot to death after he was caught in the crossfire during clashes in Mosul. A parked car bomb targeting an Iraqi army patrol later exploded in the northern city, killing one civilian and wounding another.

BAGHDAD -- The U.S. military reported the deaths of seven American soldiers yesterday, while Sunni insurgent bombers struck yet another market in a predominantly Shi'ite district, killing at least 13 persons in their bid to terrorize Baghdad days before a U.S.-Iraqi military crackdown.

Seven U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq Over Three Days (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 27 -- Seven U.S. soldiers were killed in Iraq over the past three days, the military said Saturday, as violence in the capital and elsewhere continued to surge.

Three of the soldiers were killed Saturday north of Baghdad when an improvised explosive device detonated near their vehicle, the military said in a statement.

A Task Force Lightning soldier assigned to the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division was killed Friday in Diyala province in eastern Iraq when an improvised explosive device struck his vehicle, according to a military statement. Another soldier was killed Friday in Diyala when his unit came under attack, the military said.

The military also announced that two soldiers were killed Thursday in eastern Baghdad when their vehicle struck an improvised explosive device.

The soldiers' names were withheld pending notification of their relatives, officials said.

Iraqi civilians also were targeted in the violence.

Two suicide bombers drove into a market in the New Baghdad neighborhood of the capital and simultaneously detonated explosives in their vehicles, said Maj. Kassim Abdul Karim of the Iraqi Ministry of Interior. At least 13 people were killed in the attack, the latest in a string of bombings this week in areas where Shiite Muslims congregate.

More than 45 bodies with shotgun wounds were found in Baghdad during the past 48 hours, said Brig. Salim Muhsin, another Interior Ministry spokesman.

Also Saturday, armed men wearing what appeared to be Iraqi police uniforms and driving vehicles that looked like police cars raided a computer store in the Sinaa sector of the capital. The gunmen kidnapped eight employees and stole several computers, the ministry spokesman said.

Zaid Sadiq, a merchant who works near the raided store in eastern Baghdad, said the gunmen abducted only men but stole cellphones from women.

"How can we work or live like this?" Sadiq asked. "They looked exactly like police -- how can we resist them? They were in police uniforms, and who's to say that they are not police?"

Meanwhile, a prominent politician in the western city of Ramadi was kidnapped and killed, according to a physician at Ramadi Hospital. Saied Hussein al-Alwani, a council member, was abducted by suspected members of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq; his body was discarded on a road an hour later with four shotgun wounds, according to Mahmood al-Ani, the physician.

Ani said the politician was killed because he had been "accused of helping the American forces." Al-Qaeda in Iraq posted a statement at a mosque asserting responsibility for the killing, Ani said.

In Baghdad, two rockets fired into the fortified Green Zone at 4 p.m. slightly injured two people, a U.S. Embassy spokesman said. "We are currently investigating the incident," spokesman Lou Fintor said.

It was the second rocket attack this week on the compound that houses the U.S. Embassy and the Iraqi parliament.

Iraqi officials said the U.S. Consulate in Hilla, the capital of Babil province, was attacked with mortars. Fintor said he did not have information about the reported attack.

60 Civilians, 7 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi,

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

15 of the dead are victims of a double suicide car bombing at an outdoor market in Baghdad.

BAGHDAD — At least seven U.S. soldiers were killed in separate combat incidents, the U.S. military said Saturday, amid a steady swirl of violence against American troops and Iraqi civilians.

Nationwide, at least 60 Iraqis were killed or found dead Saturday as U.S. and Iraqi officials struggled to find a formula to calm sectarian passions and reduce the American troop presence.

Three U.S. soldiers were killed Saturday north of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded near an Army vehicle conducting a security escort mission. One soldier was wounded.

The U.S. military disclosed no further details about the attack, but a farmer in the Tarmiya region north of Baghdad described an incident in which a roadside bomb destroyed a U.S. Humvee near his home. A U.S. helicopter arrived to evacuate the casualties, he said.

Two soldiers were killed Friday in separate bomb attacks northeast of the capital in Diyala province. One was assigned to the 1st Cavalry Division. The other was killed in an attack that left three soldiers wounded, the military said.

Two troops were killed Thursday in east Baghdad in a bomb attack on a combat patrol that also left two soldiers wounded.

The deaths brought the number of U.S. military personnel killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 to 3,075, according to icasualties.org.

In east Baghdad, two suicide car bombers struck a crowded outdoor market in a poor district, killing at least 15 Iraqis and injuring dozens. The bombing in Jadida was one of many recent attacks on civilians in the capital's Shiite-dominated outdoor shopping venues.

Police and witnesses said two suicide bombers driving cars plowed into the crowds within seconds of each other just after the noontime call to prayer.

"The first explosion was very powerful, then the second explosion took place," said Haidar Abdul-Mohsen, 37, a minivan driver who witnessed the attacks. "I saw some bodies of people. Two were completely charred."

Authorities suspect that many such bombers are young Sunni Arab men from other countries heeding religious calls to fight against the U.S. military and Iraq's Shiite government. Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint in south Baghdad on Saturday detained four foreign Arabs in a car containing suicide belts. Authorities declined to disclose their nationalities.

Elsewhere in Baghdad, gunmen attacked the house of a Shiite family in a western neighborhood, killing four and leaving a 10-year-old boy for dead.

Gunmen wearing police uniforms raided a shop in the city's main computer bazaar, kidnapping the store manager and seven others, police said.

Mortar rounds struck a mostly Shiite neighborhood in north Baghdad, killing one and injuring 10. Another family on a nearby side street was sprayed with gunfire in an attack that killed one and injured three.

South of the capital, a man was killed in a drive-by shooting in Iskandariya, and police in Hillah banned vehicles in an effort to protect pilgrims walking to Karbala for an annual Shiite religious festival. Two Iraqi soldiers were shot and killed in the area.

In southern Iraq, authorities in the port city of Basra discovered the bodies of four men who had been kidnapped a day earlier. And in Suwayrah, authorities discovered the corpses of five teenagers in pajamas floating in the Tigris River. All had been handcuffed, blindfolded and shot.

Bombs At Baghdad Market Kill 15; 7 U.S. Troops Die (CNN)

CNN.com, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Twin car bombs exploded in a busy Baghdad market Saturday morning, killing 15 people, Baghdad police officials said.

Separately, seven U.S. troops were killed in three incidents Saturday.

Two Iraqi police officers were among the people killed in the Baghdad blasts, and five other officers were wounded.

It was the second Baghdad market bombing in two days. On Friday, 15 people died when the popular Ghazel pet market, where people buy and sell monkeys, cats and dogs, was attacked.

In addition to the 15 killed in Saturday's bombings in southeastern Baghdad, 55 people were injured. The first of the two car explosions was a suicide attack, police said.

Another person was killed and 16 more were injured in northwest Baghdad's Hurriya neighborhood after two mortar rounds landed in a residential area Saturday, a Baghdad police official said.

About 38 miles (60 kilometers) south of Baghdad, in al-Iskandariya, two Iraqi soldiers were killed and two others were wounded when gunmen opened fire on a civilian car, a Hilla police official said.

The soldiers were in civilian clothes and were headed back to their military base in Baghdad after a vacation, the official said.

In other violence, 40 bodies were found strewn across various Baghdad neighborhoods, according to Baghdad emergency police.

Also Saturday in Baghdad, gunmen dressed as Iraqi national police officers stormed a computer store, abducted seven people and sped off in three vehicles, Baghdad police said.

It is not the first report of gunmen disguising themselves. Attackers have been reported wearing Iraqi Army, national police and commando uniforms, as well as uniforms that resemble U.S. military attire.

In October, U.S. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said Iraqi police brigades were forced to buy new uniforms after gunmen committed "criminal acts and sectarian violence" while dressed as police officers.Seven U.S. troop deaths reported

Three U.S. soldiers conducting a security escort mission were killed and one wounded Saturday in a bombing north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

They were from Multi-National Division-Baghdad.

Earlier Saturday, the military reported four other U.S. troop deaths -- two in Diyala province on Friday and two in eastern Baghdad on Thursday.

The number of U.S. military deaths in the Iraq war now stands at 3,067. Seven civilian contractors for the military also have been killed.

About 35 miles north of Baghdad -- near the city of Baquba -- coalition forces killed 14 suspected terrorists in an airstrike Saturday. Two more suspected terrorists were arrested during morning raids targeting safe houses for foreign fighters, the U.S. military said.

Two more insurgents were killed in southern Kirkuk when their car, rigged with explosives, detonated outside a Shiite mosque, a Kirkuk police official said. Iran fires back

Saturday's violence comes a day after a national security official confirmed that President Bush had authorized the U.S. military to capture or kill Iranian agents in Iraq who are plotting attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces.

Although the Iranian mission to the U.N. had no official comment on the policy, an article by the Islamic republic's semi-official FARS news agency quoted a top Iranian official as saying that the U.S. policy constituted "terrorist measures"

"Such a measure illustrates the failure of the United States' new strategy in Iraq because it has had no effect in quelling unrests and restoring calm and order and has instead roused intensified reactions in Iraq," said Alaoddin Boroujerdi, chairman of the Iranian Parliament's national policy commission, according to FARS.

"Such moves are deemed as terrorist measures and are in blatant contradiction to the international rules and regulations," Boroujerdi is quoted as saying.

The Iraqi government will have to share responsibility for the "illogical and incredible" policy if the reports are true, Boroujerdi said, according to FARS.

An Iranian official at the United Nations, who did not wish to be identified, said the policy will help neither Americans nor Iraqis. The Iranians, he said, are in Iraq to help.

This month, U.S. forces detained five Iranians in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil, a U.S. military officer said.

A preliminary investigation found links between the detainees and the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, which has provided funds, weapons, bomb technology and training to extremist groups in Iraq, the coalition said.Bush defends policy, asserts it's confined to Iraq

Bush reportedly approved the plan in the last couple months in an effort to be tougher with the Islamic republic.

"Some are trying to say that because we're helping ourselves in Iraq by stopping outside influence from killing our soldiers or hurting Iraqi people that we want to expand this beyond the borders," Bush said.

"That's a presumption that's simply not accurate. We believe that we can solve our problems with Iran diplomatically. And we're working to do that. As a matter of fact, we're making pretty good progress on that front," he said.

The White House has rejected calls by the Iraq Study Group to diplomatically engage Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. The Bush administration says it will not meet with Iranian officials until the nation moves to end its alleged nuclear weapons program.

Iran has repeatedly denied interfering within Iraq's borders, but Defense Secretary Robert Gates backed the president in Friday remarks, saying the policy is aimed at outside forces who mean harm to U.S. and coalition forces.

"Our forces are authorized to go after those who are trying to kill them," Gates said. "If you're in Iraq and trying to kill our troops, you should consider yourself a target."

Asked whether the measure is part of an "anti-Iran strategy," Gates said he does not think so, but "we're not simply going to stand by and let people bring sophisticated IEDs [handmade bombs, or "improvised explosive devices"] into the country that can disable an Abrams tank and give them a free pass. But as we've said before, we think we can handle this inside the borders of Iraq and the operations are limited to inside the borders of Iraq."

Leaders of Iraq's Shiite Muslim community have strong ties to Iran, including powerful Iraqi cleric Abdel-Aziz al-Hakim.

Al-Hakim leads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the Iraqi party most closely associated with Iran.

As violence between Shiites and Sunnis rises, along with insurgent attacks on U.S. and Iraq forces, Bush has ordered that 21,500 more U.S. troops go to Iraq.

Contractor Deaths In Iraq Nearing 800 (HC)

By David Ivanovich, Brett Clanton

Houston Chronicle, January 28, 2007

Laboring in a war with no discernible front line, more than 770 civilian contractors have died in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion began in March 2003.

Statistics kept by the Labor Department indicate fatalities among civilian contractors working for American firms escalated rapidly late last year, with at least 301 dying in Iraq in 2006 — including 124 in the final three months.

U.S. military deaths totaled 818 during the year, the Defense Department has reported.

Despite the danger, job seekers continue to flood contractors' offices with résumés.

Some 165,000 prospective employees contacted Houston-based Halliburton Co.'s KBR last year about job opportunities in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan, company officials said. KBR now has half a million résumés on file.

And the recent troop "surge" announced by President Bush has prompted KBR to increase its hiring, company Chief Executive Officer Bill Utt said Friday.

Among the job seekers crowding into a recent KBR orientation program at Greenspoint Mall, many of the job seekers crowding into a recent KBR orientation program at Greenspoint Mall were fatalistic about the risks.

"When it comes your time, it comes your time," said Robert Hulion, 59, of Crestview, Fla., before being deployed to Iraq to work as a fumigation specialist.

"I've been through Vietnam, and I've been to New York City. But what I call dangerous is Mardi Gras in New Orleans," Hulion joked.

Hulion has joined what the Pentagon estimates to be 100,000 civilians working for U.S.-based contractors in Iraq.

Supplementing the 130,000 American troops serving in the country, these civilians provide a wide variety of functions, including serving up chow and interrogating prisoners.

The 100,000 figure is an estimate because, nearly four years into the war, the Pentagon is just now conducting its first survey to determine how many civilian contractors are working in Iraq.

And Pentagon officials, citing military regulations, don't track contractor deaths.

Contract worth billionsHalliburton's KBR is the largest military contractor operating in Iraq, with more than 50,000 employees and subcontractors working there, as well as in Kuwait and Afghanistan.

Working under a multibillion-dollar contract with the Army, KBR crews drive trucks, wash clothes, deliver mail and provide a host of other support services for U.S. troops.

KBR's workers are a critical component of the Pentagon's privatization strategy, enabling the military to reduce the number of troops needed in the country by turning over noncombat functions to civilians.

The idea behind the privatization plan was to keep these noncombatants away from the fighting. But that has proved impossible in violence-riddled Iraq.

"The whole place is a front line," said Peter Singer, a senior fellow at the Washington-based Brookings Institution and author of Corporate Warriors: The Rise of the Privatized Military Industry.

The contractor death toll rose last week when five Americans working for Blackwater USA were killed in Baghdad after their helicopter was shot down by insurgents. The contractors were rushing to help a U.S. Embassy convoy that had come under attack.

Civilian contractors killed in Iraq are often eligible — and many have received — the defense secretary's Medal for the Defense of Freedom, the so-called Purple Heart for civilians working on behalf of the military.

But their names are left off the Pentagon's Iraq casualty rolls.

If they were counted, the U.S. military's official casualty figures — 3,063 as of Friday — would be 25 percent higher.

"Since Day 1, the administration has been very, very comfortable artificially deflating the human cost of our effort in Iraq," said Steven Schooner, co-director of the government-procurement law program at George Washington University Law School.

The Pentagon's failure to report contractor deaths angers some family members whose loved ones died working in Iraq.

"There are so many of them who have been killed, and they're not acknowledged," noted Hollie Hulett, whose husband, Stephen, a truck driver, was killed when his convoy was ambushed in April 2004. "They're swept under the rug."

Tracking casualtiesThe 770 tally — representing fatalities (including deaths by natural causes) between March 2003 and Dec. 31, 2006 — was tabulated by the Labor Department's Division of Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation.

Last year's contractor fatalities represent 39 percent of the deaths reported by the Labor Department.

Besides those killed, another 7,761 civilian contractors had been injured in Iraq as of Dec. 31, the Labor Department said.

The Labor Department has these numbers because it tracks workers' compensation claims by injured workers or families of slain contractors under the federal Defense Base Act.

"Using employee time lost is a kind of a weird way to track casualties," Singer noted. "But it's part of the bizarre nature of this industry and the way it's been used in Iraq."

Still, the Labor Department figures don't tell the full story.

KBR, for instance, says 95 of its employees and subcontractors have been killed in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan. Company officials declined to say exactly how many have died in Iraq alone.

The Labor Department provided the Houston Chronicle a breakdown of fatalities and injuries by contractor, through the end of December, but this list does not identify any deaths as KBR fatalities.

The database has many — often intentional — holes. The Labor Department, for instance, won't specify an employer if that contractor has fewer than seven cases in a particular category, a department spokesman said via e-mail.

Contractor injuriesAside from the deaths, KBR officials say 430 workers and subcontractors had been injured because of hostile action in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan.

In terms of fatalities, however, KBR reported a decline in 2006. The company and its subcontractors suffered 17 fatalities last year, compared with 41 in 2004.

KBR officials would not discuss why their fatalities dropped last year.

"To avoid jeopardizing the safety and security of our employees and subcontractors, we will not detail the specific measures that are currently in place," company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said.

The Labor Department records indicate L-3 Services Group, which provides translators and interpreters for the Army, had suffered the worst casualties in Iraq: 241 workers killed by the end of 2006, including 32 in the last three months of the year.

The actual number of L-3 Services Group fatalities in Iraq, noted Rick Kiernan, the company's vice president for strategic communications, was 255 as of Dec. 31 and 261 as of Friday.

Many of those victims were Iraqis, known to be working with Americans and then assassinated while off duty, Kiernan said.

The spate of contractor deaths suffered by L-3 Services during the fourth quarter, Kiernan said, could reflect the timing of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, when many of the workers returned home for the holiday.

The U.S. arm of Britain's ArmorGroup International, a private security firm, has seen 22 workers die in Iraq, the Labor records show.

Company spokesman Patrick Toyne Sewell declined to confirm those figures, noting: "'If you focus on the numbers, you start to consider people as numbers, rather than as much-missed friends or colleagues."

DOJ_NMG_0123477

"We aim to prevent any (casualties) at all," Toyne Sewell said.

In their discussions about Iraq, military experts had been assuming contractor casualties would account for, perhaps, 10 percent of the total U.S.-related fatalities.

If the Labor Department figures are correct, contractors accounted for 27 percent of all U.S.-related fatalities last year.

"The question is: Is this better data, or is the rate going up at a frightening pace?" Schooner said.

Of the 770 victims, only 144 have been certified as having died as a direct result of enemy action, a Labor Department spokesman said.

Why that figure would be so low — fewer than one in five fatalities — is not completely clear. But L-3 Services' Kiernan noted that the assassinations of off-duty workers, for example, would not be counted as combat deaths.

How many of these civilian-contractor casualties were American citizens is unknown. Labor officials say they cannot provide a breakdown by nationality.

Splitting the contractDespite the new hiring, KBR's activity in Iraq has declined since a peak set back in 2004, although the company still performed $4.8 billion worth of work last year, including $1.2 billion in the fourth quarter, the company's figures show.

The Army has decided to split up KBR's huge logistics contract among three companies. But KBR still has plenty of work to do.

In fact, KBR has 1,000 positions to fill in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The applicants funnel through an old Montgomery Ward store at Greenspoint. KBR processes as many as 900 job applicants a week.

In 22 training sessions, instructors cover everything from the dangerous spiders workers might encounter in the Middle East to how to behave if kidnapped.

For Trish Anderson of West Palm Beach, Fla., a one-year tour with KBR represents a way to receive some financial freedom.

"I want to buy a few more pieces of property, and I have a daughter who's ... going to college," Anderson said.

Like many applicants, Anderson also sees a bigger mission — "to be able to give the gift of freedom."

This 38-year-old former Marine Corps staffer and a veteran of both the Persian Gulf War and the Iraq war says she is not going into this blindly.

"I know what the dangers and the stress and the risks are," she said. "Honestly, I don't think it's getting worse. I think it's getting better."

Still, all the uncertainty about the actual level of danger and fatalities appalls critics.

"Should we have to estimate this matter, or should we know it as fact?" asked T. Scott Allen, a Houston attorney representing the Hulett family as well as other families of slain KBR workers and injured employees in a lawsuit against the company.

Rep. Jan Schakowsky, D-Ill., has introduced legislation that would force the administration to report to Congress about civilian casualties.

"I think people have lost patience with this war without calculating in the other 770 people who have died.

"Imagine," Schakowsky said, what the public reaction would be if the reported casualty figures "were now closer to 4,000 people who have died?"

A Conversation Wtih Adel Abdul Mahdi (WP)

By Lally Weymouth

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

As the Bush administration moved ahead last week with plans to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, Washington Post-Newsweek's Lally Weymouth sat down with Iraq's Shiite vice president, Adel Abdul Mahdi, at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland

Many in the United States wonder if the situation in Iraq can be brought under control. Your own prime minister was not supportive in the past of President Bush's sending more troops.

What do you think of the president's plan to send additional troops? What are the chances this will work and what will your government do to help?

We both think, Americans and Iraqis, that Baghdad is a key issue. We have to succeed on that.

But will Bush's "surge" make a difference?

As Iraqis, we think we need more troops in Baghdad. It's up to the multinational forces to decide whether they need more troops.

DOJ_NMG_0123478

You talk about multinational forces. But the U.S. administration is sending additional American troops. No one else is volunteering for the job. Are you for that or against it?

I am saying we need more troops in Iraq. Multinational forces are part [of that].

But you have to be for or against the United States sending an additional 20,000 men.

I am not a military man. I can't say if they need to deploy more troops in Baghdad.

You're saying if "they" want to. You mean if the United States wants to send more? That sounds like you don't really care.

I care, but it's a technical question. It's a military question.

But it's not a military question. Americans are going to die. Is it worth the sacrifice?

I can [only] measure things seeing them as Iraqis [see them].

[The Americans] are there to succeed, not because they wish to be there. They came with plans, agendas and policies. If they want to succeed, we need more troops.

What are the chances of success with additional troops?

We are optimistic about succeeding. To give you some of the features of the new plan: Baghdad will be isolated and the entrances and exits will be controlled. There will be only 28 checkpoints. Baghdad will be encircled either by barriers or the river. Iraqis now will take the lead while Americans will support us.

Doesn't success depend on your government standing up to the Shiite militias that support it?

We are not facing only militias. We are also facing al-Qaeda and insurgents.

Do you believe the government is capable of stopping the Shiite atrocities?

I think they can do the job if Prime Minister [Nouri al-]Maliki takes the practical measures he is announcing.

It's rumored that you're the favorite of the U.S. government [to replace Maliki].

I think al-Maliki can still do it and he should have his chance.

[Shiite cleric Moqtada] al-Sadr, of course, supports the Iraqi government. What happens if U.S. forces go after him?

We are going to impose laws. If you are going to break the law, this will not be acceptable.

If the United States doesn't have the right to use our military the way we want to and we're operating under the sovereignty of your government, what good are additional U.S. troops?

This is one of the good understandings between us and the Americans. We are very fair on the security issue whether it concerns militias or insurgents. But we are very open in the political process. We want to bring more Shiites on board, more Sunnis on board. I have been asked to be responsible for the political issues within this security plan.

Do you think restoring security in Iraq is doable?

I was in the United States in 2003 and 2004. People were so optimistic at that time, whether Iraqis or Americans. We couldn't tell them that there was a mess in Iraq. We were telling them to be more practical.

Now people are so pessimistic and you can't tell them that this country has a chance.

All Americans see on TV screens are Sunnis slaughtering Shiites and ethnic cleansing in the streets.

Unfortunately this is true. But this is only one part of the picture. Only 12 months ago, we had elections and 12 million people voted, Sunnis and Shiites.

What can you show in the next couple of months that will inspire confidence?

If we can succeed in Baghdad, then we can give hope, not only to Americans but also to Iraqis. If we can improve services in Baghdad, then journalists will see that, and we'll have a new image.

Do you believe you can really work with the Sunnis?

Of course, yes. Now in the parliament, you can see Sunnis and Shiites. You never saw that before in a country like Iraq.

But there is ethnic cleansing going on in Baghdad.

Absolutely.

How long do you think it would take to restore order in Baghdad?

It depends on many factors. I'm not a magician. I think we need time. Violence will continue in Iraq.

For how long?

I can't tell, to be honest with you. It depends on many things. What we are saying is that to feel successful in Iraq we have to see some shift in the behavior of people. People have to start to depend for their safety on governmental forces, not on militias or other groups.

Is it the government's policy that it will help the people who have been cleansed from their neighborhoods to return to those neighborhoods?

Yes, of course. And this time, when clearing a neighborhood of any kind of violence, then there will be a [police or military] unit stationed there to help people return and to maintain the security situation.

You have a law in Iraq that no one will carry a weapon?

DOJ_NMG_0123479

That's right.

Are you going to use that law to have door-to-door searches to disarm the militias?

Of course, we are doing that and there are some achievements.

[Former national security adviser] Brent Scowcroft, who originally opposed the war, said recently that the United States cannot leave, but we cannot remain in the middle of a civil war. What role do you think America should play?

First, I don't think we are in a civil war. We are in a war on civilians. That's what [Abu Musab] al-Zarqawi was trying to do, that's what the insurgents are trying to do. Otherwise, what is the meaning of a car bomb in a university or a market? You are against a society, against civilians. Or, when Sunni militias attack, some Shiite militias attack [in retaliation]. They are not attacking as one [army] against the other, but are attacking civilians from the other community. That's why I say that we are in a war against civilians, not a civil war.

Secondly, the government is still powerful, still feared by the population. Whenever it issues a curfew, it is respected all over Iraq. No country in a civil war respects the decision of a government. We have to go and decrease the sectarian violence, we have to go and protect people from car bombs and from insurgent acts that target civilians and institutions.

Do you believe that President Bush will stay in Iraq or that U.S. troops will leave?

We have to gain the confidence of the American people and the administration.

Do you worry that the United States will withdraw?

Of course we worry. We will be worried whether you stay or leave.

What do you prefer?

We are not going to decide for America. They will decide for themselves. Others bear the responsibility of where we are. We were not consulted about the war decision, we were not consulted about the invasion of Kuwait, we were not consulted about the war between Iran and Iraq, but we have to bear the consequences of all this.

I think America has only two alternatives: to stay or to leave. If they stay, they should stay in a helpful way. I don't think they will take orders from us but we have always advocated the idea of demarcation between our authorities and those of the United States.

Pentagon Seeks New Ways To Recruit (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The war in Iraq marks the first time in modern history that the United States has fought an extended conflict with an all-volunteer military.

The strain of fighting nearly four years in a two-front war has put unprecedented stress on the Army and the Marine Corps — which have borne the brunt of the fighting — and has raised serious questions about whether an all-volunteer force can be maintained over the long term.

Even if U.S. troops were to pull out of Iraq tomorrow, the United States faces a war of unknown duration against al-Qaida in Afghanistan and elsewhere. Other threats include Iran and North Korea.

The Iraq Study Group warned in its report last month that the war in Iraq has put the country in a bind.

"An extraordinary amount of sacrifice has been asked of our men and women in uniform, and of their families," the group wrote. "The American military has little reserve force to call on if it needs ground forces to respond to other crises around the world."

"I think America is on a collision course with itself because America has worldwide obligations," said Frank Schaeffer, co-author of "AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes From Military Service — and How It Hurts Our Country."

"All it's going to take is one more conflict or one more world crisis," Schaeffer said, "and we would be very soon facing the fact that no matter what our position on these issues is, we're going to be facing a simple choice of act or don't act. And if we do, then we're going to have to have alternatives."

At least one lawmaker has proposed a radical alternative. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., wants to reinstate the draft.

His proposal would require all U.S. residents ages 18 to 42 to perform two years of national service, either in the military or as civilians working in ports, hospitals or some other public-service role. The only people exempted would be high school students up to age 20, conscientious objectors and those who are too unhealthy to serve.

Rangel, an Army veteran who won a Bronze Star in the Korean War, opposes the Iraq war and has put forth a draft bill every year since 2002. Critics accuse him of political grandstanding.

Some fellow lawmakers find his basic argument compelling. If the war in Iraq is the national security threat that the Bush administration says it is, shouldn't all Americans be asked to shoulder their part of the burden to defend the country? "The answer to that question will be as varied as the people you ask," said Rep. Sanford D. Bishop Jr., D-Ga. "I think it's a legitimate question to ask. I don't personally believe the country is ready for a draft. But I believe that if they felt a serious enough threat, all able-bodied Americans would probably want to support our national security in whatever ways they could."

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney define the war in Iraq as the central battleground in the global war on terrorism.

"This is an existential conflict," Cheney said Jan. 14 in an interview on the Fox News Channel. "It's the kind of conflict that's going to drive our policy and our government for the next 20 or 30 or 40 years."

Bush often lauds the military for its service, but critics point out that he's never called on anyone to serve.

Asked recently why he's never asked Americans to make sacrifices for the war, the president said people sacrificed in other ways.

"I think a lot of people are in this fight," Bush said in an interview Jan. 16 with PBS news anchor Jim Lehrer. "I mean, they sacrifice peace of mind when they see the terrible images of violence on TV every night."

President Bush said he'd considered a draft but rejected it. "I think the volunteer Army is working, and we've got to keep it strong," he said.

Charles Moskos, a military sociologist at Northwestern University and a longtime advocate of the draft, said statements such as these exemplified what he called "patriotism-lite."

"It reflects badly not only on the national leadership, it also reflects badly on the American people," said Moskos, himself a former draftee. "They're not calling for the draft, either — you know, put my son in — but that's where it's got to start."

The United States hasn't had a military draft since 1973, when Congress eliminated conscription as the Vietnam War drew to a close. Five years earlier, Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman, a champion of free markets, had labeled the draft "inconsistent with a free society."

For most of its history, the United States has been without a draft. The North and the South conscripted forces during the Civil War. There was a draft during World War I and again in World War II. The last draft lasted from 1948 to 1973.

Many military officers, lawmakers and analysts oppose bringing back conscription, saying it would ruin the professionalism and quality that the all-volunteer force has built up over the last 34 years.

"The nature of decentralized tactics today demands a level of professional experience and competence far above what it was 30 and 40 years ago," said Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., a former Army officer and West Point graduate who serves on the House Armed Services Committee.

Davis, who wrote an opinion piece last month that ripped Rangel's proposal to revive the draft, said a return to mandatory service would add unnecessary costs to national defense and would "reduce the productivity of military organizations in general."

"Think about the burden on the unit of somebody who's not motivated or highly disciplined or isn't concerned about the motivation of their peer group; they're going to be a less effective individual," he said.

Davis said he thought that the Army could easily recruit to the level that the Bush administration wanted "with the right kind of expansion plan."

"It's very doable, because we're not talking about an increase of the size of the Reagan-era military," he said.

The Army had 732,000 active-duty soldiers during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, which occurred three years after President Reagan left office. The Army now has about 512,000 active-duty soldiers.

Rep. Jim Marshall, D-Ga., who also serves on the Armed Services Committee, said he generally liked the idea "of a year or two of service for all young Americans. But I don't think we need a draft right now."

"I do think that an all-volunteer service is preferable, and military commanders think the same thing," said Marshall, who served as an Army Ranger in Vietnam.

"The question is if the country is willing to pay for it," he said. "If the country is willing to pay for it, then we can enlist more soldiers."

The Bush administration recognizes that there's a problem and has promised to add 92,000 service members to the Army and the Marine Corps over the next five years.

But that means Army recruiters will have to sign up another 7,000 men and women every year, when they're already struggling and standards have been dropped to meet the current quotas.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, has suggested that part of the answer is increasing the incentives to enlist. The Army already offers as much as $40,000 to recruits, however, and personnel costs are taking a larger chunk of the defense budget every year.

In the meantime, Defense Secretary Robert Gates has outlined plans to call up the National Guard and Reserves more frequently. But the more the military relies on its citizen-soldiers to fight the war, the less attractive the Reserves become to those who don't want full-time military careers.

There are concerns that overusing the Guard and Reserves could strain those forces as badly as the active-duty ranks.

DOJ_NMG_0123481

"This is clearly not a risk-free set of solutions," said Christine E. Wormuth, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a national-security research center, and a former Pentagon official who's written extensively about the National Guard and Reserves.

The Pentagon estimates that it would cost about $4 billion more a year to reinstate the draft. New facilities would have to be built to train and house the large numbers of inductees who'd be brought into uniform each year.

The Census Bureau estimates that there are 30 million people ages 18 to 25 in the United States.

About 4 million men and women reach military age each year, but the military needs only a small fraction of that number. That's a fact that those who argue for a return to the draft tend to overlook, said Bernard D. Rostker, the author of "I Want You: The Evolution of the All-Volunteer Force."

"The fundamental question — which dogged us in the '60s and would dog us again if we return to conscription — is who serves when not all serve?" said Rostker, who's studied military personnel issues for more than three decades and served as a top Pentagon official in the Clinton administration.

Draft proponents say that those whom the military doesn't need could work in homeland security guarding airports, seaports and borders or could work in understaffed hospitals or schools.

The Gates Commission, which President Nixon created in 1969 to look at ways of ending compulsory service, considered a "standby draft" to be an integral part of an all-volunteer force, Rostker said.

At least one commissioner was convinced that while an all-volunteer military might be possible to maintain during peacetime, the draft would have to be reinstated during a major conflict, Rostker said.

So far, the war in Iraq has defied those expectations.

"We're three years into a war right now, and the all-volunteer force is doing remarkably well," Rostker said.

But whether that's sustainable over the long term in the war on terrorism is an open question.

Gates Aims To Lessen Forced Extensions (BSH/AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

Biloxi Sun Herald/AP, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - In an action branded a backdoor draft by some critics, the military over the past several years has held tens of thousand of soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines on the job and in war zones beyond their retirement dates or enlistment length. It is a widely disliked practice that the Pentagon, under new Defense Secretary Robert Gates, is trying to figure out how to cut back on.

Gates has ordered that the practice - known as "stop loss" - must "be minimized." At the same time, he is looking for ways to decrease the hardship for troops and their families, recruit more people for a larger military and reassess how the active duty and reserves are used.

"It's long overdue," said Jules Lobel, vice president of the Center for Constitutional Rights and lawyer for some in the military who have challenged the policy in court. "It has created terrible problems of morale."

Gates has asked the chief of each service branch for a plan by the end of February on how they would rely less on stop loss.

The authority has been used off and on for years and was revived by all services to some extent after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

As an example, the Army revived it in early 2002 to keep people with some skills or specialties deemed critical to the fight against terrorism and later used it to retain whole units, according to an Army chronology of the policy.

Pentagon officials provided no figures on how many people the policy has affected. Yet just in the Army, it is in the tens of thousands.

The Navy stopped a few hundred sailors from leaving in the year after the terrorist attacks and used the policy again after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

The Marine Corps used it from January through August of 2003 and at the high point had some 3,400 active duty troops and 440 reservists held in service under the authority, said 1st Lt. Blanca E. Binstock, a spokeswoman.

The Air Force did not have statistics immediately available.

The Defense Department says the main reason for the policy is to keep units whole for deployments.

Iraqi Soldiers Still Rely Heavily On U.S. (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

DOJ_NMG_0123482

TURKI, IRAQ — As dawn broke, a thick mist enveloped the lines of military trucks poised to sweep through a tract of rich farmland where Sunni Arab insurgents had turned miles of irrigation canals into trenches with holes to stash weapons, food and blankets.

A chilly downpour turned narrow dirt roads into sheets of slippery mud that sent vehicles skidding into ditches.

For the U.S. Army, the weather was a temporary setback. Officers said it actually worked to their advantage because it left the enemy surrounded and exposed to the wet, wind and cold.

But for their Iraqi allies in an ambitious effort to reclaim an insurgent haven in eastern Diyala province, the weather could have spelled the end of the offensive. When U.S. Humvees, Bradley fighting vehicles and tanks pushed ahead two days later, they had to tow the Iraqis to the fight. Their flimsy pickup trucks and minivans had become hopelessly stuck.

As the campaign continued into a second week, U.S. forces flew in everything the Iraqis needed to keep going: ammunition, rice, T-shirts, dry socks and cigarettes.

A long way to go

As pressure mounts here and at home for U.S. troops to start leaving, the assault in Diyala province this month showed how far the Iraqis must go before they can stand on their own.

U.S. troops with the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, said the Iraqis had made great strides since they were deployed to the province four months ago. But asked whether the operation would have been possible without the United States, Iraqi Capt. Kader Abdul Kareem Majid shook his head.

"The coalition forces have airplanes, tanks, all the equipment they need. But the Iraqi army does not have that," said Majid, a 10-year veteran of a Kurdish militia that fought Saddam Hussein's army. "We need U.S. support."

The offensive began Jan. 4 with a combined ground and air assault on a remote rural area the size of Baghdad. About 600 U.S. troops joined forces with about 400 soldiers with Iraq's 1st Brigade, 5th Army Division.

Insurgents in the targeted area are thought to be providing support for attacks in Baghdad, Baqubah and other strife-torn cities. Al Qaeda in Iraq last year declared an Islamic caliphate in Diyala, and its leader, Abu Musab Zarqawi, was killed in a U.S. airstrike here in June.

Back then, Iraqi soldiers refused to venture into the region around Turki, stronghold of a tribe that had supplied top officers to Hussein and later forged ties with Al Qaeda and other militant groups. Iraqi soldiers referred to a checkpoint on the northern edge of the region, which drew regular mortar fire, as the "posting of death."

"They are all dangerous here," said recruit Ali Mohammed, a Shiite teenager from western Diyala. "Only the men wearing the same uniform as me are my brothers in this land."

But with the might of the U.S. Army behind them, morale was much higher during this month's offensive. Iraqi soldiers clapped their hands and sang as they rolled out of their base.

The U.S. soldiers said they had to hold the Iraqis back as they conducted a slow and meticulous search of every home, seeking to collect evidence on insurgent activities.

"These guys are not organized, but they are aggressive as hell," said Capt. Andy Hercik, as he prepared a dozen Iraqi soldiers to search a wind-swept village eerily devoid of men. "When we went into the village yesterday, they swarmed the place."

"Like Normandy?" said a laughing Capt. Stephen Dobbins, his troop commander in the 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry Regiment, 82nd Airborne Division.

"More like cockroaches when you turn the light on," Hercik replied ruefully.

As the two sides searched mud huts and pillared homesteads, the Iraqis proved adept at spotting an out-of-place carpet concealing a hoard of guns or a bomb tucked among the reeds.

It was also Iraqis who recognized three brothers identified as key members of a group known as the Council, which oversaw insurgent activities in the region, just as U.S. forces were about to walk away from their mechanical repair shop in Turki.

Dobbins was delighted when he saw Iraqi soldiers squatting in a waterlogged field outside another village to provide cover as others pushed in.

"This is awesome. They are moving tactically, pulling security," he said. "This is a great step forward for these guys."

Details kept secret

But there also was friction. Fearful that information would leak to the insurgents, U.S. commanders kept details of the operation from all but the most senior Iraqi officers until hours before it began. Even so, one detainee later said he had been tipped off by an Iraqi officer.

Iraqi commanders said the tight security prevented them from preparing properly.

"I didn't have time to organize supplies, vehicles or ammunition for the soldiers," said Majid, a company commander.

DOJ_NMG_0123483

Although Iraqi officers emphasized their support for the U.S. forces' methodical approach to clearing villages, many of their men grew impatient. They repeatedly asked in broken English, "When we kill Wahhabis?," a reference to adherents of the fundamentalist form of Sunni Islam practiced by many Al Qaeda members.

U.S. soldiers assured them they would get their chance. But because of the yawning technological gap between them, it was the Americans who did most of the killing.

U.S. troops used advanced optics and aerial surveillance to spot small groups of gunmen and then called in thundering artillery and airstrikes. More than 100 were believed killed, in most cases before they had fired a shot.

"Look at our equipment. It is not like the Americans'," said Mohammed Habeeb, a Shiite soldier from the southern city of Basra, holding a battered machine gun with no sight. "Most of the insurgents would rather go after the Americans, but they are scared of them. So who do they go after? The ordinary Iraqi soldier."

Majid said he was forced to rely on U.S. aircraft to ferry in supplies and evacuate the wounded. Most of his vehicles had no armor plating or covers to shield his men from the elements. And his radios did not have the range to communicate with his headquarters.

After a rain-soaked night spent huddled beneath their vehicles, many of the Iraqi soldiers clamored to return to the rear for a hot meal — with bloody consequences.

An antitank mine ripped through the Iraqi convoy, killing a soldier and injuring three. They were among at least eight Iraqis killed and 29 injured during the operation. Antitank mines also injured more than a dozen U.S. soldiers, but because their vehicles were better protected, most of their injuries were less serious.

The United States has supplied the Iraqi 5th Army Division with 181 of a promised 211 armor-plated Humvees, U.S. officials said. But many were deployed elsewhere, and at least 45 already had been destroyed by roadside bombs or were awaiting repairs, they said.

U.S. officials are reluctant to provide more sophisticated equipment until they are confident the Iraqis can maintain and keep track of it.

Much of the training in coming months will focus on building logistics systems, they said.

"A lot of the Iraqi soldiers have the will and want to fight," said Lt. Col. Michael Beaudette, executive officer for five teams of U.S. trainers embedded with the 5th Division. "But in order for them to succeed, they need to be supplied and maintained."

Corruption is also a problem, he said. Some commanders inflate the numbers in their units so they can pick up the extra salaries, then wonder why they get asked to do missions they can't handle, he said. It also can take months for a promotion to be reflected in a soldier's pay.

"If you don't take care of your soldiers, they are going to walk," he said. "Because in Iraq, the soldiers are not held under any law to stay."

Suspicious Sunnis

The region's residents, most of them Sunnis, were suspicious of the mostly Shiite Arab and Kurdish soldiers, accusing them of shakedowns and arbitrary arrests when not accompanied by U.S. forces.

"We hear that sometimes they take the men, and they don't come back," said a worried Hanna Gatan. A gaunt woman wrapped in a green veil, she sat on a mat with her husband's second wife and their six squirming children while the soldiers searched their home. She said their husband was away herding sheep.

"What if they take him?" she asked. "He is the only man we have. Can you imagine a family without a man? Who will be responsible?"

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers detained about 50 suspects and seized dozens of weapons caches in the area, then set up a new base to maintain a presence. There are plans to improve water and electricity distribution, fix roads and open schools to undercut support for the insurgency.

It remains to be seen whether the Iraqis can hold the area after the Americans leave. But they said they already had achieved one important victory.

"The government did not control this place before," Majid said. "Now, the people understand that the government can go anyplace it wants."

Iraq Cultivates Ties To Democrats (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

BAGHDAD — Representatives of Iraq's government are hedging their bets on America's political future, hoping to keep U.S. support for their country strong by building ties with a Democratic Party that now controls Congress and is closely scrutinizing President Bush's Iraq policy.

DOJ_NMG_0123484

"There's a decision to be in contact, find out what they want, what their concerns are and to tell them of our concerns as well," said Ali Adeeb, a Shiite lawmaker and close associate of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Republicans have dominated Iraq policy since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Many of the first U.S. officials in Iraq were handpicked party activists.

In one sense, the Nov. 7 election that handed Democrats control of Congress changed little, even though it was largely viewed as a repudiation of the White House's Iraq policy. The State and Defense departments are still the primary instruments of policy in Iraq.

A top government official close to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who ended a brief visit to Iraq on Saturday, said the Bush administration remains the final arbiter of decisions on how much continued U.S. military and financial support the Iraqis receive.

But the election that changed the political dynamic in Washington also altered the rules of the game here. Iraqi leaders studied and discussed the possibility of a Democratic takeover for months before the vote. They concluded early that even the most staunchly antiwar Democrats would not abandon Iraq. In heated discussions, lawmakers reminded one another that it was Democratic President Clinton who signed the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act, which funded the opposition movements now in power.

The Shiite Muslim leadership has informally recommended to ministerial and parliamentary delegations heading to Washington that they cultivate closer relationships with Democrats as well as Republicans.

"They have to see people from both sides, because they are both taking part in the administration of the country," Adeeb said. "Whoever is a decision-maker in America, we have to have relations with."

Many pointed out advantages to the Democrats' increased sway over Iraq policy. Government officials said they had generally found the Democratic position on handing over security to Iraqi forces sooner rather than later closer to theirs. Almost all agree on Democratic Party initiatives, squashed when Republicans controlled Congress, to prevent the building of permanent U.S. bases here. They note news reports of Democrats acknowledging the suffering of the Iraqi population.

"I see that the Democratic ideas are more related to reality," said Ammar Tuma, a lawmaker who serves in Maliki's ruling Shiite coalition. "They talk about the real problems that the Iraqis are facing every day."

To date, government officials said, they've also found Democratic visitors such as Pelosi, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois less parochial, more culturally sensitive and more willing to listen to Iraqi concerns than Republicans.

"Before, Bush used to order Iraqi officials to do this and that," said one member of Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "The Republicans were dictating the political process in Iraq. With the Democrats in control of Congress, the Republicans are now less influential than before. It helps us in a sense to breathe a bit more and to have more freedom."

Many of the Shiites around Maliki still harbor bitterness about the Bush administration's push to remove then-interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari from his post last year. They considered the pressure inappropriate interference in Iraq's domestic affairs. They were also angered by recent remarks by Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice questioning whether Maliki was up to the job of leading Iraq.

The Republican Party's election drubbing not only elevated Democrats, but also emboldened Maliki, who has begun criticizing the American president almost as much as Bush's deputies criticized him.

"I understand and realize that inside the American administration there is some kind of a crisis situation, especially after the results of the last election," he told reporters this month.

"It's more balanced now," said the Dawa Party member who asked not to be named. "What we're seeing is Mr. Maliki criticizing Bush. You didn't have that before."

After weeks of icy relations and criticism, including a televised interview in which Bush faulted Maliki for the way the execution of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein was handled, the two men spoke Saturday by phone. It was the first time they had talked since Bush outlined his new Iraq policy. It was also the day Pelosi and a delegation of lawmakers wrapped up meetings with Iraqi officials.

"Now it's different because [the Democrats] have some decision-making power," said Farooq Abdullah, a Maliki advisor. "Before, we were meeting mostly with the Republicans because they were the ones in power. Now we're meeting with both of them."

Army Probes War Contractor Fraud (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0123485

WASHINGTON (AP) — From high-dollar fraud to conspiracy to bribery and bid rigging, Army investigators have opened up to 50 criminal probes involving battlefield contractors in the war in Iraq and the U.S. fight against terrorism, the Associated Press has learned.

Senior contracting officials, government employees, residents of other countries and, in some cases, U.S. military personnel have been implicated in millions of dollars of fraud allegations.

"All of these involve operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait," Chris Grey, a spokesman for the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command, confirmed Saturday to the AP.

"CID agents will pursue leads and the truth wherever it may take us," Grey said. "We take this very seriously."

Battlefield contractors have been implicated in allegations of fraud and abuse since the war in Iraq began in spring 2003. A special inspector general office that focused solely on reconstruction spending in Iraq developed cases that led to four criminal convictions.

The problems stem in part from the Pentagon's struggle to get a handle on the unprecedented number of contractors now helping run the nation's wars. Contractors are used in battle zones to do nearly everything but fight. They run cafeterias and laundries for troops, move supplies, run communication systems and repair weapons systems.

Special agents from the Army's major procurement fraud unit recently were dispatched to Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait, where they are "working closely and sharing information with other law enforcement agencies in the region," Grey said.

"Given the billions of dollars in contract dollars that have been and are being spent, it is our experience that our agents will detect millions of dollars in fraud before we are done," Grey said. "And just as likely, we will be instrumental in bringing back to the U.S. government millions of dollars in recoveries."

One case involves an Army chief warrant officer accused of taking a $50,000 bribe to steer a contract for paper products and plastic flatware away from a government contractor and to a Kuwaiti company, according to an indictment unsealed Thursday in federal court at Rock Island, Ill.

Prosecutors say the officer took the bribe while at Camp Arifjan in Kuwait, while he was the Army's food service adviser for Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait, according to the indictment. The officer is also accused of trying to smuggle $40,000 in undeclared cash into the United States on a December 2005 flight from Kuwait to Dover, Del.

Other cases involve a government officer manipulating a contract in exchange for large bribes, a contractor making false claims against the government and an official accepting gratuities. The cases range in type, seriousness and complexity and involve contractors both inside and outside the United States.

The Pentagon has viewed outsourcing a wide variety of military tasks as much more efficient, leaving troops trained in combat to the business of war.

But the Government Accountability Office reported in December that the military has been losing millions of dollars because it cannot monitor industry workers in far-flung locations.

The Defense Department's inability to manage contractors effectively has hurt military operations and unit morale and cost the Pentagon money, the GAO said.

Some 60,000 contractors have been supporting the Army in Southwest Asia, which includes Iraq. That compares with 9,200 contractors in the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Commanders are often unsure how many contractors use their bases and require food, housing and protection, according to the report. One Army official said the service estimates losing about $43 million each year on free meals provided to contractors who also get a food allowance.

The new Democratic Congress plans to ramp up oversight of the billions of dollars being spent in Iraq, including dollars awarded to contractors. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has said he plans to target contractor abuse.

Vietnam Shades Warner's Iraq Stand (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

Virginia Sen. John W. Warner's words betray the guilt he still carries about the Vietnam War and help explain why this pillar of the Republican establishment is leading a bipartisan revolt against the war plans of a president in his own party.

"I regret that I was not more outspoken" during the Vietnam War, the former Navy secretary said in an interview in his Capitol Hill office. "The Army generals would come in, 'Just send in another five or ten thousand.' You know, month after month. Another ten or fifteen thousand. They thought they could win it. We kept surging in those years. It didn't work."

Is that a lesson for what's going on in Iraq?

"Well, you don't forget something like that," he answers. There is a long pause, he closes his eyes and his voice gets softer. "No. You don't forget those things."

More than 30 years after Vietnam, Warner is once again watching as generals propose additional troops. But this time, he's not staying silent. In a rebuke to President Bush, Warner is leading an effort to have the U.S. Senate declare a lack of confidence in the administration's plans to send 21,500 additional soldiers into the Iraqi war zone.

White House officials were taken aback by the move, which is striking because of Warner's stature, both in the Republican Party and as one of the country's most ardent supporters of the military. But Warner, who once was married to Elizabeth Taylor, has an almost mythic popularity, which has made it impossible for Bush allies to demonize him on the issue.

The Senate will vote on his resolution as early as this week, along with a competing one drafted by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.). There is little doubt that a majority of senators will vote their disapproval of Bush's latest plans for Iraq, further isolating the president from the people who once supported the war -- people such as Warner.

Throughout a career that might be winding down -- the 80-year-old senator won't say whether he will run for a sixth term next year -- Warner has been a Republican icon and a fierce defender of the military. He voted to go to war in 2003, and from his perch as chairman of the Armed Services Committee until this year, he was a frequent defender of the president.

But to GOP loyalists, Warner is also a more-than-occasional irritant who seems willing to buck the party line with little regard for the political consequences to his Republican colleagues.

In 1994, he campaigned against his party's nominee to become the junior senator from Virginia, Oliver North. That prompted a primary challenge when he sought reelection two years later. In 2004, he endorsed higher taxes in Virginia and later held hearings on the abuses in the Abu Ghraib prison. In 2005, he battled Bush over Supreme Court justices and the use of torture in U.S. terrorist prison camps.

Now he's at it again, delivering a new affront to Bush and offering nothing but a shrug when asked if he worries about that.

"I gotta tell you, I've gotten to that wonderful age in life -- I don't worry," he said. "If you do what in your heart you feel is right, go to sleep. Don't worry. I go to sleep and I don't worry."His Biggest Sin

The thing that makes John Warner different from most mavericks is that it's never clear when the next affront will come.

He can go for weeks or months or even years as a revered member of the Republican family. A former Marine who led the Navy before his election to the Senate 28 years ago, Warner even looks the part of the courtly, white-haired GOP lawmaker from the South.

But every now and then, it seems, the urge strikes him.

"Obviously, when you're in the position of the White House or the party chairman, your job is much easier if everybody is just saying yes all the time," said Ed Gillespie, who as chairman of the National Republican Committee battled Warner on nominations to the Supreme Court.

It was Gillespie's job to shepherd the court nominees through Congress, a task made more difficult by Warner's alliance with 13 other moderate GOP senators. But Gillespie is a fan of Warner's nonetheless.

"John Warner understands full well that he is elected to the U.S. Senate, which is a separate and equal branch of government," said Gillespie, who has since become chairman of the Republican Party of Virginia.

Warner's biggest sin, in the eyes of conservative Republicans, was his opposition to North, who was seen as an unadulterated champion for the party's right wing. Warner called North "unfit" for office because of his role in the Iran-contra arms scandal.

Warner not only opposed North's candidacy, he recruited an independent challenger -- former Republican attorney general J. Marshall Coleman -- who helped give the race to then-incumbent Sen. Charles S. Robb (D). Infuriated, Virginia conservatives persuaded former president Ronald Reagan's budget director to challenge Warner in the 1996 Republican primary.

Warner won easily and in the process cemented what had been an evolving reputation as a moderate, independent politician.

"[We] live in a great state of people of common sense, of wisdom, and they are fair-minded," Warner said after defeating James C. Miller III in the primary.A Profound Impact

To anyone paying attention, it has been clear for months that Warner's support for the Iraq war has been wavering.

In October, just before the midterm elections, he returned home from a trip to Iraq and warned that the war effort was "drifting sideways." The comment was perfectly crafted for Warner: not too impertinent on its face but striking nonetheless.

Now he's gone further, sketching out his latest challenge to Bush during a late-night meeting last week with two colleagues in an ornate office at the back of the U.S. Senate chamber.

It is, he said, an attempt to send the same message offered by Hagel and Biden but without what he calls an overly harsh tone. Although it begins by respecting "the Constitutional authorities given a President," its bottom line is just as direct:

"The Senate disagrees with the plan to augment our forces by 21,500, and urges the President instead to consider all options and alternatives," the Warner resolution reads. He unveiled his draft a day before Bush's State of the Union speech.

"His support for a redeployment resolution -- and his opposition to the surge policy -- is very important," said U.S. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a longtime friend. "It's going to have a very profound impact on the debate."

Warner's resolution gives some of his Republican colleagues a politically safe position to take on a war that is increasingly unpopular with the American public. "When John Warner decides that these issues have seriousness . . . there are a number of people who come with him," said Warner's new Virginia colleague, Sen. James Webb (D).

But to conservatives, the effort is nothing but folly.

William Kristol, founder of the Weekly Standard, calls both resolutions "wrong, foolish and irresponsible."

Kristol is careful to say of Warner that "I think he's sincere." But he said the effect of the resolution passing will be to weaken Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who was confirmed Friday as the top U.S. commander in Iraq and will implement Bush's surge.

"John Warner can be a patriot and still do something foolish that hurts our foreign policy," Kristol said.Support for Soldiers Few criticisms aimed at Warner seem to have much effect on him these days.

But one has.

At an Armed Services hearing last week, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) prompted Petraeus to express concern about the passage of a Senate resolution.

"A resolution -- a Senate-passed resolution of disapproval for this new strategy in Iraq -- would give the enemy some encouragement, some feeling that, well, some clear expression that the American people are divided?" Lieberman asked.

"That's correct, sir," Petraeus replied.

When it was Warner's turn to speak, he was clearly upset. He called the exchange "personal" for him and said forcefully that support for the resolution should never be taken as a lack of support for soldiers in the field.

"We're not a division here of patriots who support the troops and those who are making statements and working on resolutions that could be translated as aiding and abetting the enemy," Warner told Petraeus and his colleagues. "I hope that this colloquy has not trapped you into some responses that you might later regret."

A few days later, in his office, Warner made it clear that he's unwilling to give in.

"Those who say we're not doing the right thing, tell me, what is the obligation of the Senate?" he asked. "Do nothing?"

How Iraq Affects D.C. Reputations (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

SEN. RICHARD G. LUGAR (R-Ind.) was once considered one of the Senate's foremost foreign policy experts, while Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) was, well, not. Now, if you believe the Beltway buzz, their reputations have been reversed. Even if that reversal were justified — and it isn't — it shows that the president isn't the only politician in Washington whose career has been hobbled by Iraq.

Until the Iraq war, Lugar was seen as an elder statesman whose sound foreign policy counsel changed presidential minds for the better. His greatest hits included persuading Ronald Reagan to dump corrupt Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos and outmaneuvering GOP cold warriors to pass the landmark Nunn-Lugar law, which paid the collapsing Soviet Union to safeguard its nuclear arsenal.

But like his friend, Colin L. Powell, Lugar found himself frozen out by the Bush administration even as he continued showing loyalty to his president — to the dismay of his liberal admirers. Lugar's erstwhile fans could not understand why the powerful Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman allowed himself to be rolled over by the Bush administration. Even after losing his chairmanship to Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Lugar hasn't challenged the White House on Iraq, offering only some mildly expressed concern about the surge strategy.

Although Lugar had previously enjoyed a reputation as one of the Senate's brightest, the courtly Warner has not radiated the same glow. As chairman of the powerful Senate Armed Services Committee, Warner was seen as the military's chief champion on Capitol Hill, stern in his defense of both military budgets and martial honor.

Because of Warner's long-reliable pro-military vote and support for Bush's foreign policy, it came as a shock to the body politic when the former Navy secretary returned from a trip to Iraq last October and declared bluntly that Congress would have to make "bold decisions" if the Iraqi government didn't shape up within three months. Warner's reversal made it kosher for Republicans to distance themselves from the president's war during the midterm elections. Three months later, the senator has introduced a resolution opposing Bush's troop escalation.

Warner may not win any lifetime achievement awards from foreign policy observers, but his defiance may go down as a tipping point in the war. Lugar's stellar reputation, on the other hand, only makes the fallout from his Hamlet-like indecision about Iraq worse. Fair? No. But that's war.

After The Fall (WP)

By Kirk W. Johnson

The Washington Post Magazine, January 28, 2007

ALL AMERICANS WORKING IN IRAQ, ARMED AND UNARMED, MILITARY AND CIVILIAN, DREAM ABOUT THEIR HOMECOMING -- about who will meet them at the airport, what they'll eat first, whether things will have changed much while they were gone. During my year with the U.S. Agency for International Development in Iraq -- first in Baghdad and later in Fallujah -- the send-offs to those finishing their Green Zone tours were a weekly ritual. Deep within our perimeter of blast walls, there would be a lot of backslapping and comparing of "Baghdad Donuts," the round computer graphics that ticked how many months, days, hours, seconds and milliseconds you had been in Iraq and how many you had left to go.

I had a plan for whenever I got back to the States: a month-long road trip with friends, from the Deep South to the Pacific Northwest. But when the time came, there was no send-off and no celebration at my return.

Instead, I was wheeled onto U.S. soil, pushed like luggage by a disgruntled employee through the bowels of New York's John F. Kennedy Airport. My face was awkwardly concealed with yellowed gauze and strips of medical tape. Adults stole quick glances and admonished their staring children.

I wasn't supposed to be going home. And I wasn't ready to go.

From my wheelchair, I watched a set of golf clubs circuit the baggage carousel -- anything to distract my mind from the gnawing confusion. I had left Iraq, on R&R, to join a family reunion in the Caribbean. But while I had made it to the beach, now I was here, in America, and I couldn't remember the few decisive events that had led to this. Nobody knew. Every few hours, my dad, who was escorting me back to the family home in West Chicago, Ill., asked the same question: Anything yet? He was the one who had answered the frail tapping of my ring on his hotel room window, who drew open the blinds to see my mangled face. He later told my mother, who had slept through the worst of it, that I looked as if I'd been shot at close range, that he had never seen anything worse than my face that dawn. Without any answers, he clung to his theories. You don't remember being attacked, like with a crowbar?

It was useless. Despite my restless efforts to retrieve the memory, a few critical hours of my life were inaccessible. And what I'd been able to surmise, deduced from the recollections of witnesses and the physical facts of my injuries, made little sense: On the second night of my vacation, Fallujah had uncoiled itself in my mind, commanded my sleeping body upright and piloted me toward the window of my second-story hotel room. My sleeping hands pried open its latch. I went over the rail, sending myself tumbling 15 feet to the cold pavement below.

A WEEK BEFORE IT ALL, IN THE FINAL DAYS OF 2005, my brother Soren had called me as I stood at the landing zone in Camp Fallujah, to thank me for the gift I had recently mailed him: an AK-47 slug, spent in celebratory, retaliatory or predatory fire over Baghdad one August night. It had deep coppery scratches from its scuttle along the pavement beside my hooch and looked exactly as you might imagine a fired round would look. He told me he had placed it on his desk in the public relations office of the Catholic Diocese of Arlington. "It's a good conversation piece," he said. I thought about priests picking up the bullet.

"I'll see you soon, bro!" I shouted over the thump-thump of a pair of approaching midnight helicopters. I was leaving for my R&R, five days off to meet my family at a resort in the Dominican Republic. I sat with my gear on the edge of the concrete field watching the wobbling and shivering descent of the choppers. When they touched down, I made my way toward the beckoning aerial gunner under the rotor span, who read the letters I'd inked on my hand to confirm my destination. It would take only about 20 minutes to skirt over the deserted fields of the Euphrates River valley and past the glaring perimeter lights of Abu Ghraib prison before Baghdad's knotted skein of dimly lit neighborhoods unfurled below us. The helo nosed onward, and Marine aerial gunners hunched over their 50-cals, squinting through night-vision goggles. The baby Chinook was an aging bird with paneless windows that channeled in the wind, forcing my eyes shut.

The last time I had seen Soren was in the freighted days before I left for Baghdad, in December 2004. West Chicago had been blustery but bearable. My brothers had both come home for the holidays, and we strung lights around our frozen pond in the back yard, which we shoveled off with mounting excitement. Their wives took pictures and helped my baby niece explore the ice. We played hockey without skates; Mom brought us popcorn and hot chocolate, and we stopped between goals, steam wending its way from our lungs. Dad appeared at the pond's edge for a few moments with his pipe, surveying the game and his family quietly. We stayed away from the deep end, where Derek had once fallen through the ice 20 years earlier.

The night before I left for Iraq, as my brothers and I sat in my room clanking our beer bottles, I taught them the geographic cues that the U.S. government had trained me to use if I was taken hostage and appeared on al-Jazeera, kneeling in front of masked insurgents. My forehead, north. South, my chin. My nose was Baghdad.

I'd tried for nearly two years to get myself to the war zone. During the invasion, I was living in Cairo as a Fulbright scholar, studying the intersection of politics and Islamism. It was a path I'd started down at age 15, after a trip to Egypt with my grandmother sparked a fascination with the culture. I had begun studying Arabic almost immediately. By the time Baghdad fell, I had six years of Arabic under my belt, a degree in Middle Eastern history and had lived throughout the region. I nurtured profound opposition to the war, but I thought I could contribute my skills in the attempt to rebuild Iraq.

Now it had been nearly a year since I arrived in Iraq. And, frankly, it felt wrong to leave for even a week. There was still so much to be done in Fallujah, so much to figure out. I didn't want to take that responsibility lightly, like so many U.S. officials who had come for a few hours to get their picture taken and to say they'd been. But my family rarely had reunions, and I was due for a break. Plus, just days before I left, the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, soon to deploy to Fallujah from Camp Pendleton in California, had requested a briefing on USAID's work in Anbar province. I would be able to fit in that trip after my R&R and was pleased at the chance to get at least some work done while I was out of Iraq.

In the helicopter, I bowed my head in a feeble effort to catch a few minutes' sleep before Baghdad. The air outside warmed as we dipped beneath the convection layer. I cracked open an eyelid and saw the drowsy Tigris ribboning through the center of the capital. We were almost to the Green Zone. I wondered from which street or rooftop an Iraqi had fired his Kalashnikov, arcing a volley of conversation pieces for my brother back home.

I checked my watch. In about 60 hours I'd be on the beach -- away from the dusty sea of armor and Humvees, rubble and barbed wire, helmets and the weary faces beneath them.

FOUR FLIGHTS LATER, MY FAMILY LAID SHOCKED AIRPORT EYES ON ME -- I'd lost a few dozen pounds in Iraq -- and smothered me with attention. They said, You don't have to talk about the war if you don't want to, but it was as though I'd never known anything else worth talking about.

USAID, a government agency, was charged with helping to rebuild the country and with providing humanitarian assistance. My first assignment when I'd arrived in Iraq at the beginning of 2005, at age 24, was as the agency's information officer in Baghdad's Green Zone. The perpetually devolving situation beyond our blast walls had turned the place into a sort of prison, and colleagues who had forged successful careers in the trenches were stuck in a bizarre arena of paperwork and booze, punctuated occasionally by the sounds of the war outside.

I grew steadily more frustrated by the surreal isolation of palaces and swimming pools bobbing with drunken contractors and began to agitate for a job outside of the Emerald City. So, that fall, I was dispatched to coordinate the agency's efforts in Fallujah, the restive (as our government labels it) city about 30 miles west of the capital on a southerly bend in the Euphrates. Despite its strategic importance, USAID had spent less than .05 percent of its Iraq budget on projects in Fallujah. I was charged with intensifying our work there before time, money or U.S. patience ran out.

My work was exhausting, infrequently rewarding and drenched with a sense of urgency and importance. What little work we had finished, I discovered, was either ill-conceived or poorly executed. We had paid more than $100,000 to erect a few billboards to encourage war-weary and unemployed Fallujans to keep a tidy city. At the government-run veterinary clinic we had funded, I walked in to find that the vet had moved all of our donated equipment to his private clinic, where he was charging the area's impoverished farmers seven times the government rate for his services -- and simultaneously asking us for more supplies. Out west in Ramadi, both the Marines and the Iraqis wanted to rehabilitate the city's dilapidated glassmaking factory -- once Anbar's largest employer -- but our advisers in Baghdad were pushing free-market policies that precluded restarting a failing state-owned enterprise. The glacial pace of our government bureaucracies meant that new projects, such as hiring droves of Fallujans to clear out the choked irrigation canals stemming from the Euphrates, would take time. So, for the moment, Anbar's steadiest employer was the insurgency, which paid for planting explosives, for sowing disorder.

Over the months, I settled into the grind, pushing myself through 80- or 90-hour weeks as though I were on Wall Street. I was sleeping less and less, exercising more and more. I felt as if the only way to obtain reliable information was with my own eyes and ears, so I took every opportunity to get out of the camp into the city's streets. Several mornings a week, I'd armor up, Velcroing on my flak jacket, and prepare for meetings downtown with city leaders. By 7:30 a.m., I'd be shivering in the Fallujah dawn, sitting on my helmet as Marines pinched out their cigs and loaded their gear into our cluster of Humvees. We would listen to the same convoy briefing: order of march, execution, rally points, enemy tactics, routes, rules of engagement, escalation of force, medical aid. It never changed. I would ride in the open-air tub of a Humvee, which resembles the bed of a pickup truck with shoulder-height armor plating. That fall, several children had run up and tossed grenades into the tubs. I would have one chance, the Marines grinned, to swat these ringers away from the Humvee before they exploded. If I missed, I'd have to warn the others, who, unlike me, carried weapons and were busy peering through the scopes of their M-16s. As the convoy lurched its way through camp, I'd sheepishly practice swats, doubting my coordination, feeling absurd.

On the hardball road that led into the guts of the city, I would join the others in sizing up everything that lay in front of us. It was all lethal. Black bags of trash became the hoods of grim reapers. Parked and idling cars, massive and rusty weapons, bits of string, detonation wire. Left to right, right to left, my eyes scanned pavement, bodies, vehicles, signs, medians, hands, light posts, tree limbs, eyes, gas stations, bushes, abandoned shacks, auto body repair shops, pierced and rusting petroleum tanks, overpasses, children on bicycles, children on foot, children.

Convoy movement is forced amnesia, visceral and bitter. On the road, it didn't matter that I spoke the language, knew the music, read the authors, studied the religion. What mattered was that they stayed away from my vehicle. That they not make any quick movements when I passed by. They needed to freeze. They needed to smile.

Hypervigilance, an expert in post-traumatic stress disorder later explained to me.

THOUGH I SHOULD HAVE BEEN EXHAUSTED FROM THE DAYS OF TRAVEL from Fallujah to the Dominican Republic, my mind was surging. I stayed up late the first night, talking more to myself than to my relatives. When I finally made it to bed, I lay there, staring at the ceiling and waiting for sleep.

A few hours later, I drowsily walked past the window in my room. Spotting a half-built dun-colored apartment complex outside, I dropped to the floor and shouted an expletive, thinking it was reckless for me to be walking without my body armor. A Fallujan sniper had put us all on edge after shooting several Marines in the weeks before, and here I was walking past a window without battle rattle. It was then, on the floor of my hotel room, that I realized where I was, safe. I was embarrassed and felt a sapping dissonance. I didn't remember getting out of bed minutes earlier, but I could replay with precision the thoughts that flared when I saw that building. I got back under the covers and waited for the sun to rise. I tried to forget about the confusing event and chalked it up to fatigue.

Later that day, after my family awoke, I tried to unwind but couldn't. Though tourists were relaxing by the ocean, I found it jarring to walk among civilians without a covey of well-armed Marines, past piles of litter while sightseeing helicopters flitted overhead. Again, I talked with my family for hours too long about Iraq. Even while I threw a football with my brothers and dad in the crashing surf, I thought about the briefing I'd give the Camp Pendleton Marines after my R&R, and I felt I was doing important things with my life.

That night, I folded my jeans, placed my watch on the nightstand and crawled under the sheets. This is my last memory of that night, which I now replay as one does the moments in which a car accident might have been avoided.

Primitivo, the Haitian night guard at the hotel, later told my family what he saw. At 4:30 in the morning, he noticed me perched on the windowsill, staring off in the direction of the unfinished apartment complex. "Â¡Peligroso!" he warned, pointing a flashlight at me. Dangerous ! I yelled back something he didn't understand. Rebuffed, he continued along his night watch until he heard a crashing thud. "Â¡Se cayo!" he shouted. He fell! He raced back to find me kneeling in a pool of my blood.

A ravine of torn flesh ran between my brows. My chin flapped below my jaw. I held my mouth with two broken wrists and groaned about my teeth, jarred loose from my fractured upper jaw. Blood spigoted from my forehead, from the nostrils of my broken nose, over shreds of lip.

I WAS FACING MONTHS OF REHABILITATION. But upon arriving in West Chicago with my father, I fought against my injuries, sparring with doctors, tugging at stitches, mentally truncating every estimate about how much time I'd need to heal. I had spent months climbing out of Humvees and Chinooks to develop relationships with city leaders, identify needs and draw lessons from the mistakes of the reconstruction. Now, my mother was buttoning my shirt for me.

I lay in my childhood bed, willing the cracks in my bones to seal and the stress in my mind to settle, and stubbornly considered this a mere interruption to my job. In the first days, I forced my fiberglass-encased hands to work the phone and pound a keyboard so I could leave messages with my bosses in Baghdad and e-mail them pictures of me in the hospital bed, along with the list of required medical procedures.

I knew that to return, I'd have to get a new health clearance from the government, a requisite for civilians working in Iraq. So, as though setting out to repair an engine, I made a list of everything wrong with my body. It would take at least two months for the casts to be cut from my broken wrists. The wires lashed around my jaw would be removed in two weeks, at which point I could schedule the several root canals required for my front teeth. Afterward, I could visit my high school orthodontist for another round of braces to hoist my fractured teeth back into line. All in all, I'd need eight weeks, I told my office, before I'd be good to go. I asked if there was anything I could do in the meantime, offering to work with the agency in Washington until my return or to write a report with recommendations for projects in the city. Aside from early well-wishes, I heard nothing back. The friends over there who took my calls told me not to feel offended: I was merely out of sight and out of mind.

I wondered how the Fallujans would interpret my absence at our next meeting. Too many U.S. advisers and politicians had swooped in and out of Fallujah, making promises soon forgotten or ignored. I had sworn to myself I wouldn't make grand promises, wouldn't disappear. Now a series of ruptures snaking across my face and through my bones was making me break my word. I started to type an explanatory message in Arabic to Khaled, a city council member who was working on proposals for agricultural initiatives in the outskirts of the city, but I felt foolish. What could I tell him?

I realized I had come to know more about Fallujah than about my own home town. Stuck in a wartime framework, I made a Fallujah of West Chicago. I studied satellite maps on my computer, marveling at elements of our infrastructure that I'd never noticed, at how insecure we were. I plotted a takeover of the town in case the West Chicagoans sparked an insurgency. How many troops would we need, and how would we divide the city for administration? Where would we set up entry and exit control points? Where would rally points be set in case of IEDs or small-arms fire? Just as Fallujans had had to convert their soccer pitch, my town would have to use our high school's football field for trench graves. As a show of force, I'd position an M1A1 Abrams tank in the parking lot between Ace Hardware and Taco Bell. I'd coil concertina wire into the street to snarl traffic into a slow, observable mass. While my parents drove me through town on the way to doctor's appointments, I imagined mile-long vehicle queues snaking round the gas station and muzzles of counter-sniper rifles poking from the rooftops.

After I had pacified West Chicago, I succumbed to my anger. A month into my recovery, and I still hadn't heard anything from the mission in Baghdad. With each procedure, new complications appeared, and my estimated return date was slipping further from my reach. In trying to fix one wrist, a doctor accidentally expanded the crack in the bone, adding weeks to rehabilitation. When my oral surgeon failed to remove one of the wires holding my loosened teeth in place, I drove to the hardware store and bought a pair of pliers. I wrenched the wire from the gum tissue myself, wiped the blood from my chin and crossed that procedure off my list.

I still couldn't explain why the accident had happened, or even how. My dad, a Vietnam vet, still insisted that I had been attacked or robbed, unwilling, I think, to accept the idea of any sort of mental failure. Friends overseas told me that Marines and diplomats I barely knew were gossiping about me -- a two-star general was overheard declaring that I had been drunk, that I was trying to get out of coming back. When people suggested, gingerly, that I might have been suffering from PTSD, I rejected it out of hand. I hadn't worn a uniform and didn't believe I had the right to group my injury with those who did. So many had it worse: Marines, soldiers, Iraqis -- so many Iraqis. I called a psychiatrist friend, who said that I probably had experienced a stress-prompted fugue state, which is characterized by dissociative amnesia and autopilot behavior. I didn't see a shrink because I didn't think I'd have the time, especially since I was still hoping to return to Fallujah.

I decided to accept that explanation as the most likely, despite its obvious frustrations: The most important decision I'd ever made in my life happened that night on the windowsill, and I wasn't around to make it. I declared a family moratorium on discussing other possibilities. I wasn't likely to retrieve the lost memory, and the conjecture was draining us all.

As to the larger question of why it happened, visitors would offer unsolicited explanations. A minister friend of the family informed me that I was breathing because I'd been saved, because God had plans for me. "It's a Wonderful Life" looped on television for the holidays, telling me I should be feeling reborn. Each day is a gift!

I didn't feel that way; I felt ridiculous. After all, I'd spent the 12 months before the fall in a landscape scarred by a hail of bombs, mortars, rockets and bullets. I had seen death and the on-the-brink moments that make you think you're headed there: On a cold morning in Fallujah weeks before I left the city, my convoy had missed the wrath of a suicide car bomb by a few minutes. The vigilant Marines in the lead Humvee had even spotted the vehicle lurking along Route Fran, but for whatever reason, its explosives were meant for someone else. The next morning, we drove past the black char blossom left by the blast on the pock-marked pavement. Yet it was sleepwalking at some beach resort that nearly did me in.

I wondered if it would be any different if I had sleepwalked over there, instead. Would it be easier to understand? The ifs were exhausting, unrelenting.

I came to loathe the night. I'd crawl into bed warily. After a few hours, I'd snap awake, the kind of awake that is complete and leaves you with no doubts as to its certainty. My doctors blamed it on the Vicodin and general anesthesia, but I'd never told them about the nightmares since my return. In each, I was back in Iraq, abandoned, in danger or helpless to save others. In a sweat, I'd roll over and turn on the television, which lit the room with infomercials hawking bagel slicers and girls gone wild. In the hours until the sun came up, I wondered what was happening in Fallujah.

For a while, people called from Iraq to tell me the news. The canal-clearing initiative foundered in my absence. I learned that our colleague Sheikh Kamal, head of the city council, was assassinated while walking out of his house.

January lapsed into February, and I still had no final word from Baghdad about my future in Fallujah. My bosses hadn't yet discussed with me the likelihood of resuming my work. A friend in Baghdad forwarded an e-mail from a newly arrived diplomat who asked, "Who was Kirk Johnson, where did he work, and when did he leave?"

Moments before getting the roots of my three dead front teeth bored, I thumbed through magazines in the endo-dontist's waiting room and came across a quote of mine in Time magazine, made weeks earlier on Election Day in Fallujah, at a time that now seemed so much more important, more loaded, than anything at home. Humming drill in hand, the doctor asked, What was it like over there? I wasn't ready to accept that past tense. I hadn't finished over there. Hell, my socks and razor were still over there.

But I wasn't going back. My cellphone rang a few weeks later, on the drive back from getting my casts sawed off. It was Baghdad. Mom turned down the radio. My contract had expired during my recuperation, my superiors said, and they weren't going to field a replacement for me. Congress was slashing reconstruction funds, and what remained wasn't likely to be spent in Fallujah. As I listened to the news, I stared out the window at the freshly plowed, salt-streaked parking lots that pooled around the strip malls and fast-food joints. The neon in their signs cut against the encroaching dusk: Fantastic Sams, L.A. Tan, Hollywood Video, Dollar Heaven. I was home, after all.

Taliban Vows Summer Wave Of Suicide Bombers (WT)

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

KABUL -- The Taliban is gearing up for a massive summer offensive, with more than 2,000 suicide bombers ready for action and even more preparing, a senior Taliban commander said yesterday.

The commander, Mullah Hayat Khan, issued his threat a day after a top U.S. diplomat warned that Afghanistan was in for a bloody and dangerous spring after the bloodiest year since the hard-line Islamist Taliban was ousted by U.S.-led forces in 2001.

"The Taliban will intensify their guerrilla and suicide strikes this summer," the mullah said. "This will be a bloodiest year for foreign troops."

He said 2,000 suicide bombers were ready -- about 40 percent of the total suicide force -- adding that numbers were so high that it was sometimes hard to find enough explosives and targets.

"Our war preparations have been completed to a large extent, and we're waiting for summer to set in," Mullah Khan said.

More than 4,000 people died last year, a quarter of them civilians, as the resurgent Taliban fought back with what NATO generals said was surprising ferocity.

Calling the guerrillas virulent and tough, Richard Boucher, U.S. assistant secretary of state for South Asia, warned on Friday the spring would be bloody and dangerous after the traditional winter lull in fighting.

"I think we will face a strong offensive and will have a difficult and dangerous and bloody spring," he told BBC radio as NATO foreign ministers discussed Afghanistan's future at a summit in Brussels, "but we are also better set up to deal with it."

The threat coincides with an upsurge in attacks by Muslim terrorists on both sides of the Pakistan-Afghanistan border.

Pakistani investigators probing a suicide blast at a top hotel in Islamabad said yesterday they were looking at possible links to pro-Taliban extremists near the border. Police said they were examining the head, a leg and an arm of the bomber who detonated explosives strapped to his body when he was prevented from entering the Marriott Hotel in Islamabad on Friday, killing a security guard.

"Experts are examining the few remains of the bomber's body in a bid to identify him," said Brig. Javed Cheema, the Interior Ministry crisis-management chief.

Officials said a sketch of the bomber could not be prepared because no witnesses so far had come forward, nor had hotel security cameras filmed the attacker.

Interior Ministry officials said no group had yet claimed responsibility for the attack.

"We suspect [the attack] could be by militants opposed to the government's drive against Taliban elements in the tribal regions," a senior security official said on the condition of anonymity.

Pakistan is under pressure to curb Taliban activity in its lawless tribal zone bordering Afghanistan.

Afghanistan and U.S. officials said the Taliban uses the area to recruit and train fighters for cross-border attacks on Afghan, NATO-led and U.S. forces.

Kabul also has accused the Pakistani government and intelligence services of backing the insurgency, which claimed about 4,000 lives in 2006, the deadliest year since U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban in 2001. Pakistan denies the charges.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and a delegation of U.S. lawmakers met with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf yesterday in a mood of concern over a provision in a U.S. bill proposing restrictions on military aid to Islamabad. Neither side was scheduled to make any public comments.

The bill, passed by the House and awaiting action in the Senate, calls for ending U.S. military assistance to Pakistan if the country fails to stop the Taliban from operating on its territory, according to Pakistani news reports.

Under the provision, President Bush has to certify to Congress that Pakistan was doing its level best to combat insurgents before releasing any new military assistance. The Bush administration thinks that such restrictions on aid to Pakistan would undermine cooperation in the war on terrorism and is trying to persuade the Congress to drop the provision before it becomes law.

"Such conditionality [would] be counterproductive to the important goal ... of fostering a closer relationship with Pakistan," said a statement on administration policy from Mr. Bush's office.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Qwest May Face Fight For Money (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 28, 2007

If its ex-CEO is convicted, the firm can seek reimbursement for paying to defend him.

CA Inc. is trying to recover the $14.9 million that the software company spent to defend former chief executive Sanjay Kumar against accounting-fraud charges.

A lawsuit by the Islandia, N.Y.-based company, formerly known as Computer Associates, has targeted Kumar's cars, home, yacht and bank accounts after he pleaded guilty to masterminding a multibillion-dollar fraud.

A similar court battle could be in line for Denver-based Qwest if former chief executive Joe Nacchio is convicted of criminal insider trading.

Qwest is footing Nacchio's legal bill, which could cost up to $75 million for both civil and criminal cases, according to experts. Nacchio has pleaded not guilty to 42 counts of illegal insider trading. His criminal trial is set to begin March 19.

Bob Toevs, a Qwest spokesman, wouldn't say whether the company would seek reimbursement if Nacchio is convicted, but he said it has the right to.

Qwest and CA are just two of a large number of companies that pay legal fees for their current and former executives, experts say.

"It's very, very common for almost any corporation, and certainly for large publicly traded companies, to have provisions and agreements that will actually require the corporation to advance defense costs up front," said Lawrence Hamermesh, a corporate and business law professor at Widener University School of Law in Wilmington, Del.

Hamermesh said companies are not required to do so under state law in Delaware, which is where Qwest and many firms are incorporated.

Instead, experts say, most companies offer indemnification from legal proceedings and pay attorney fees in advance in order to attract officers and directors to their company.

"If I'm wrongfully charged, why should I have to fork out $25 million to $50 million or $60 million to defend myself?" said John Marquess, president of Legal Cost Control, a legal-fees consulting firm in New Jersey.

Current and former officers and directors at Qwest don't have to.

Qwest can attempt to recover

Qwest says its bylaws require it to advance legal fees for officers and directors who may be involved in a civil or criminal proceeding because of their work with the company. The company also says that if a conviction is handed down, it can attempt to recover its money.

The Justice Department charges allege that Nacchio sold $101 million in Qwest stock in early 2001 while he knew the company's finances were faltering.

Nacchio's attorneys have argued that Nacchio had a rosy outlook for Qwest in early 2001 because he knew the company was in line to receive large government contracts.

Separately, the Securities and Exchange Commission has sued Nacchio and several other former Qwest executives, charging that they fraudulently boosted revenues by $3 billion from 1999 to 2002. Qwest later restated much of that revenue.

Nacchio has also been named in several shareholder lawsuits.

Toevs wouldn't disclose how much the company's insurance may be covering in legal expenses for Nacchio.

Amount of coverage varies

Insurance broker Bruce R. Swicker said companies can carry two types of so-called directors and officers insurance to help defend the company and its key officials against lawsuits - one to cover the company and the other to cover the individual officer or director. The coverage is also used to pay settlements.

Toevs said Qwest has D&O coverage. Nacchio's severance agreement indicates that the company has separate coverage for him.

A provision in the agreement says that "the company shall continue to make the indemnification/insurance payments" as defined in his initial employment contract.

Nacchio joined Qwest in early 1997 and left in mid-2002.

How much Qwest ends up paying for legal fees depends on the insurance coverage limits they purchased, Swicker said. The insurance coverage is rescinded, however, if an officer or director is found guilty of a crime that harms the company.

Enron reportedly only carried limits of up to $365 million for the entire corporation.

Qwest paid $250 million in 2004 to settle an SEC suit alleging accounting fraud. It later paid $400 million to settle a shareholder class-action suit.

D&O insurance may have covered portions of those settlements, but Qwest won't say.

Swicker said the wave of corporate scandals in the late 1990s and early 2000 forced some insurance companies to stop offering D&O coverage.

"When all this first broke, there was a definite hardening of the market, as carriers either withdrew or they lowered the limits they were willing to offer," Swicker said.

He said new corporate governance laws such as Sarbanes-Oxley have helped the market recover.

Is The Fix Worse Than The Problem? (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

CONGRESS has a new idea about how to rein in executive pay. Trouble is, the plan will squeeze midlevel workers, even as they need to save more money for retirement. And it won't even dent top executives' takes.

Tucked into the proposed Small Business and Work Opportunity Act of 2007 are two provisions that would limit employees' use of deferred compensation plans to save for retirement.

The provisions are advertised as aiming at fat-cat deferred compensation plans — like those that contributed to the recent $200 million payouts to Hank A. McKinnell of Pfizer and Robert L. Nardelli of Home Depot. But tax and compensation experts say the law could hurt those making less than $100,000 a year. Potential victims also include workers at start-ups or companies undergoing a turnaround, or even people who have recently changed jobs.

"This doesn't just deal with the Nardellis and McKinnells of the world," said Brian Foley, an independent compensation consultant in White Plains. "It deals with all sorts of people who are middle management who will never make the big money and for whom deferred compensation is critical for saving for retirement."

The act is meant to give tax breaks to small businesses that may be hurt by an increase in the minimum wage. To offset lost revenue arising from those breaks, the bill proposes to limit the amount that any employee can amass in so-called nonqualified, tax-deferred compensation plans. The limit would kick in when earnings in a plan exceed the five-year average of an employee's annual taxable pay, or $1 million, whichever is less. If earnings in such plans exceed that limit, all of the employee's deferred compensation will be immediately taxable and subject to an additional 20 percent penalty and interest.

If the bill passes, the limit will take effect in 2007 and will not apply to earnings in qualified plans, like 401(k)s.

Know this: If a chief executive were to owe taxes or penalties because of the new limit, his company would surely cough them up. This practice, de rigueur in corporate America, is so venerable that we might as well call it "ye olde tax gross-up." Better yet, company accountants and tax specialists would figure out a way around the limit altogether for the top guys. Both outcomes would probably end up costing shareholders more.

Down the ladder, the story will be very different, however. "The definition of deferred comp, the types of arrangements and who it applies to is so broad," said Brigen L. Winters, principal at the Groom Law Group in Washington. "The vast majority of people affected by this will be in the $100,000 range." And it is unlikely that their companies will cover taxes generated by exceeding the limit.

Let's say an employee made $100,000 a year, on average over the past five years — that would be his annual limit for amounts earned in deferred compensation plans each year. While $100,000 may sound like a lot to generate in one year, it could be reached fairly easily. If a worker had $1 million saved in his deferred compensation account, for example, his savings would have to earn just over 10 percent in a year to put him over the limit. Then, his whole account would be subject to the tax and penalty.

Those who have worked the longest and set aside the most money for retirement would be prime candidates to exceed the limit — around the same time they would need to tap into their accounts.

Others who could be hurt by the deferred compensation cap are employees at start-up companies that pay little in salary but provide big equity stakes in deferred compensation programs to lure and keep talented employees. (Some stock options are exempt from the cap.) New hires, whose five-year average pay at their employers is minimal, could also be snared by the limit. And because certain severance payments are included in what the bill considers deferred compensation, workers who took early-retirement packages might also find themselves owing taxes and penalties. Older employees who wanted to cut back on their work life but not retire altogether — known as phased retirement — could also be hurt by the limit.

In addition, the law would discourage executives who receive restricted share units of their companies' stock from holding onto the stakes, eliminating an incentive for managers to align their interests with those of shareholders.

"Pensions are being eliminated left and right and a souped-up 401(k) can only do so much," Mr. Foley said. "If the nonqualified stuff is going to be capped and if the cap is going to apply across the board, it seems to me it puts the squeeze on the guys in the middle."

Good point. Limits on deferred compensation might not be bad if workers had been allowed to increase contributions to 401(k) plans beyond relatively low limits — $15,500 in 2007 — or if corporate pension plans were flush and growing in number rather than being terminated.

But amid fears that many employees have not saved enough for retirement and will face runaway health care costs as they grow older, limiting deferred compensation for middle-level managers seems goofy. The small-business bill's limits on deferred compensation were made without any hearings on their consequences.

The idea behind this cap seems to be an Enron byproduct. The 2002 investigation by the Joint Committee on Taxation into Enron's failure, requested by Senators Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, and Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, highlighted generous deferred compensation plans given to the company's executives. Senator Baucus, chairman of the Finance Committee, is a proponent of the limit.

"Enron allowed its executives to defer significant amounts of compensation even though Enron had to forgo a current deduction with respect to such amounts," the Joint Committee's report stated when it came out in 2003. "The fact that Enron was apparently indifferent to the deferral of its deduction provides further support for the need for changes to the tax treatment of nonqualified deferred compensation."

Carol Guthrie, a spokeswoman for the Senate Finance Committee, said: "There are a lot of hypotheticals out there about this provision affecting those other than whom it's meant to affect, but its application will not bear those out. This provision still allows far, far higher deferral benefits to the people it affects than those received by the average worker. It's hard to argue that 100 percent of your pay is too stingy an allowance for deferral."

But Mark J. Ugoretz, president of the Erisa Industry Committee, a lobbying organization that represents major employer health, retirement and compensation plans, said: "Historically, you do not get taxed on money that you have not received, do not have control over, or do not have the use of. That's a reasonable policy since, when the employee receives this money, the government will get their fair share."

Given the explosion in executive pay, it was thoroughly predictable that Congress would jump into the fray. But legislators' past attempts to curtail executive pay have wound up fattening already rich packages. The 1993 law that limited the deductibility of executive pay to $1 million, for example, pushed executives into enormous stock options packages.

The tax code should not be used to legislate corporate governance. This is why it is so crucial now to bring shareholders and company directors together to discuss executive pay. And why it is foolish for companies to resist those dialogues.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Shows Unsealed Lips In CIA (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

Though the agency has sought to protect covert identities, the leak case reveals that the secrecy rules are sometimes ignored.

WASHINGTON — From their earliest days, U.S. intelligence agencies have made it an article of faith to protect the identity of their secret agents. And in 1982, following a rash of malicious exposures, the CIA prevailed on Congress to make it a crime to knowingly disclose the identity of such operatives.

So in 2003, when the name of a CIA arms proliferation specialist, Valerie Plame, surfaced in a newspaper column, the agency immediately demanded a Justice Department investigation.

But last week, as former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby went on trial in connection with the leak, it appeared that neither the CIA nor some other intelligence community insiders were all that tight-lipped about such supposedly sensitive matters.

When it came to talking to outsiders, the agent's identity was often treated as not much more than water-cooler dishing or cocktail party chatter.

A high-level CIA official dropped Plame's agency connection into a conversation with a White House aide who did not know Plame existed. Another CIA official confessed that it was only after he had mentioned the agent's name to an official outside the agency that he felt a twinge of regret — a kind of belated "oops" — over what he had done.

And former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, a possible witness in the Libby trial, has acknowledged discussing Plame with a reporter. Armitage, an old hand at dealing with sensitive intelligence matters, later told a friend that gabbing about Plame was "the dumbest thing he'd ever done in his life."

The agent's identity wound up being a subject of discussion inside Washington's sprawling national security community after it was unveiled in a syndicated newspaper column. Libby is accused of lying to federal investigators looking into who leaked Plame's name to the columnist.

Plame is the wife of former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, who publicly raised questions about the intelligence used to justify the invasion of Iraq.

The revelations thus far in Libby's trial suggest that, though U.S. officials — especially within the Bush administration — have publicly insisted that secrecy is crucial in national security matters, there is a backstage world inside the government where even the most basic rules for protecting sensitive information may be ignored.

In theory, sensitive intelligence is highly compartmentalized and shared only on a need-to-know basis with people who have been cleared to receive it.

That was hardly the case with Plame.

In one instance described last week, the CIA's then-chief public affairs officer, William Harlow, apparently brought her name up almost in passing during a 2003 telephone conversation with his counterpart in Vice President Dick Cheney's office.

The White House official, Catherine J. Martin, then Cheney's director of communications, said, "It was a pleasant conversation. I had never spoken with him before."

Martin was calling about a report in the Washington Post that an unnamed diplomat had turned up evidence contradicting Bush administration claims about Iraq trying to get nuclear material from Niger. The story, and others that followed, said the diplomat had been sent to the African nation because of Cheney.

The vice president was upset over being linked to the venture, which undercut White House arguments about the Iraq threat.

Martin testified that Libby suggested she call Harlow.

"I remember talking about press reports about a former ambassador sent to Niger, and the press reports saying it was because of an inquiry by the vice president," she said.

"So I was saying, 'Who sent him? Who is this guy? And what are you saying to the press? It keeps getting reported that we sent him,' " Martin testified.

"Ultimately, I remember Bill Harlow saying his name was Joe Wilson, he was a charge in Baghdad and his wife works over here."

Harlow, responding to an e-mail request, declined to comment, citing the pending trial.

Libby allegedly learned that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA from the agency's top expert on Iraq, who testified Wednesday that he regretted passing along the tip.

Former CIA official Robert Grenier said he gave Libby the information. He said he had not remembered doing so when he initially spoke with investigators but recalled it later because he had a lingering feeling that he had done something he regretted.

"I recall feeling briefly guilty about it, that I had said too much," Grenier said. "By saying that Joe Wilson's wife was working in CIA, in effect I was revealing the identity of a CIA officer."

The law does not forbid all disclosures. It targets only leaks of identities of covert operatives and incidents where the recipient does not have a security clearance to receive the information. Libby, as Cheney's national security advisor and chief of staff, presumably had high-level security clearances.

But Grenier said he still had qualms about his actions "because it was not absolutely necessary for me to have said that…. Our habit is, if you don't need to say something, you don't."

CIA officials weren't the only ones trafficking in information about Plame. Former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, scheduled to testify Monday, apparently disclosed her identity to several reporters.

Afterward, he was so concerned that he might have broken the law that he refused to cooperate with investigators until he was granted immunity from prosecution.

Plame had worked overseas, posing as a private energy consultant while working for a CIA department tracking weapons proliferation. Although she had been working at CIA headquarters at the time of the leak, the disclosure ended her clandestine career and could have endangered people who had helped her abroad.

In part, the readiness of intelligence officials to bring Plame into conversations with White House officials reflected an unspoken reality of politics and power in Washington: The CIA is an independent agency, but it serves the president and other high officials — who not only use the intelligence it provides but pass judgment on its performance.

"The CIA works both sides of the street, satisfying the political bosses while protecting turf and tradition," said Williams Banks, a professor at Syracuse University law school and a national security expert. "Ironic for sure, but part of the Washington fabric."

The political pressures were especially intense when the Plame case broke in 2003. The CIA was under White House scrutiny because of intelligence failures preceding the Sept. 11 attacks and the Iraq war.

The pressure was clear in Grenier's testimony:

The former CIA official recalled taking a call from Libby, who, with what Grenier described as a "slightly accusatory tone in his voice," wanted to know whether the CIA was involved in sending Wilson to Africa and whether it had done so because of interest expressed by Cheney's office.

"It was pretty clear from the context that he wanted answers as quick as I could get them. It was unusual for him to be calling me in the first place."

Grenier said he called an individual who worked in the CIA counter-proliferation division who informed him about the trip and that Wilson's wife was working in the unit that had sent Wilson there.

Before Grenier could report back to Libby, he said, Libby's office had him called out of a meeting with the CIA director. "I don't think I had ever been called out of a meeting with the director before or since," Grenier said.

"I told him, in fact, it was true that the CIA had sent Ambassador Wilson to Niger. And how much else I said about it I really don't recall. I may have mentioned he was debriefed and a report was written."

Question: "In your conversation with Mr. Libby, did you also talk about information you had learned about Ambassador Wilson's wife?"

Answer: "I believe I did."

Question: "Can you tell us about that?"

Answer: "I mentioned that, only in passing, I said something to the effect, in fact, Ambassador Wilson's wife works here."

Question: "You felt that was a piece of information that was or should be passed on to Mr. Libby?"

Answer: "I'm not sure it should have been passed on to Mr. Libby. The reason why I said it, I wanted to be as forthcoming as I possibly could."

Assessing Grenier's testimony, Larry Johnson, a retired CIA and State Department counter-terrorism expert, said, "They wanted to avoid any unpleasantness with the vice president."

Besides, Johnson said, "If you can't give the vice president and president information with any degree of confidence that it is going to be protected, then you know, the entire game is up."

For Hevesi Prosecutor, 'One Standard Of Justice' (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

ALBANY, Jan. 27 — P. David Soares, the Democratic district attorney here, has clashed at various points in his two years in office with the mayor, the police chief, the sheriff and the County Legislature. He has assailed the war on drugs as a failure that "provides law enforcement officials with lucrative jobs" and called prison building an American "economic development strategy."

Now Mr. Soares, 37, is taking on one of the most durable political machines in America: the elected officials of Albany, where built-in incumbency and a "pay-to-play" system have created a culture in which at least 10 state lawmakers have been investigated, indicted or convicted in recent years.

While Gov. Eliot Spitzer has been the most prominent voice calling for change, it was Mr. Soares who sent tremors through Albany by pressuring former State Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi, a fellow Democrat, to plead guilty to a single felony charge and to resign last month. Since then, Mr. Soares said his office has received numerous tips about wrongdoing in state government.

Perhaps most worrisome for the capital: his efforts to look into corruption are now being aided by a partnership with Attorney General Andrew M. Cuomo, creating what could be a potent check on legislative abuses in a newly reform-minded Albany.

"This historically has been an office that was very much a part of the local political establishment," Mr. Soares said recently about the Albany prosecutor's office, which has jurisdiction over crimes in the capital. "I come to this job with a certain independence and therefore I feel much more comfortable in looking at these cases."

Much of the groundwork for the Hevesi case was laid out by the State Ethics Commission and the attorney general's office, but it was Mr. Soares (pronounced soars) who decided to pursue it as a felony investigation. Mr. Soares's predecessor, Paul A. Clyne, prosecuted high-profile cases, but the more notable, including cases against former Assemblyman Roger L. Green and J. Michael Boxley, a former top Assembly aide, ended with misdemeanor pleas.

The Hevesi case reinforced Mr. Soares's pledge to bring "one standard of justice" to the office. Although a Democrat in a Democratic-run county, he is also an outsider in a city led by older white men, a native Portuguese speaker from Cape Verde, off the western coast of Africa, who moved to Pawtucket, R.I., at age 6. He graduated from Cornell and then Albany Law School.

"Politically, my environment's a toxic environment, O.K.?" Mr. Soares said in an interview. "These are people that do not forget and have not forgotten."

From a seafaring culture, he has decorated his office with images of sailboats. He has a fullback's build and dresses in conservative suits, but also wears a wristband with the word "one" on it, part of an antipoverty campaign popular with celebrities — "I'm a big U2, Coldplay fan," he explained.

Before his 2004 election, he was an obscure junior prosecutor frustrated with his former boss, Mr. Clyne. Then he decided to do the unthinkable: run against his supervisor, and the local Democratic machine.

He told Mr. Clyne he was going to run against him, which led to a seven-minute conversation, Mr. Soares said. "First five, he laughed and didn't think to take me seriously, and the next two were firing me."

Mr. Clyne, who now assists district attorneys in the state, declined to comment.

A bitter and expensive campaign followed. Wealthy backers of drug law reform, including a group linked to the billionaire financier George Soros, rallied support for Mr. Soares. That angered local politicians, including the longtime Albany mayor, Gerald D. Jennings, who complained that interests from New York City were interfering in the election.

In a recent interview, Mr. Jennings said: "I don't have a lot of contact with David. I expect him to do the job he was elected to do."

His iconoclastic behavior as district attorney has certainly led some to see him as a hero ready to take on state government, while others see a zealous young prosecutor intent on making a name for himself.

Relations with law enforcement officials frayed last year when Mr. Soares delivered a speech in Canada highly critical of American drug policy, saying the war on drugs "provides law enforcement officials with lucrative jobs" — a comment that he later apologized for making, while not backing off from the essence of his criticisms.

"I took great offense at that," said James L. Campbell, the Albany county sheriff. "I'm in my 41st year of law enforcement, 16 as sheriff, 24 with the state police, and I have had people I work side by side with killed in this war on drugs, so I really was offended by it, but he did apologize for it."

His ability to take on corruption in state government was limited until recently. Last year, he created a public integrity unit to pursue such cases, but he had only two lawyers and one investigator working both local and state matters. Adding to his problems has been a feud with the County Legislature, which recently tried to strip him of his investigator.

Along came Mr. Cuomo, the new attorney general, who pledged to bolster the district attorney's efforts with lawyers and investigators from his much larger office. The deal has benefits for Mr. Cuomo as well — giving his own office more teeth on such cases and access to criminal grand jury proceedings — and a prosecutor with jurisdiction.

"In opening the newspapers for the past several weeks, you see scandal after scandal involving state government," Mr. Cuomo said recently, adding that corruption cases were "a higher priority than probably ever before."

Mr. Soares said he was cautious about the Hevesi case at first, because the initial complaint was delivered to his office by Mr. Hevesi's political opponent, J. Christopher Callaghan, with cameras in tow. But Mr. Hevesi's admissions that he had used state workers to chauffeur his wife, and scathing reports from the State Ethics Commission and the attorney general's office, provided a road map for conviction, and Mr. Soares insisted on a felony plea.

"You had to ask yourself, if this was a guy who worked at Dunkin' Donuts, and this happened to a guy that worked at Dunkin' Donuts, what would we be doing?" he said. "And if the answer is he's got to plea to this charge, he's got to pay restitution, he's got to leave his job, then what's good for the guy at Dunkin' Donuts is also good for the state comptroller."

In fact, Mr. Soares's entry into the political world similarly reflected more pedestrian concerns. The central issue in the 2004 race for district attorney was the Rockefeller-era drug laws, which sent many drug offenders away to prison for decades.

Mr. Clyne was a vocal supporter of such laws, while Mr. Soares became an outspoken advocate of easing them and felt the district attorney's office eschewed alternatives to locking people up. He was assigned to be the community prosecutor — essentially presenting a public face for the office — but felt his efforts to reach out were undermined.

The roots of Mr. Soares's feelings on drug policy go back to his youth.

In Pawtucket, his father worked as an electrician and carpenter. Though he and his three sisters have done well, his older brother has struggled with drugs and crime.

"He had brushes with the law as early as the age of 14, in and out of reform school, in and out of state prison," Mr. Soares said, adding, "my mother had to be the lady in the audience watching her son be arraigned."

Eventually, his brother was deported.

"I think what was frustrating for his family, and for David," said Joao Goncalves, a close friend of Mr. Soares's who also grew up in Pawtucket, "all the other siblings turned out just fine, but his brother was the bully in the neighborhood, he went down a different path."

Mr. Soares, he said, "sees the reality of people, and sees that there are some good people that make some really bad decisions and there are bad people that make some really bad decisions as well."

Perhaps the same can sometimes be said of politics. Mr. Soares seems intent on making his mark.

"In the wake of our most recent state prosecution, I think more people are beginning to take note," he said. "We do have tremendous jurisdiction and ability to help this governor with his reform agenda."

In The Penalty Phase, All One's Secrets Revealed (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

In the federal court system of the United States of America, duly recorded and transcribed by professional stenographers, there exists testimony documenting the fact that one Ronell Wilson, 24, of Staten Island, wet the bed into his teenage years.

Kids might call that T.M.I., "too much information." The law calls it evidence of a "mitigating factor" that could spare a defendant's life.

Mr. Wilson may or may not get the death penalty for killing two undercover detectives; jurors in Brooklyn will be asked to decide this week. But in two weeks of testimony to determine his sentence, he has already endured an unenviable ordeal.

The degree of scrutiny afforded a capital defendant is enough to mortify anyone who has ever been a child, dated a girl, gotten a haircut or tried to dress fashionably. This is the full probe. All your secrets revealed. Some defendants consider it either more agonizing than death, a sentence no federal jury in New York has prescribed for a half-century, or at least worth a big gamble to avoid.

In 2003, in the same court, a defendant named Emile Dixon took his chances, forbidding defense lawyers to call his relatives or dissect the circumstances of his upbringing. The strategy worked well for him, or as well as possible under the circumstances. Six jurors wrote on a verdict sheet that Mr. Dixon had impressively "exhibited concern for the privacy and dignity of his family."

He is serving a life term for dealing drugs and murdering two people, including another dealer who had become a government witness.

A Killer, and Bad in Math

In theory, this adversarial process known as the penalty phase, coda to a capital murder trial, informs jurors of the broader circumstances of the case. Prosecutors argue that the convicted man is more rotten than other killers; defense lawyers suggest causes for mercy. In practice, it can produce some bizarre tableaus. After all, once it has been established that you murdered somebody, other biographical details can seem surreally picayune.

Because of the youth of Mr. Wilson and his co-defendants, some of whom were teenagers at the time of the killings in 2003, the jury has already seen some jarringly boyish displays. In the first phase of the trial, one witness told of a clash after a school talent show. One enlarged evidence photograph showed Mr. Wilson making a gang hand sign for the camera, but the image was stamped with the logo of the Six Flags Great Adventure theme park.

On Wednesday, a gallery of TV reporters, sketch artists and figures from throughout Mr. Wilson's life learned that his I.Q. had once been measured at around 78. Asked long ago how to respond if a younger, smaller child started a fight, he had answered, "Pick him up and throw him in the garbage."

At P.S. 14 on Staten Island, he had done well in physical education, less so in math. Those grades were projected on a giant screen in the courtroom. His lawyer, Mitchell Dinnerstein, said: "We're talking about a kindergarten kid, right?"

"Everybody makes mistakes," cried Constance Wilson, Aunt Connie to the defendant, as she pleaded for his life from the witness stand. Her choice of words sounded belittlingly off-key in the courtroom, as the mistake in question was the murder of two men with young families, but the jury also heard about other transgressions to better fit that bill.

Prosecutors called a computer technician named Jack Marczewski to describe an encounter from June 1996, when he was 13 and Mr. Wilson was 14. With another boy, Mr. Wilson had demanded bus passes, rifled through young Jack's book bag, stolen his calculator and punched him in the face.

Cross-examination was brief. A defense lawyer asked Mr. Marczewski how he was doing these days.

"Ah, doing well," he said.

Seeking to portray Mr. Wilson as a sweet-hearted, wayward, neglected and possibly brain-damaged child, his own lawyers have subjected him to a catalog of humiliations.

They displayed a photograph of Mr. Wilson at age 12, thumb firmly in cheek.

They put his father, Robert Earl Barnes, on the witness stand, then made a spectacle of his resplendent incoherence. They revealed that Mr. Wilson was originally called Earl, presumably after this heavily sedated man who could not identify the year of his son's birth.

A former teacher at a juvenile detention center testified that Mr. Wilson had arrived at age 15, reading at a second-grade level. A counselor from the center, Michael J. Hall, who testified for the record that he liked Mr. Wilson, described him as "immature," "slow academically" and "a thumb sucker."

A defense lawyer asked: "Did he also wet the bed?"

Mr. Hall said: "Oh, yes."

Then he recounted a time when Mr. Wilson had claimed to be a member of the Bloods street gang. Mr. Wilson, he said, rescinded his claim when confronted by older boys who were known gang members.

The next witness, Milton Munroe, described Mr. Wilson's efforts to fill out a supermarket job application.

"I realized pretty much that he only had his first and last name on the application," Mr. Munroe said, "after 15 minutes of trying to fill it out."

It remains to be seen what value the jurors will place on any of this. From the defense table, Mr. Wilson has watched the parade of counselors and teachers and parents and other relatives go by. He has registered no humiliation, no particular response at all. There is some indication he just appreciates the concern.

"It's nice to know somebody still got love for me," he wrote in a jailhouse letter to a friend (who later betrayed him on the witness stand). "I feel much better to know that."

It Only Looks Like The Girls Have Gone Wild (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 28, 2007

Study finds no increase in 'violent femmes'

COLUMBIA, S.C. -- Six Eau Claire High School students, all girls, are arrested for fighting as students board buses after school.

WOONSOCKET, R.I. -- Two mothers and their daughters, both 13, are arrested after one woman drives her already suspended daughter to Woonsocket Middle School to fight a teenage rival.

PITTSBURGH -- As police try to calm two groups of teens yelling at each other, a brawl breaks out involving 20 females. One girl is bashed in the head with a brick, and her mother is bitten on the ear.

Incidents like these are showing up in news media reports across the country, often to illustrate a common theme: American girls are becoming more violent.

But have girls really gone so wild?

A U.S. Justice Department report, under internal review and due out in about a month, will largely conclude that they haven't -- or at least that there's no data to support that they have.

"We don't have good evidence that it is increasing. We think it's not getting worse," said Margaret Zahn, lead investigator for the Girls Study Group, a panel of experts assembled by the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. "The media [approach] is always, 'If it bleeds, it leads.' I do wish the media would be more careful about how these things are reported."

But the drumbeat continues. Just last week, "CBS Evening News" reported on a group of Long Island girls who videotaped vicious assaults and put them on the Internet. That story also featured commentary by James Garbarino, the author of an influential 2006 book, "See Jane Hit: Why Girls Are Growing More Violent and What We Can Do About It."

Yet the consensus of most criminologists is that the "crisis" of girl violence is probably overblown, inflated by statistics gathered from reporting standards that didn't exist years ago -- such as zero tolerance policies in schools and increased reporting of domestic violence.

"The empirical evidence shows it is a myth," says Penn State criminologist Darrell Steffensmeier, who is part of the Girls Study Group. "There are a lot of unanswered questions. But if you take the best evidence we have, the rates aren't any higher."

Pittsburgh police and city school police agree.

"I don't think it's anything new," says Lt. Philip Dacey, who until recently commanded the East Liberty station, the busiest in the city. "And if it's shooting up, it's not happening in my area here."

Some research, however, points the other way.

Cindy Ness, program director at the John Jay Center on Terrorism and Public Safety, has studied African-American girls in Philadelphia. Her conclusion is that street fights are a way of life for girls there but that most of the battles are never reported to police.

In her 2004 report, "Why Girls Fight: Female Youth Violence in the Inner City," she found that the girls she interviewed "actively pursue and enjoy physically dominating others and take pleasure in inflicting pain and in emerging victorious."

One girl, Aiesha, summed up the attitude this way: "You kidding me, girls be fighting more than boys do. They so emotional they'll fight over anything. Boys won't get into it over no he-said, she-said. They only gonna fight over something serious like money or drugs."

Ms. Ness also insists that street-fighting among girls in low-income areas is "significantly underestimated."

"I think it's largely an inner-city phenomenon," she says. "I think it's ratcheted up. But it's not to say it's crazy out of control. It's not this sense of Girls Gone Wild! It's more subtle than that."

More arrests, but why?

The root of this debate is numbers.

Girls are definitely getting arrested for assault and aggravated assault more often than they used to, according to figures from the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports.

Although juvenile arrests for violent crime are down overall, girls represent a larger percentage of those arrests.

While the rate for boys declined 26 percent between 1980 and 2003, the female rate jumped 47 percent. Between those years, female assault arrests rose from about 200 for every 100,000 girls to 750.

Some analysts and media reports cite that fact in saying the "gender gap" between boys and girls is closing. Authors such as Mr. Garbarino have seized on it to bolster their contention that girls are becoming more violent.

He lists plenty of reasons why this is happening: the breakdown of the family, the decline of the church and the natural evolution of the women's liberation movement, which began in the 1960s and now encourages girls to be as aggressive as boys.

He and others are also big on blaming the entertainment industry for featuring "violent femmes" in action roles, such as gun-toting Lara Croft and sword-wielding Uma Thurman in "Kill Bill."

Even the highbrow heroine of the Harry Potter books, Hermione Granger, punches a boy and says, "Boy, that felt good."

"Girls in general are evidencing a new assertiveness and physicality that goes far beyond criminal assault," Mr. Garbarino writes. "It is evident in their participation in sports, in their open sensuality, in their enjoyment of 'normal' aggression that boys have long enjoyed in rough-and-tumble play, and in the feeling of confidence that comes with physical prowess and power."

But criminologists largely dismiss Mr. Garbarino's book, and others like it, as simplistic and alarmist.

The 15 members of the Girls Study Group, including such prominent researchers as Meda Chesney-Lind of the University of Hawaii at Manoa and Jody Miller of the University of Missouri-St. Louis, suggest more complex factors are at work.

For one thing, several studies that rely on self-reporting by girls, such as the National Crime Victimization Survey, show very little change in violence over the last two decades.

The National Youth Risk Behavior Survey, put out by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, actually shows a 10 percent decrease in fighting reported by girls in grades 9-12 between 1991 and 2003.

Some surveys could be skewed because they're often given in school, and many of the girls who fight might not be in school.

Still, says Ms. Zahn, "all the self-reporting data indicates no change. They're not reporting more violence."

Shifting definitions

The Girls Study Group says the reason arrests are up is probably that more people in authority are paying attention.

Police today are more likely to arrest girls than before in part because of laws requiring them to take action in domestic violence incidents. And since those are more likely to involve girls than boys -- often in fights with their mothers -- more girls are being charged than in years past.

In schools, fights among girls are more likely to end up with someone arrested than in the past.

Ms. Zahn, 60, said that when she was a 16-year-old student in Lorain, Ohio, a friend got into a "knock-down, drag-out fight" with another girl.

"I saw it," she says. "But that was never reported to anyone. I don't even know if the principal knew about it. Now we have zero tolerance in the schools."

Another factor, the study group says, is what constitutes an assault.

Mr. Steffensmeier says police are using broader definitions that include more minor incidents that girls are more likely to commit. His research shows that disorderly conduct, harassment and resisting arrest are now often categorized as simple assault -- and reported as such to the FBI.

"You can get busted much more easily now," he says. "If you start busting people for scratching or kicking or throwing minor objects, you're going to arrest more girls [than boys]."

And in some jurisdictions, the study group says, behaviors traditionally categorized as "status offenses" such as incorrigibility or truancy are now considered grounds for detention in a juvenile facility.

Mr. Steffensmeier says fear of lawsuits might also be pushing social workers, school officials and police to seek arrest instead of handling cases informally.

The bottom line, the study group says, is that violence among girls does not seem to be as widespread as it has been portrayed.

But Cindy Ness isn't convinced.

In Philadelphia, girls said they fought all the time to protect themselves or their reputations. What's more, many took pride in their viciousness and in "not fighting like a girl."

One told her, "I punched her in the face and then I banged her head against the ground. I only stopped 'cause someone pulled me off her."

Others said a girl with a knife will always go for the other girl's face to disfigure her, whereas boys will stab to kill.

"This way she gonna see herself in the mirror every day and remember what I did to her," said one of the girls, named Lakeesha.

The fights often came home and ended up involving mothers, aunts and sisters, as in the brawl on Crucible Street in Pittsburgh on Jan. 8.

On one ride-along with police, Ms. Ness saw 30 women and girls in a fight that police had to break up three times before they finally made arrests.

But was that kind of behavior happening in 30 years ago?

"No one can say for sure," she says. "But it's been going on for a long time in the African-American community."

EDITORIAL: The Cavalry Is Coming (NOTP)

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 28, 2007

With a rash of murders to begin the year and only one arrest in 14 cases, New Orleans police clearly needed help. They are getting it.

In the broadest law enforcement commitment yet from the federal government, FBI, U.S. Marshal, Drug Enforcement Administration and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents will work the streets with police to make arrests, develop cases and reach out to residents in the city's most violent neighborhoods.

"The goal is to detain, imprison, prosecute, convict and incarcerate these violent criminals, to take the pressure off the local criminal justice system," said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten, who delivered Thursday's announcement for U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Wherever possible, Mr. Letten said, cases will be handled in federal court.

Hallelujah.

The federal system is functioning at a much higher level than the New Orleans Police Department and Orleans Parish district attorney's office. As for the city's criminal court judges, there are so many problems with evidence gathering and prosecution of cases that it's difficult to figure out how well the judges are handling their duties. There have been judges who went out of their way to set low bonds for violent offenders. But with Judge Charles Elloie off the bench that doesn't seem to be the problem that it was a year ago.

The federal initiative will double the number of agents assigned to New Orleans and will expand their involvement. FBI agents will go on patrol with police officers and will knock on doors to try to create relationships with residents. DEA agents won't be limited to drug arrests but are being given the power to work all kinds of crimes.

The city will get six additional ATF agents, nine additional FBI agents and three extra deputies and an investigator in the U.S. Marshal's Service -- all at the expense of the federal government. The DEA also will replace ruined ballistics equipment for the Police Department.

This effort seems more about expertise than sheer numbers, though. The Police Department has struggled to put together solid cases and follow through with all the necessary documentation. Many witnesses are afraid of neighborhood thugs and distrustful of police, which is a combination that practically assures failure.

If FBI agents can turn that situation around, they will be heroes.

Two FBI agents also will work with the Police Department's cold case homicide squad, which has done some solid work in the past clearing old homicide cases. Solving old murder cases is vital, not only to bring closure to individual cases but to stem the cycle of violence. Some suspects have been linked to multiple murders but never convicted. Getting repeat violent offenders off the streets is crucial to building a safer city.

The effort to curb drug dealing is vital, too. The beefed up Drug Enforcement Administration unit will do undercover sweeps of crime-ridden neighborhoods, which is a good strategy. The effort ought to yield better intelligence about scattered drug operations and help build evidence against the violent dealers who terrorize some neighborhoods.

Federal authorities aren't new to the crime fight in New Orleans.

ATF agents were instrumental in building a case against the 7th Ward Soldiers drug gang in the late 1990s. Federal investigators traced bullet casings fired by gang members "back into their hands," then-Police Superintendent Richard Pennington said when 16 people were indicted on gang-related charges that included murder and attempted murder.

When he arrived to take over the New Orleans FBI office in May 2005, special agent in charge Jim Bernazzani started talking about creating an intelligence-sharing group across law enforcement lines to fight street crime.

Post-Katrina, with the city's justice system in shambles for months, Mr. Letten and other federal authorities have looked for ways to work with police and to take on the prosecution of criminal cases that might have gone to state court in the past.

In November, nine people were indicted on federal drug and gun charges in Central City through the teamwork of the Police Department and agents from the FBI and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

A few weeks before those arrests, ATF had brought back its 24-hour gun hotline. Since October, 117 investigations have sprung from calls made to the hotline, agency officials said Thursday. In one of those investigations, drug dealers were rooted out of a house they had commandeered from a woman, and her home was given back to her.

Federal intervention can only go so far. The cases Mr. Letten can prosecute are limited by law. Police, prosecutors and Criminal District Court must be equipped to handle their share of cases, and those are plentiful.

But New Orleanians weary of crime are surely thankful that the cavalry is on the way.

Noxubee Clerk: No Inquiry Into Invalid Ballots (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 28, 2007

Noxubee County Circuit Clerk Carl Miggins testified Friday his office took no action to find out why signatures on some absentee ballots in a 2003 election were different than the signatures on the applications for the ballots.

A court ruled that 33 absentee ballots cast in a race between a black candidate and a white candidate in the race for sheriff were invalid. But the judge ruled the election results in which a black candidate was declared the winner would stand because the absentee ballots didn't affect the election's outcome.

In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

Miggins, the last official witness called by the Justice Department, began his testimony late Friday.

He will complete his testimony Monday, when the trial in U.S. District Court in Jackson enters its third week. District Judge Tom S. Lee is presiding.

Defendants in the lawsuit are the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and its chairman, Ike Brown, and the county Election Commission.

Miggins, who is black, and Noxubee County had been defendants but were removed after the county signed a federal consent decree to prevent any discrimination against voters.

Questioned Friday by Justice Department attorney Christopher Coates about the signatures being different, Miggins explained he took no action to find out why "Because the judge and the Election Commission ruled on it. ... If a judge ruled on it, I feel it is behind us."

Miggins said he personally doesn't make any determination on ballots cast the day of an election. He said it's up to poll workers to decide who can cast a ballot legally at the polls.

But Coates told Miggins that in his capacity as circuit clerk he is the administrator of absentee ballots and the registrar of voters.

Wil Colom, attorney for Brown and the Democratic Executive Committee, objected to Coates' questions about the signatures on the absentee ballots.

Colom said the difference in the signatures was not the only reason the 33 ballots were thrown out.

"There were probably 12 different reasons," Colom said.

The defense will begin putting on its case after the government completes its case. The defense expects to take four to five days, Colom said.

Rental Housing Under Scrutiny (BRCN)

By KARA L. RICHARDSON, Staff Writer

Bridgewater (NJ) Courier-News, January 28, 2007

Central Jersey towns consider tougher rules for overcrowding

In the battle against illegal overcrowding in rental properties -- often called "stacking" -- some Central Jersey communities are considering tougher laws, some of which require the registration of individual tenants and their landlords.

That's the case in Raritan Borough, for instance, where officials might require landlords to certify the number of tenants in each rental unit, Mayor Jo-Ann Liptak said.

"We're going after the landlord who thinks he can exploit these people," Liptak said of tenants who are stacked.

Flemington, North Plainfield and Bernards also are considering stronger laws, although not everyone thinks they are necessary.

"I think there are enough regulations that adequately regulate the situation already," said William Johnson, municipal prosecutor in Somer-ville, where last week a landlord was fined for allowing a tenant to sleep in a basement.

Tougher laws might also stir the debate over whether overcrowding laws inordinately penalize Hispanics.

"Most of these ordinances go substantially beyond traditional health codes," said Stuart Deutsch, dean of Rutgers School of Law in Newark. "They are less about housing and more about who is being housed."

The ordinances, he said, come during this "very hot debate right now about immigration, especially related to Hispanics."

Her desire for a stiffer law, Liptak said, is not anti-immigrant. "It's anti-greedy landlord."

What inspections uncover

When housing inspectors uncover an overcrowded rental property, they often find other illegal -- and potentially deadly -- conditions such as:

Full-sized refrigerators and hot plates in bedrooms

Electrical cords strung like spiderwebs

Locks bolting every door

Mattresses in the kitchen and sleeping quarters in a basement or attic with only one way out in case of a fire.

Barry Van Horn, Somerville's fire marshal, has seen children sleeping in closets or in the bottom drawer of a dresser. Once, a woman without heat used coals under her mattress.

"You can't appreciate what this is all about until you see the desperation in their faces," Van Horn said.

Because of the widespread nature of the issue, the New Jersey League of Municipalities is collecting ordinances that deal with residential overcrowding, said Bill Dressel, the league's executive director.

Last week, Dressel said, the league started a immigration committee, and overcrowding will be one of the issues studied.

"There are quality-of-life issues both for the immigrant population and concerns for the residents who are there," Dressel said.

In North Plainfield -- with 5,000 rental units -- Council President Skip Stabile said a discussion about overcrowding laws, begun in 2006, might be resumed this year.

"You're really looking for the number of occupants," Stabile said.

The suggestion to study codes came from from North Plainfield Housing Director Jim Rodino, who wants to inspect an apartment when rented to a new tenant.

Now, municipal officials may inspect a property only when it is sold.

Support from a landlord

Jeffrey Allegar, a Raritan Borough landlord who owns a two-family property, supports overcrowding ordinances. He is required to register as a landlord, and his property is inspected annually.

"That's a good thing," Allegar said. "You're in there, you see are what doing. It's good for everybody. It saves a lot of hassles."

DOJ_NMG_0123505

"The burden should be on the town," he said. "If they make you register, they should check up, too," he said.

Not every community dealing with overcrowding laws is making them tougher.

When Bernardsville wanted to make sure its inspection practices were not discriminatory, it looked to Bound Brook, said Elaine Broyles, Bernardsville's Zoning Code Enforcement official, and adopted Bound Brook's revised guidelines.

In 2004, Bound Brook agreed to reform its inspection practices -- which the U.S. Justice Department said were designed to drive out Hispanics -- in order to end a federal lawsuit.

Among other reforms, Bound Brook translated its property maintenance code into Spanish, gave residents 24 hours notice to correct an illegal living situation and hired a bilingual coordinator to give residents information about housing, property maintenance and redevelopment.

On May 3, 2006, the Plainfield City Council repealed a 2004 overcrowding ordinance after determining that existing ordinances accomplished the same purpose.

When initially adopted, some residents felt it unfairly targeted the city's Hispanic population. The law had required the name and address of the building's owner, managing agent and superintendent; the number of sleeping rooms in each unit and a floor plan; and the number of people living in each unit, including children older than 2.

Matching The Police To The Populace (NYT)

By Allan Richter

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

AS part of an initial push to recruit minority officers to the Long Beach, N.Y., Police Department in 2004, the civil service exam was opened to nonresidents for the first time. That move, police officials said, led to the hiring of a Hispanic woman and an Asian-American man, both New York City police officers.

But the department was unable to hire a police officer who was black in that recruitment drive. “We diversified but were still missing a part of the target population,” said Lt. Bruce Meyer, who heads the recruitment efforts for a department that had no black officers for almost four decades. “At that point I said we have to do more.”

Police departments in suburbs and towns across the region have been putting a new emphasis in recent years on bringing more black and Hispanic officers into their ranks as, census figures show, the white population in the suburbs has declined by 2.1 percent and minority populations have grown in the last five years.

The departments are using different tactics, with mixed success, including tweaking residency requirements and recruiting candidates who live beyond their borders. They are holding civil service tests more frequently, initiating new advertising campaigns and turning to the military for possible candidates.

In Long Beach, where the black population is 6.2 percent, according to the 2000 census, the decision was made to try again with a more ambitious recruiting effort. Lieutenant Meyer said the Police Department persuaded the civil service commission to hold another test a year later, rather than wait the usual four years. This time, posters announcing the test went up in churches, and a recruiting unit was assembled from the department’s few minority officers.

The effort yielded results: Some 750 candidates applied for the new test, up from 341 in the previous round, including more than five times the number of black candidates and three times the number of Hispanics. Two black officers were sworn in to the now 78-member police department last fall. It was the first time in 38 years that Long Beach had hired a black police officer.

Officer Judy Arroyo, who joined the Long Beach department in July 2005, said she had become a de facto point person for Spanish-speaking women enduring domestic abuse. “I’ve seen that people call and request me,” she said. “They see they can connect with me.”

In Bergen County, N.J., Sheriff Leo P. McGuire said his department has also been making a big push to diversify its ranks by changing its recruitment tactics. Instead of limiting job candidates to the county, positions for rank-and-file officers were made available to people statewide for the first time. Last month, the 466-member department swore in eight black officers, seven of them women.

“Now the public is saying this administration means business,” Sheriff McGuire said.

In Paterson, N.J., where Hispanics make up 57 percent of the city’s population and blacks make up 30 percent, the Police Department took the opposite approach by focusing its recruiting efforts within the city’s borders.

In addition, the city’s police force recently agreed to hire “police assistants,” a position created by the New Jersey Department of Personnel five years ago to help municipalities broaden their candidate lists with a more accessible entry-level post.

"We put ads in the local newspapers," said Michael Walker, the department's civilian police director. "We addressed every criminal justice class at Passaic County Community College in Paterson, across the street from our headquarters. We went to the religious community."

As a result, the Paterson police force expects to hire 18 police assistants — most of whom are Hispanic men and women — by the spring, Mr. Walker said.

Maki Haberfeld, chairwoman of the department of law, police science and criminal justice administration at John Jay College of Criminal Justice, said the public feels more comfortable when they know that "people of the same background are represented on the force."

Dr. Haberfeld added, however, "I do not think effective policing in any shape or form is related to someone's race or background."

Some police departments that have failed to increase the number of minority officers have come under scrutiny by the United States Justice Department, which has entered into consent decrees to help oversee the recruiting efforts of a number of departments, including those of both Nassau and Suffolk Counties.

Under such decrees, the Justice Department typically helps shape the content of civil service exams. But Steve Levy, the Suffolk County executive, said the department's input had done little to raise the number of minority officers.

"The test was ridiculous in that it was basing questions on biographical information and very subjective things such as your favorite color — things that had no correlation to one's ability to be a good police officer," he said.

In addition, Mr. Levy said the Justice Department vetoed his idea in 2005 to recruit police officers from Suffolk communities where crime was high. "Unfortunately we have a Justice Department that tells us what we can't do," he said, "but doesn't tell us what we can do."

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the consent decree with Suffolk County, agreed to in 1986, has resulted in a "significant improvement" in police minority hiring. In 1983, when the Justice Department first lodged complaints of discrimination against the county, only 25 women, or less than 1 percent of the force, and only 59 blacks and Hispanics, or 2.3 percent, were on the county police force.

In 2005, there were 320 women, or 12.1 percent, and 262 blacks and Hispanics, or 9.9 percent.

"Our contact with the county is through the county attorney, who has not conveyed to us any criticism regarding this department's input into the county's civil service examinations, or this department's monitoring of the consent decree we have with the county," Ms. Magnuson said.

The proposal from Mr. Levy that the Justice Department struck down, she added, would have violated nondiscrimination provisions of the consent decree and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by instituting a racial quota. Mr. Levy's plan sought "an absolute preference" to fill 20 percent of entry-level police officer slots from minority communities, she said.

Ambitious and focused efforts do not always get results. Five years ago, the Hartford police began administering the department's civil service test more frequently and enlisted community leaders to help recruit candidates.

But Lester McCoy, the assistant police chief, conceded that those efforts had apparently not worked. The 420-member force is about 60 percent white, 20 percent Hispanic and 18 percent black, just as it was five years ago.

"We're not doing any worse, but were not doing any better," he said, adding that the force has not had the budget to dispatch its own recruiting teams to minority colleges and other potential sources.

Church-state "Wall" Coming Back Down? (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof ..."

the First Amendment of the Bill of Rights to the U.S. Constitution, which took effect Dec. 15, 1791

U.S. courts rule about two times each week on cases involving whether prayers can be included in a high school graduation ceremony, an image of Jesus Christ can be displayed in a public school or a Ten Commandments monument can remain in a government building or public park.

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) says such prayers and displays violate the principle of separation of church and state.

The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, estimates the frequency of such rulings between 104 and 156 annually.

Mr. Lynn, whose group often gets involved in the cases, says they represent only a small fraction of incidents that arise.

"Most of these cases never even make it to court," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0123507

The ACLU, which routinely takes on such cases in federal court, has scored some important victories in the church-state area.

Those victories include the 1992 U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Lee v. Weisman, which struck down school-sponsored prayers at public-school graduation ceremonies.

Another was the court's 2000 decision in Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, which struck down a Texas school district's policy of permitting students to vote on selecting a classmate to lead prayers before football games.

The tide started to turn in June 2005, when the Supreme Court ruled that a granite monolith on the grounds of the Texas state Capitol in Austin featuring the Ten Commandments -- along with Jewish and patriotic symbols -- did not violate the First Amendment's ban on an establishment of religion.

Francis Manion, senior counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice (ACLJ), says that with its 5-4 opinion in Van Orden v. Perry, the high court "did away with the idea that there is something constitutionally radioactive about the Ten Commandments."

In a December 2005 ruling about a Kentucky courthouse's display of the Ten Commandments, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals held that the phrase "separation of church and state" is an "extra-constitutional construct ... [that] has grown tiresome." The court ruled that the display was allowed because it was "part of an otherwise secular exhibit."

Since then, the ACLJ, a public-interest law firm that specializes in religious-liberty cases, has won "most of the Ten Commandments court cases" in which it has participated, Mr. Manion says.

History of the 'wall'

Many Americans wrongly assume the words "separation of church and state" are included in the U.S. Constitution.

In fact, the phrase "wall of separation between church and state" was first used by Thomas Jefferson in a letter he wrote to the Danbury Baptist Association in Danbury, Conn., on Jan. 1, 1802, 10 months after his presidential inauguration.

An analysis of that letter -- now housed at the Library of Congress -- as well as other documents from this nation's earliest years and nearly 150 years of legal decisions strongly suggest that Jefferson and his contemporaries would be at odds with the courts today regarding church-state issues, according to the Rev. Bryan Fischer, a minister and executive director of the Idaho Values Alliance in Boise.

Mr. Fischer says Jefferson coined the phrase that some judges are calling overused to "reassure" the Connecticut Baptists that they had "no need to fear oppression from the federal government or its intrusion into the free exercise of religion because the Constitution had erected a 'wall of separation between church and state.' "

"In other words, Jefferson's wall was designed to protect the church from the state, not the other way around," and it "was never intended to insulate the state from the influence of the church," Mr. Fischer wrote in a 2005 opinion piece published in the Idaho Statesman.

Mr. Lynn disagrees and calls opponents "historical revisionists."

"Thomas Jefferson was a longtime champion of not having the state involved in religion," says Mr. Lynn, an ordained minister with the United Church of Christ. "He and James Madison erected a framework for separation of church and state. ... It's clear the majority of the framers of the Constitution had no interest in having government accommodate religion."

Mr. Manion says the two sides in the church-state debate agree that the Founding Fathers opposed allowing government "to make any religion obligatory" or giving one religion preferential treatment over another.

"But we know the framers of the Constitution permitted acknowledgement of religion in the public square. Given the things Jefferson said and did, he would be sued by the ACLU if he were president today," he says.

The 'wall' in court

Jefferson's letter to the Baptists was cited by Supreme Court justices for the first time in the 1879 case of Reynolds v. United States.

George Reynolds, a Mormon polygamist, had been convicted of bigamy in the Utah Territory. He said his conviction should be overturned because it was his religious duty as a Mormon to have multiple wives.

Eight justices held that religious duty was not a suitable defense to a criminal indictment. The majority opinion alluded to Jefferson's letter, in which he said there was a distinction between religious belief and action that flowed from religious belief.

The court said it recognized that under the First Amendment, Congress cannot pass a law prohibiting the free exercise of religion. But it noted that a law limiting marriage to one spouse at a time had been in effect since the times of King James I of England, who ruled from 1603 to 1625.

Nonetheless, the Supreme Court case cited by many legal analysts as having the greatest influence on the church-state debate today is Everson v. Board of Education of Ewing Township, N.J., in 1947.

"That's when the Supreme Court yanked the phrase out of an obscure letter Jefferson had written and inserted it in a legal ruling," Mr. Fischer says. "Overnight, it went from being an obscure phrase Jefferson had written" to being used in a way its author had not intended, he said.

In his lawsuit, Arch R. Everson charged that a New Jersey law authorizing local school boards to pay the costs of transportation to and from private and parochial schools violated the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution and the state constitution because it allowed indirect aid to religion.

In its ruling, the Supreme Court applied the Establishment Clause to the states through the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment. The latter says: "No state shall make or enforce any law ... nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

However, the court was divided 5-4 in its decision that the New Jersey law allowing reimbursement to parochial-school students was constitutional.

Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas, one of the five who signed the majority opinion in the Everson case, acknowledged in a 1970 ruling that the Everson case turned the entire issue of religious liberty on its head.

By incorporating the 14th Amendment into the Establishment Clause, Justice Douglas wrote, the high court "reversed the historic position that the foundation of those liberties rested largely in state law," not federal legislation.

Rob Boston, spokesman for Americans United, commemorated next month's 60th anniversary of the Everson ruling in the January issue of Church & State, his group's newsletter.

His article describes Everson as the "most important church-state decision you never heard of," which "kicked off the culture wars that still exist today."

"The importance of Everson can hardly be overstated," Mr. Boston wrote. "Virtually every case that deals with the 'establishment of religion' cites Everson. Federal judges use it as a touchstone when seeking guidance in contentious clashes over the proper role of religion in government. Its language appears in countless lower court rulings and legal briefs."

Debating Everson

However, there is disagreement about the importance of the Everson ruling among legal scholars.

Bruce Fein, a lawyer who specializes in constitutional law, is a sharp critic of the Everson ruling and has made his opinions known in columns published in The Washington Times and other newspapers.

"It sows more doubts than it dispels," he says. "If there really was a wall separating church and state, a city fire department couldn't even put out a fire at a church."

Besides, Mr, Fein says, "Thomas Jefferson never insinuated the wall was at the state level."

But Jonathan Turley, professor of law at George Washington University, contends that "it makes a lot of sense to have a system where we all have basic [religious] rights, no matter what state we are in."

Mr. Manion says it's "hard to believe that in a country where 80 [percent] to 90 percent of the people believe in God" that the government forbids the acknowledgement "of the widespread nature of this belief."

John Whitehead, president of the Rutherford Institute, a public-interest law firm that takes on cases it sees as limiting religious freedom, says he sees several "ominous trends" in the church-state area.

"In the past few years, we've seen judges put more emphasis on something they call the government's speech doctrine, which limits free speech on government property," including prayer, Mr. Whitehead says.

He cites two cases the Rutherford Institute is working on, in which people were denied the right to pray in public ceremonies or meetings.

One case involves a City Council member in Fredericksburg, Va., who was told he could not say "in Jesus' name" in a prayer at a council meeting.

"So Christians can't pray now in public. It's dangerous," Mr. Whitehead says..

Microsoft Faces New Antitrust Clash With Vista (AFP)

AFP, January 28, 2007

BRUSSELS (AFP) - Microsoft risks a new showdown with EU regulators with the roll-out of its Vista operating system nearly three years after a landmark antitrust ruling against the US software giant, officials have said.

After numerous delays, Microsoft's next-generation Windows Vista operating system is to make its debut with home computer users on January 30 after it was shipped to business clients in November.

While Microsoft readies to roll out its first revamped operating system in five years, rivals are preparing to do battle again with the IT colossus after already winning one victory in March 2004 with an EU antitrust ruling against the company.

"With Vista, Microsoft has clearly chosen to ignore the fundamental principles of the commission's March 2004 decision," said Simon Awde, the chairman of the ECIS trade association that opposes Microsoft in its antitrust troubles.

ECIS, which includes such tech giants as Oracle, IBM and Nokia, filed a complaint with EU regulators in February 2006 targeting Vista and Office and updated their action with details on Vista last month.

"We are in the process of examining this complaint," said European Commission spokesman for competition issues Jonathan Todd.

Microsoft did not respond to requests for comment on the complaint when contacted on Friday.

The US company has long clashed with the commission over the crushing market power of its existing Windows operating system and was fined a record 497 million euros (642 million dollars) in a landmark March 2004 antitrust ruling.

In addition to fining Microsoft, the EU ordered the company to sell a version of its Windows operating system without Media Player software and to divulge the software protocols underpinning Windows for makers of rival products.

Microsoft challenged the 2004 ruling in the EU's second-highest court in April and the judges are expected to hand down a decision in the first half of the year.

Frustrated with Microsoft's defiance of some of its demands, the commission in July slapped daily fines adding up to 280.5 million euros over the six-month period of the penalty for failing to fully respect the 2004 antitrust ruling.

Microsoft is appealing against the charges.

Meanwhile, the threat of further fines remains as the commission has not yet decided whether Microsoft is meeting its demands.

The company's rivals warn that, as with earlier Windows versions, Vista is designed in a way that makes it difficult for them to build software that is interoperable with it, hampering competition in effect.

"Vista is the first step in Microsoft's strategy to extend its market dominance to the Internet," ECIS' Awde said.

ECIS claims that a computer language Microsoft has written to replace the current standard for publishing pages on the Internet, HTML, was designed to be dependent on Windows, making operations with other platforms difficult.

The association says that Microsoft is also to release a document file format that only operates seamlessly on Microsoft's Office platform unlike the existing format, Open Document Format.

The European Commission is unlikely to open a new antitrust front against Microsoft over Vista before the EU court gives its decision on the regulators' 2004 ruling.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Dearborn Waste Treatment Company Execs Face Myriad Of Dumping Charges (DEARPG)

By Cristen Kis, Press & Guide Newspapers

Dearborn (MI) Press & Guide, January 28, 2007

DEARBORN - A Dearborn waste treatment company and three former executives were indicted Wednesday and face charges of dumping untreated industrial waste into the Detroit sewer system.

CESI, Comprehensive Environmental Solutions, Inc., a liquid industrial waste treatment and disposal facility at Ford and Wyoming, is accused of violating the Clean Water Act from March 2002 until the present.

A federal grand jury returned a 12-count indictment alleging the company bypassed treatment processes and discharged untreated wastes directly into sewers, in violation of the Clean Water Act and Detroit City Ordinance requirements.

To conceal the misconduct, the indictment charges that employees made false statements and engaged in other surreptitious activities to cover up the violations.

"The federal regime of environmental laws is in place to protect the public and prevent unlawful discharges into our water system," said United States Attorney Stephen J. Murphy. "(Wednesday's) charges demonstrate the commitment of my office, U.S. EPA and the FBI to pursue possible violations of the environmental laws as well as attempts to conceal such violations."

In addition to CESI, three company officials were also indicted. Former president and CEO Bryan S. J. Mallindine, 50, of Carlsbad, Calif.; former president, general manager and sales manager Michael G. Panyard, 44, of Pleasant Ridge, Mich.; and former plant and operations manager Charles D. Long, 41, of Brownstown Township are charged with conspiracy and Clean Water Act violations.

Mallindine is also charged with obstruction of justice and Panyard is facing seven false statement charges.

A fourth employee, former plant manager Donald A. Kaniowski, 37, of Dearborn, pleaded guilty to unlawfully bypassing treatment equipment and discharging untreated liquid wastes into the sewer system, in violation of the Clean Water Act.

If convicted, the employees could face up to five years in prison for each violation of conspiracy or making false statements; up to three years in prison for Clean Water Act violations for unlawfully bypassing treatment equipment or otherwise violating local pretreatment requirements; up to two years in prison for the Clean Water Act violation of tampering with or rendering inaccurate monitoring equipment.

Mallindine also faces up to 10 years in prison for the obstruction of justice charge.

According to the indictment, CESI took over ownership and operations at the Wyoming Street facility in 2002. The facility had a permit to treat liquid waste brought to the facility through a variety of processes and then discharge it to the Detroit sewer system.

The ink, oil and other pollutants discharged are considered harmful, but are not classified as hazardous waste.

"The indictment in this case alleges that the defendants were paid to accept millions of gallons of waste at a time when their storage tanks were already filled to capacity," said David M. Uhlmann, Chief of the Justice Department's Environmental Crimes Section. "The defendants then allegedly discharged the waste into the Detroit sewer system without adequate treatment, which is precisely the type of conduct that the Clean Water Act was enacted to prevent."

The facility contained 12 large, above ground tanks capable of storing more than 10 million gallons of liquid industrial wastes. According to court records, although the facility's storage tanks were at or near capacity, the company continued to accept millions of gallons of liquid wastes it could not adequately treat or store.

The indictment alleges that, in order to reduce costs and maintain storage space at the facility for additional wastes, the defendants often bypassed treatment processes and discharged untreated wastes directly to the sewer.

Untreated and insufficiently-treated industrial wastes discharged into a sanitary sewer can interfere with the operation of a sewage treatment plant, causing a discharge of untreated sewage and other wastes into a lake or river.

If a major storm event causes a sanitary sewer to exceed its capacity, then untreated and insufficiently-treated industrial wastes in that sanitary sewer may discharge directly to lakes and rivers.

CESI also came under scrutiny in April 2002 after a major oil spill dumped about 85,000 gallons of oil into the Rouge River and cost more than $7 million to clean up. That spill — and a 5,000-gallon oil spill in 2004 — were never linked to a source.

Robert Moll, CESI spokesman, told a local television station that the company "fully cooperated with the investigation" of the 2002 spill and continues to believe it was not involved.

Moll also said the company "added a new management team, including two full-time onsite chemists, and voluntarily installed millions of dollars to complete an aggressive campaign to improve operations and engage in more environmentally friendly practices."

The Long Road To Energy Independence (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

President Bush never used the phrase “energy independence” in his State of the Union address last week, and it is just as well. His program for cutting gasoline demand is ambitious in scope, but modest in effect, according to experts.

The reason is that the United States has fallen down a very deep well, and it’s hard to get out. Last year, the United States imported 60 percent of the oil it consumed. If, as Mr. Bush proposes, we cut gasoline consumption 20 percent by 2017 — about 2.1 million barrels a day — then the share of oil imported will fall only by 4 or 5 percentage points.

In fact, the government expects the share of imported oil to fall anyway, to less than 56 percent, because of a rise in domestic production, mostly from the Gulf Coast.

Domestic production has fallen sharply since the mid-1970s, but the Energy Information Administration, which is part of the Energy Department, expects production to rise to almost six million barrels a day by 2017, up from a little over five million barrels a day now.

Mr. Bush is also proposing an increase in fuel-economy standards and an increase in the production of ethanol and other gasoline substitutes, hoping to keep oil consumption relatively steady. Without such intervention, oil consumption is forecast to rise to just over 23 million barrels a day in 2017, from nearly 21 million barrels a day today.

“It’s an enormous challenge,” said John Felmy, the chief economist of the American Petroleum Institute, the industry’s main trade association.

Production of ethanol from corn has already put pressure on food prices, according to some agriculture experts, but Mr. Bush’s plan involves tripling the production of corn ethanol, and making huge amounts of ethanol from cellulose, which is not now done commercially.

Integrating that much ethanol into the fuel supply will involve many more rail-tanker cars or trucks, because ethanol cannot be shipped in conventional pipelines. In addition, the gasoline formula with which it is mixed has to be changed, or the mixture evaporates too easily, causing air pollution.

The actual amount of ethanol produced will depend on what is technically feasible and on the price of oil. But at the rate of change suggested by the Bush plan, energy independence is about a century away.

Top Democrats Still Divided? (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, January 27, 2007

Many of the models displayed at the Washington Auto Show have brought couples together over the years. Did it work for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell, D-Mich.?

The Politico heard differing accounts of the success of the auto date and a subsequent meeting at Pelosi's office in diffusing an escalating battle over the select committee on climate change. (Pelosi wants to create it. Dingell opposes it on the grounds that it would impinge on his committee's jurisdiction.)

A Democratic aide close to Pelosi suggested that the meeting, which also included Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., had been a turning point: "We no longer anticipate a floor battle," the aide said.

But Dingell wasn't so sure. In a memo to his committee members this afternoon, he noted progress in diffusing the dispute:"I am pleased to report that the Speaker agreed to work closely with us when drafting the resolution to create the Select Committee …we will continue working in good faith to find a solution that will satisfy the concerns of our Members while preserving the overall objectives of the Speaker. I am confident this is possible."

But, he added, he's still keeping his firepower at the ready: "If we are unable to satisfy the concerns of this Committee, however, I reserve all options available under the Rules of the House and will request a caucus of the Democratic Members of the Committee to weigh those carefully." Translation: Nancy, I reserve the right to make this ugly for you.

Still, it's unclear whether Dingell has the muscle to win this one on the floor. He'll have some help from Republicans eager to deliver a loss to Pelosi, but a Republican leadership aide conceded that "25 to 35" moderate Republicans likely would break ranks and side with her. So Dingell can only count on around 170 Republican votes, which is a long way from 218 even if every one of the 31 Democratic members of the Energy and Commerce Committee vote with him, which they won't. (Committee member Anna Eshoo, D-Calif., a Pelosi confidante, declared in a closed-door meeting last week that she "doesn't worship at the altar of jurisdiction," according to a Democratic aide.)

Worry Over Expiration Of U.S. Law That Helped Rural Areas (NYT/AP)

MARLINTON, W.Va., Jan. 27 (AP) — The expiration of a federal law that provided $385 million for schools and roads last year in some of the nation's most scenic and rural areas has administrators in 41 states concerned.

In 1908, President Theodore Roosevelt struck a bargain with rural America: In exchange for allowing the creation of national forests, counties would receive 25 percent of the receipts from logging and other resource sales.

In return, the land would be off limits for development and could not be taxed by state and local governments.

For years, financing fluctuated with the price of timber. Recognizing the stress these market fluctuations put on schools, Congress offered a short-term solution, the Secure Rural Schools and Community Self-Determination Act, a six-year financing plan that expired in December.

West Coast states would feel the pain on the largest scale. Last year the program paid Washington $42 million and California $66 million. Oregon took the most, $149 million.

School administrators who have depended on the revenue for the last six years say they may be forced to cut staffs and programs. Without a solution, the counties will revert to the old 25 percent-share formula. But 25 percent of what, the school districts wonder.

"It's un-American for the federal government to walk away from rural communities of America, and we're here to remind them of that commitment," said Bob Douglas, president of the National Forests Counties and Schools Coalition, which estimates that nine million children could be affected.

But with the budget deficit, and spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, it is difficult to gain support for a solution, said Mark Ray, under secretary of natural resources for the Department of Agriculture.

The law will cost West Virginia $2 million if Congress does not agree to reauthorize the program by March.

"It will be very devastating," said James Law, superintendent of schools for Pocahontas County, where more than half of the county cannot be taxed or developed because it lies within Monongahela National Forest.

"We don't have income from homes or businesses because we don't have the population and we don't have the benefit of use of that land for development," Mr. Law said.

West Virginia's state financing for schools is based on the number of students, so low population density hurts the bottom line in rural regions. Rural schools are also spread out over often difficult terrain, meaning districts must pay for long and expensive bus rides.

One Forest Service proposal that remains a possible source of revenue is the sale of 170,000 isolated tracts of national forest lands, Mr. Ray said. So far, though, Congress has been unable to agree how the program should be financed.

Representative Peter A. DeFazio, Democrat of Oregon, has introduced a bill calling for reauthorization of the Community Self-Determination Act through the 2013 fiscal year.

Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, introduced a bill in the Senate to continue the program.

The House legislation has been referred to the committees on agriculture and natural resources.

"It is not just the Pacific Northwest at risk," Mr. DeFazio said last week in a speech on the House floor. "It is hundreds of counties and school districts, from Florida to Maine, all across America, who are at risk."

Mr. Douglas, who is also superintendent of Tehama County schools in California, said administrators in nearby Trinity County — home to Shasta-Trinity National Forest — might have to lay off staff and school nurses and eliminate library services, arts and music programs and counseling.

"If this money goes away," he said, "there are going to be catastrophic changes."

2 Wolf Groups To Lose Endangered Status (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

BILLINGS, Mont., Jan. 27 (AP) — Wolves in the Northern Rockies will be removed from the endangered species list within the next year, the Fish and Wildlife Service said Friday.

The agency also will remove from the list wolves in the Western Great Lakes region. Announcements on the two proposals are planned for Monday, said Sharon Rose, an agency spokeswoman.

If the Northern Rockies' proposal skirts expected legal challenges, it would open wolves in the region to trophy hunting for the first time since an intensive wolf restoration effort began in the late 1980s.

The Great Lakes wolves would be protected from public hunting for at least five years.

The action caps a sharp turnaround for the wolf. By the 1930s, following a prolonged government-sponsored eradication effort, gray wolves were virtually eliminated across the West. The animal was declared endangered in 1974, shortly after passage of the Endangered Species Act.

Federal and state biologists previously have said that each of the states in the Northern Rockies, Montana, Idaho and Wyoming, will be required to maintain a minimum of 100 wolves, including 10 breeding pairs, or the animal would again come under federal protection.

Tribes In Texas, Elsewhere, Oppose Bid To Change Gaming (AP)

By Garry Mitchell, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 28, 2007

ATMORE, Ala. — The melodic bing-bing-bing on the electronic bingo machines at the always-open Poarch Creek entertainment center in south Alabama has kept players busy and the parking lot crowded.

Would they keep playing if the game took a little longer and required more players? Or would they head to gaming centers elsewhere, off tribal land?

These questions have poured into the National Indian Gaming Commission in response to its proposal to change such electronic games, a move that Indian tribal leaders in at least 10 states, including Texas and Alabama, fear could cause hundreds of millions of losses in annual revenues and hundreds of jobs.

"These proposed rules are unnecessary and should be significantly revised to reduce new layers of federal bureaucracy," Chadwick Smith, principal chief of the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma, has told the NIGC.

With advances in technology, the NIGC says the line between Class II games, such as bingo, and Class III games, such as Vegas-style slot machines, has blurred. The commission, joined by the Justice Department, has proposed new uniform standards for Class II games that are widely used in Indian gaming centers.

Tribal leaders contend the change would cause bingo games to be less entertaining, played at half the current pace by requiring a two-second delay between each ball draw and, in one example, requiring a customer to wait for five additional players instead of the current one additional player.

An additional wait doesn't sit well with some players.

DOJ_NMG_0123513

"To me, it would reduce your chances of winning," said James Stromer, 73, of Pensacola, Fla. He lives about an hour's drive from Atmore, and about two hours from the slots at Mississippi Gulf Coast casinos.

"Class III machines are best for me, like they have in Biloxi," he said on a recent January afternoon.

Bryan Couch, 35, who lives on the Creek reservation in south Alabama, said he's opposed to adding minutes to the playing time because he's usually in a hurry.

"Sometimes I don't have a whole lot of time. I try my luck and get on out," he said.

NIGC spokesman Shawn Pensoneau said he did not have a date for a final ruling on the proposed change.

"This being an extremely important issue to the Indian gaming industry, the commission is carefully reviewing all of the comments, recommendations and concerns before publishing a final rule," he said.

Pensoneau said some tribes may agree that a distinction between Class II and Class III games would be beneficial to the industry. "Exactly how the distinction is determined is where the differences arise," he said.

Nationwide, the new-rule scenario could reduce gaming revenue by $142.7 million, with an additional loss of $9.6 million in non-gaming revenue, according to an independent analysis of the proposal for the NGIC by Alan Meister of the Los Angeles-based Analysis Group, Inc. The analysis also says about 458 tribal member jobs would be lost.

In Alabama and other states without tribal-state compacts, Class III games are not allowed. Tribal leaders say the changes to Class II games will drive away players, leaving tribes with little recourse but to consider whether to continue operations.

Poarch Creek Chairman Buford L. Rolin of Atmore has asked the commission to withdraw the proposed rule changes and would like to avoid any litigation over the issue.

Rolin estimates the Poarch Creeks, Alabama's only federally recognized tribe, would have lost more than $65 million last year in net income out of its $108.3 million in revenue if the rule change had been in place.

Because of the regulatory uncertainty, he said, the tribe also may be forced to shelve its $500 million expansion plans for two of its existing gaming centers in Alabama. The tribe has 2,100 machines at three locations.

"These numbers may appear dramatic, but when the proximity of competition is considered they may be conservative," Rolin said in a letter last year to NIGC Chairman Philip N. Hogen in Washington, D.C. "In short, the viability of our gaming enterprises is at stake."

The NIGC has been trying to determine which games fall under tribal-state compacts and which do not. Rolin says if the Creeks' machines fall into the Class III category under the proposed standards, the tribe will seek to continue using them for three years under an exception to the NIGC rule.

In 2004, the NIGC identified certain Poarch Creek games as "questionable." Rolin said the tribe removed 76 games and modified about 600 others to satisfy the NIGC's concerns. That action resulted in a 34 percent decrease in revenue and a 56 percent decrease in net income, Rolin said.

"There is no game in existence in the Class II gaming industry that would be able to stand up to the proposed standards," said Smith, the Cherokee chief in Oklahoma, in a letter last November to the NIGC.

Under the proposed changes, he said his tribe would be forced to shut down all of its 2,165 Class II games.

Dexter W. Lehtinen of Miami, an attorney for the Miccosukee Tribe in Florida, said the proposed regulations will prohibit the growth of Class II gaming and "micromanages tribal business judgment and regulatory responsibilities." He said the proposals also would eliminate virtually all games that Congress intended to allow as "similar to bingo."

Kickapoo Chairman Juan Garza of Eagle Pass, Texas, said Congress passed the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, in part, to boost tribal economic development.

"Class II gaming has done just that," Garza said in his written comments on the proposed changes. Like Alabama, Texas has no gaming compact with the tribe, which rules out Vegas-style casinos. Because of that, he said, the tribe is wary of any proposals that may undermine the games it operates.

The analysis by Alan Meister's group found that tribes with a viable alternative to Class II machines, such as Vegas-style slot, would not be likely to suffer losses in gaming revenue. These tribes include all of those with Class II machines in Arizona, Florida, Oklahoma, Oregon, and Wyoming, and most tribes with Class II machines in California.

Tribes without a viable alternative to Class II machines would have to adopt lower revenue-generating machines that comply with the proposed changes. These tribes include all of those with Class II machines in Alabama, Alaska, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New York, Texas, South Dakota, Washington and Wisconsin, and the one tribe with Class II-only facility in California.

Veteran players interviewed at the Creeks' Atmore gaming center on Jan. 19 were unaware of the NIGC debate and couldn't quite grasp how it may affect their bingo.

"I just make sure how much money I'm playing," said O. H. Rivers, of Pace, Fla. "Longer you stay on the machine, the happier you are."

Drug War Victories (SDUT)

By Robert J. Caldwell
The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 28, 2007
The battered Tijuana cartel is on the ropes

Mexico and the United States, working together, are steadily dismantling the murderous Tijuana drug cartel, the infamous Arellano Félix Organization. Once among the most powerful and feared criminal syndicates in Mexico, the AFO is now a shambles. Its top leaders are dead or in custody. Most if not all of the AFO leaders now behind bars face trial in the United States, where bribery cannot buy the criminal justice system and intimidation doesn't work.

Mexico's extradition of 11 accused narco-traffickers to the United States a week ago wielded the weapon the cartel leaders fear most. If convicted, they will spend the rest of their lives locked away in maximum security federal prisons. The favors and preferential treatment, the illicit opportunities to continue running their drug empires, even the possibility of escape or early release that their money might buy in Mexico won't be available in the U.S. prison system.

Here, the capos of Mexico's drug mafias will have 50 years or more to sit in their cells reflecting on the untold numbers of murders they ordered, the horrendous torture they routinely sanctioned and the millions of lives blighted or destroyed by their drugs. Under the terms of these extraditions, U.S. authorities must respect Mexico's prohibition on extradition of criminal suspects who would face sentences of death or explicitly stated life terms. Prison sentences of 50 or 60 years would substitute nicely for the latter.

Mexico's extraditions – which included eight drug kingpins, among them two top AFO lieutenants and an AFO assassin, plus the former head of the Gulf cartel – sent the cartels another jarring signal. Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, is more determined than any past Mexican president to break the drug mafias that threaten to turn Mexico into a narco state. After just seven weeks in office, Calderón did what no other Mexican president has done – delivered Mexican drug traffickers en masse to the United States for trial.

The pending defeat of the AFO, implicit in these extraditions and the recent capture by U.S. authorities of AFO leader Javier Arellano Félix, sends a message of hope that Mexico desperately needs. To wit, that the rule of law can yet prevail over the narco-trafficking syndicates that have made Mexico synonymous with drug-war killings (more than 2,000 last year) and massive, systemic corruption of Mexico's police and government at the local, state and federal levels.

Mexico has long been the source or transit country for most of the illicit narcotics on America's streets: cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and heroin. While the plague of smuggled narcotics won't end so long as a lucrative market exists in the United States, defeating Mexico's cartels is nonetheless vital for both countries.

The drug cartels have turned border cities such as Tijuana and Cuidad Juarez into lawless killing grounds. The resulting epidemic of deadly mayhem is a threat on both sides of the border. Over time, the cartels also became stunningly efficient at the mass export of drugs to the United States – quantities of narcotics measured not by the kilo or the ton but by hundreds of tons. In turn, the billions of dollars in illicit drug-trade profits made corruption a veritable underground industry in Mexico.

For reasons of economics, geopolitics, national security and immigration, it is a paramount American interest that Mexico's historic democratization and economic modernization succeed. The drug cartels pose a massive threat to the rule of law that must underpin these reforms.

So, the extradition of AFO figures Ismael Higuera Guerrero, his younger brother Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, and Jose Alberto MÁrquez Esqueda and their delivery to San Diego to face federal charges represent much more than merely a criminal justice matter.

Ismael Higuera, aka “El Mayel,” was the AFO's top lieutenant and director of operations, according to federal indictments, until his capture in Ensenada in 2000 by an elite force of Mexican para-military police. Younger brother Gilberto faces federal charges of running the AFO's Mexicali operations and using kidnapping, torture and murder to protect his drug smuggling. José Alberto MÁrquez, aka “Bat,” is an accused drug trafficker and AFO enforcer.

The Higuera brothers and MÁrquez will join Javier Arellano Félix, the most recent AFO head until his capture in international waters off Baja California last August by the U.S. Coast Guard, in line for trial in federal court here. Francisco

Arellano Félix, the oldest of the Arellano brothers but only a peripheral figure in the cartel, also faces trial on a 1980 drug charge. Francisco was extradited by Mexico in 2006 after serving a dozen years in prison in Mexico.

The U.S. Justice Department is formally requesting the extradition of eight other AFO leaders in custody in Mexico, including the cartel's longtime leader Benjamin Arellano Félix, who was captured in Mexico in 2002.

If, as is now expected, the Calderón government extradites the rest of the AFO leaders to the United States, the cartel's top leadership would stand trial in federal court in San Diego. The evidence against them, painstakingly accumulated over a decade and a half by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and other federal law enforcement agencies, is overwhelming.

That leaves the battered Arellano Félix Organization apparently under the uncertain leadership of the sole Arellano brother still at large, the reclusive Eduardo.

Thanks to years of dedicated and often dangerous work by law enforcement in Mexico and the United States, the AFO's two-decade reign at or near the top of Mexico's drug cartels is ending.

Meanwhile, President Calderón has sent the Mexican army and thousands of federal agents into Tijuana, Cuidad Juarez, the states of Sinaloa and Michoacan and other regions long infested with narco-traffickers. The United States must wish Calderón well, provide maximum cooperation, and continue to press for extradition of all drug traffickers under indictment in the United States.

A counter-narcotics war popularly disparaged as a chronic loser, yet vital to the national interests of both Mexico and the United States, is producing its biggest victories ever.

Gun-safety Center Targets 'corrupt Dealers' (WILNJ)

By Robin Brown, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, January 28, 2007

Mayors group places crime as high priority for meeting

A national group fighting gun violence tied into a mayors conference to push for reform and more federal resources to cut illegal gun sales by "corrupt dealers."

The Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence unveiled its study called "Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking From Licensed Gun Dealers" last week in Philadelphia -- a city struggling with gun violence -- joined by the city's Police Commissioner Sylvester Johnson and others.

The release of the study, which does not directly address Delaware, was timed to precede the start of the 75th winter meeting of the United States Conference of Mayors, running Wednesday through Friday in Washington.

The Brady center cited gun violence as a top issue for mayors across the country.

The mayors group did not make a formal response to the Brady center study.

But crime already had surfaced as No. 2 in the mayors' 10-point legislative agenda on issues impacting cities and families. That agenda first was presented to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, then brought to the full mayors meeting headed by Conference President and Trenton Mayor Douglas H. Palmer.

The mayors are calling for a federal-local partnership to fight crime, including the creation of a federal trust fund that could fund law enforcement deployment, support of local innovations, fight domestic violence and pay for crime-fighting technology. They also back restoration of past federal block grants and policing funding.

The Brady study pointed more directly to the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives. The study concluded the bureau lacks enough resources to inspect licensed gun dealers and that laws should be changed to ease prosecution and increase penalties for gun-sale violations.

The ATF had no immediate response to the study.

ATF Resident Agent in Charge Richard Young, based in Wilmington, said he knows of no agency reports ranking or detailing how Delaware is faring in illegal gun sales or legal sales of guns that later surface with criminals.

He referred questions to the Baltimore regional office, which referred questions to the ATF's Public and Government Affairs Office in Washington, which didn't comment.

Pennsylvania figured centrally in the Brady center study as the state was the site of 11 of 28 case studies it detailed.

The study did not include any Delaware cases among those cited as proof or examples of problems from repeat gun-buying customers and multiple copy gun sales to in-store "straw purchases" of guns for other people, and dealers selling to traffickers at gun shows.

Pennsylvania cases, however, were as close to Delaware as Philadelphia and Willow Grove.

Ohio had five cited cases, while Oklahoma had three, Arizona and Georgia had two each and one was cited in Maine, Virginia, Indiana, Alabama and Florida. Like Delaware, Maryland had none.

DOJ_NMG_0123516

Staffing an issue

The study concluded that the understaffed ATF also faces hurdles pursuing what it called "corrupt dealers."

The agency faces a high threshold of proof for prosecution, but serious record-keeping offenses -- tied to guns ending up in criminals' hands -- are only misdemeanors, the study said.

Separate from the study, the center's legislative and grass-roots affiliate called The Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence recently launched a nationwide effort, the "Campaign Against Illegal Guns." Campaign officials described that as "a landmark multiyear effort to stem the trafficking of guns from licensed gun dealers into the hands of criminals, kids and other prohibited purchasers."

Two years ago, the center's activism arm graded Delaware on state laws to keep firearm violence out of families.

Delaware's report card had a final grade of C. Subject grades ranged from A -- for the state's minimum age of 21 for sale or transfer of handguns and 18 for other firearms -- to a pair of F's.

The F's were for what the Brady group called the state's lack of gun-safety lock and design standards and lack of background checks for secondary private gun sales.

The Brady center and campaign are named for Jim Brady, an aide to former President Ronald Reagan who was shot and seriously injured in a presidential assassination attempt. Later, Brady and his wife became gun-safety advocates and lead the center.

IMMIGRATION:

A Family Apart, A Child In Pain. For What? (STPPP)

By Rubén Rosario

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, January 28, 2007

The federal judge predicted this would happen. So did the doctor and nurse who have treated the little boy since birth.

But their warnings meant nothing. A legal system that proved stubbornly deaf to common sense brushed aside their concerns. All this could have been avoided.

Instead, 16 months after the federal government deported his mother, 3-year-old Cece Lamah finds himself facing months of difficult medical care — mostly on our dime.

Cece, hospitalized in Minneapolis, endures daily pain. One recent afternoon, he asked his dad to remove a needle and tube from his arm because they hurt so much.

Two years ago, U.S. District Judge Donovan Frank, Dr. Stephen Nelson and nurse Jane Hennessy of Children's Hospital in Minneapolis warned in court filings that deporting the boy's mother, Cynthia Lamah, would have a devastating domino effect.

Cece, a U.S. citizen, has sickle cell anemia, a condition that requires constant care and monitoring. His mother was his primary caretaker.

At the time, the boy's father, Daniel Lamah, a native of the Congo granted political asylum in the United States in 1999, worked as a tile setter and had health insurance benefits.

But Cynthia Lamah came here illegally from Germany with a falsified passport. She did so after her requests for a visiting visa and political asylum were denied. Federal officials ordered her deported.

"This could put Daniel's work and the family's financial situation in jeopardy," Nelson and Hennessy wrote in a July 6, 2005, letter filed in court and sent to officials at the Homeland Security Department and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. "Sending Cece, a United States citizen, to Cameroon, with his mother would also put him at high risk."

Frank, who reviewed a last-minute request for a reprieve, concluded he had no legal standing to block a Justice Department immigration judge's deportation order. He nevertheless criticized the move on practical and moral grounds.

"This is a sad day for those who believe that when a judge adheres even-handedly to his or her oath of office, justice will prevail and the public interest will be served," Frank wrote. "To the extent that a civilized and democratic society is judged by the way in which it treats and protects its most vulnerable members, it has failed today."

Here's what has transpired since my 2005 column on the family's plight.

Cynthia, who suffered a miscarriage while detained at the Ramsey County jail in July 2005, was deported two months later to Cameroon. She now lives with one of her husband's sisters in nearby Guinea.

In December 2005, Daniel Lamah was laid off by his longtime employer, a Twin Cities construction company.

"They told me it was because of a work slowdown," Daniel Lamah, 41, said last week inside the hospital room that has turned into his makeshift home for the past two weeks. "I suspected, because some friends still work there, that it might have had to do because I had to take time out three times to find day care or take my child to the hospital."

Unemployed, with no family here and unable to find an adequate sitter to tend to his son's needs, Lamah made a choice in February 2006 that he dreaded: taking his son to Africa to stay with his mom.

"It was a risk, because I knew that the doctors there had little knowledge about (sickle cell anemia)," he said. "We took extra medication, antibiotics, and I felt I could come back and find a job and bring him back."

He returned to the Twin Cities in May. He has not found work. Meanwhile, his son underwent what Nelson describes as questionable and damaging surgeries to alleviate bone swelling in his body.

"Had that happened here, it would be malpractice, and I would lose my license," Nelson said, adding that the life expectancy of a child with sickle cell anemia in West Africa is less than five years, as opposed to 50 in the United States.

The surgeries apparently led to bacterial infections that have significantly attacked the boy's bone structure, particularly his upper arm and left leg.

Daniel Lamah flew to Guinea on Dec. 23 to bring his son back here. A family physician took one look at the kid and ordered him sent to Children's.

"I was horrified when I saw him," Nelson said, his anger palpable. "His left femur is essentially destroyed. He hasn't walked in about a year. He will need months of IV antibiotics and a blood transfusion every three to four weeks.

"Compared to just taking care of a child with sickle cell anemia, the medical expenses now for him, that the taxpayers are going to pay, is just astronomical. And this boy has suffered both physical and emotional trauma."

But hey, we followed the law, didn't we? We got rid of another illegal alien.

Though disappointed at how his life is going, Daniel Lamah still clings to the concept of the American dream.

"I'm still dreaming," he says. "I still love and am grateful for this country."

The dream is what he had before this entire nightmare — a steady income, a home in Brooklyn Center bought before thoughts of bearing or raising children or having his wife come here from Germany. Now he's in danger of losing the home as well.

Unlike his countryman Dikembe Mutombo, the Houston Rockets center deservedly singled out for praise last week by President Bush during his State of the Union speech, Daniel Lamah is not 7-foot-2 and can't dunk a basketball.

If he could, the government would have found some way to stretch or break the rules and keep Cynthia Lamah here, raising her kid. You can bank on that.

Instead, Daniel Lamah is still waiting for the green card he applied for more than six years ago. He has no money to hire a lawyer to even inquire about it.

Michele Garnett McKenzie, director of Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights' refugee and immigrant program, is looking into the Lamahs' situation. She said Daniel Lamah cannot apply to get his wife back here until he receives his green card and becomes a naturalized U.S. citizen.

Even so, she said, the fact that Cynthia Lamah was deported means she must wait at least 10 years before she can be allowed to reunite here with her husband.

"He has been through a lot," said McKenzie, who knows of Daniel Lamah's experiences in his native land. "He was a (Congolese) government worker who was jailed, placed in solitary confinement and forced to drink his own urine because he refused to shoot at innocent civilians."

Daniel Lamah doesn't want handouts. He wants a job in order to take care of himself and his son. On this morning, however, his focus rests squarely on Cece, crying from hunger because he is scheduled for surgery to have an IV tube placed in his chest.

A nurse walks into the room and asks Daniel Lamah whether he would prefer to have his son wheeled out on a cart.

"No," he responds as he gently drapes Cece over his right shoulder.

"I'll carry him there. It's no problem."

Minnesota's Guard: Eyes On The Border (MINNST)

By Jean Hopfensperger

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 28, 2007

SANTA TERESA, N.M. -- As dusk fell over the desert, silhouetting distant mountains in red, Specialist Thomas Bolinger pointed binoculars toward the border and watched for anything suspicious.

DOJ_NMG_0123518

Soon the Minnesota National Guardsman saw something: car headlights nearing a Mexican ranch a mile away. Then the headlights clicked off. More illegal migrants about to sneak into the United States? Bolinger grabbed his hand-held radio and alerted the U.S. Border Patrol.

It's a routine task in his unusual new mission.

Across the nation's 1,300-mile border with Mexico, in a no-man's land of cactus and tumbleweed, thousands of National Guard soldiers are now playing a front-line role in the divisive fight over illegal immigration. Bolinger is among the first wave of Minnesota Guard members trying to stop the more than 1 million migrants who attempt or make illegal crossings each year -- a tide that's flowing up to Minnesota and bringing both benefits and burdens.

"You can see how they just want to make a better life for themselves," Sgt. Ryan Clark, of Byron, Minn., said from his outpost in Deming, N.M. "But there's a [legal] way to do that."

The National Guard's assignment, dubbed "Operation Jump Start," is part of a broad crackdown along the southwestern border that President Bush initiated last year.

Another controversial step in that plan began last week: construction of a massive fence and other border barriers. Meanwhile, in his State of the Union address last week, Bush also revived his push for a guest-worker program and said that immigration reform is one of his priorities this year.

Federal officials say the National Guard's deployment, which began months ago for some state units, reduced border arrests in the last three months of 2006 by 26 percent from California to Texas -- to about 153,000.

"It's gone extremely well," said Craig Duehring, a Mankato native who is the Pentagon's principal deputy assistant secretary overseeing reserve affairs. "In each border patrol region, the number of arrests has gone down."

But some immigration experts say the military build-up is forcing illegal immigrants either to find more remote crossing points or to rely more on smuggling networks that abuse and exploit them. Others say it does nothing to address the root causes of illegal immigration.

"When you resort to putting the military on the border, you're admitting to the failure of the system you've set up," said Kathleen Walker, an immigration attorney from El Paso and president-elect of the American Immigration Lawyers Association.

Long, watchful days and nights

About 80 Minnesota Guard soldiers took up positions on the border here in New Mexico three weeks ago. Another 120 were deployed this weekend.

Minnesota is one of 47 states and territories answering the president's call. Last summer, Gov. Tim Pawlenty said he would deploy the state's Guard to the border because illegal immigration was "nearly out of control" and the level of border enforcement was "embarrassing."

National Guard troops from other states are erecting fences, repairing Border Patrol vehicles and building border barriers against cars. Minnesota troops are strictly doing surveillance.

They spend long days and nights perched in mobile watchtowers high above the desert or stand next to their Humvees armed with binoculars and radios.

The soldiers are from the Albert Lea-based D Company, 2nd Battalion, 135th infantry. Many of them have served in Afghanistan, Kosovo or Iraq. Border duty, they say, is an unusual change of pace.

"It's a heck of a lot easier here," said company commander Capt. Eric DiNatale, 35, of Lake City.

Last week, DiNatale's soldiers were divided between Santa Teresa, an area about 15 miles west of El Paso, and Deming, about 70 miles northwest. Wearing camouflage fatigues, the Guard members in Santa Teresa could be spotted along Hwy. 9, which runs parallel to the Mexican border. Their olive green tents and turquoise portable toilets offered a hint of color in the otherwise drab desert.

Across the vast desert, it's nearly impossible to distinguish where Mexico ends and the United States begins. No fence. No Rio Grande. Just endless miles of rocky, rolling terrain of sand and shrubs.

The Guard members around Deming were further inland, watching for illegal immigrants who had already slipped into New Mexico and were on their way north. Relaxing at their new base, most of the Guard members said they had yet to spot anyone illegally crossing the border.

But Sgt. Clark said he had witnessed a crossing a day earlier. He was checking on soldiers at their surveillance posts, wind-swept from unexpected cold hitting the region, when they noticed a figure on a hilltop about 50 meters away.

It was an elderly man wearing a backpack and worn-out jacket and boots, Clark said.

Realizing he had been spotted, the man walked toward the soldiers to turn himself in. He stopped, took off his hat and fanned his face, Clark said.

The Minnesota Guard notified nearby Border Patrol agents, whose white and green vehicles whizzed to the scene. Within a half hour, Clark said, 10 people were arrested.

In that instance and all others, the Guard's rules of engagement were simple -- identify suspicious activity and report it to the Border Patrol. Guard members' weapons can only be used for self-defense.

What Clark witnessed was a typical border crossing, but others are more elaborate, said Doug Mosier, a spokesman for the U.S. Customs & Border Protection Agency.

Illegal immigrants have strapped wood to the bottom of their shoes, with animal hoofs attached to the bottom of the wood, to prevent Border Patrol agents from spotting their tracks. Some migrants also sweep up their tracks in the sand with a branch after each step. And some walk backwards toward the border, Mosier said.

Others have come through legitimate border crossings disguised as priests, military officers and even clowns. One group dressed in Lycra and tried to pass themselves off as a bicycle team, he said.

"You have to respect the ingenuity," Mosier said.

The Border Patrol has its own tricks. It places portable sensors, triggered by movement or contact, in areas with frequent illegal crossings. It uses cameras, infrared spotlights and helicopters. Border Patrol vehicles also continually drag tires over the sandy trails that criss-cross the desert so fresh footprints can easily be seen.

Permanent barriers

The National Guard's new presence on the border is making a big difference, said Larry Jones, the Border Patrol liaison with Operation Jump Start in the El Paso/New Mexico area.

In New Mexico and western Texas, border arrests dropped 38 percent in the last months of 2006, as compared to the previous year, Jones said. Soldiers also have built more than three miles of permanent vehicle barriers on the border just west of Columbus, N.M., he said.

Across the border from there, the town of Palomas, Mexico, now has many empty hotel rooms and restaurants because far fewer illegal immigrants are passing through, said Eduardo Correo, owner of the San Carlos Hotel there.

"People don't know much about the National Guard," said Correo, whose business is down about 60 percent. "They just think of them as the military. And that makes people scared."

Immigrant advocacy groups along the border say the presence of soldiers disturbs them because it implies that illegal immigrants are a dangerous enemy. The U.S. border is not a battlefield, they say, and the people crossing are overwhelmingly just ordinary people seeking a better life.

For more than 30 years, Ruben Garcia has run a shelter for illegal immigrants in El Paso. The newly tightened border security, he said, is merely rerouting border-crossers or causing them to wait to "see how this plays out."

Among those watching and waiting is Victor Hernandez, 40, who was in Juárez, Mexico, one recent day selling newspapers next to the wide bridge that connects his city to Texas. Downtown El Paso is so close he can read the signs on the stores and see what sidewalk mannequins are wearing.

Like many Mexicans, Hernandez has slipped into Texas for years, worked in agriculture or as a day laborer, and saved some money before heading back home to his family in Mexico. He has seen the new fences, the helicopters and the troops. He said he thinks the solution is for people like him to be able to cross legally and work -- not sending more soldiers.

"It's getting harder to cross," Hernandez said. "But people will keep trying anyway."

Study Of Immigrants Links Lighter Skin And Higher Income (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

NASHVILLE, Jan. 27 (AP) — Light-skinned immigrants in the United States make more money on average than those with darker complexions, and the chief reason appears to be discrimination, a researcher says.

The scholar, Joni Hersch, a professor of law and economics at Vanderbilt University, looked at a government survey of 2,084 legal immigrants to the United States from around the world and found that those with the lightest skin earned an average of 8 percent to 15 percent more than similar immigrants with much darker skin.

“On average,” Dr. Hersch said, “being one shade lighter has about the same effect as having an additional year of education.”

The study also found that taller immigrants earned more than shorter ones, with an extra inch of height associated with a 1 percent increase in income.

Other researchers said the findings were consistent with other studies on color and pointed to a skin-tone prejudice that went beyond race.

Dr. Hersch took into consideration other factors that could affect wages, like English-language proficiency, education, occupation, race or country of origin, and found that skin tone still seemed to make a difference in earnings. That meant that if two similar immigrants from Bangladesh, for example, came to the United States at the same time, with the same occupation and ability to speak English, the lighter-skinned one would make more money on average.

"I thought that once we controlled for race and nationality, I expected the difference to go away," Dr. Hersch said, "but even with people from the same country, the same race, skin color really matters."

Although many cultures show a bias toward lighter skin, she said her analysis showed that the skin-color advantage was not based on preferential treatment for light-skinned people in their country of origin. The bias, she said, occurs in the United States.

Communities Quiet On Bond Probes (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, January 28, 2007

NEW YORK -- Cities and towns across the United States are being investigated by the Internal Revenue Service and keeping the investigations secret from taxpayers.

The IRS sent more than 100 letters last year to local governments from California to Pennsylvania, saying bonds they sold may be subject to federal taxes, said Charles Anderson, who led the field operations for the IRS's tax-exempt bond division until this month. Fewer than a quarter of the municipalities disclosed the probes.

"The entire market is hampered by that lack of information," said Martha Haines, chief of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Office of Municipal Securities. With municipal bond sales averaging $30 million each, 100 letters indicates as much as $3 billion is under scrutiny.

Bond audits cost taxpayer-funded agencies more than $100 million from 2001 to 2005, according to IRS data. Abuses first spotted by the agency led the Justice Department to issue more than a dozen subpoenas last year in the broadest probe to date of the municipal bond market.

The IRS has focused on whether municipalities paid banks inflated fees to invest proceeds from bond sales before the money was used for roads, schools, sewers, and other projects. Local governments are required to return most profits from investments as taxes, so higher payments to banks erode IRS revenue. US prosecutors are checking whether banks violated antitrust rules by fixing prices of the investment products.

State and local governments raise $400 billion a year in the municipal bond market, borrowing at lower rates than corporations or the federal government because debt payments are exempt from taxes.

Bonds that lose tax-exempt status usually fall in value and increase a municipality's financing costs, so local governments agree to pay IRS fines 95 percent of the time rather than risk a challenge, according to Anderson.

"We need to have more information," said Richard Ciccarone, chief research officer at McDonnell Investment Management in Oak Brook, Ill. , which oversees $11 billion.

"We need to know which deals are being targeted and why. We as investors have to know if there's a pattern" to the types of deals that draw IRS scrutiny, he said.

The Budget Illusion (NYT)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

In the State of the Union speech, President Bush said that the budget deficit had been cut in half from 2004 to 2006. Not quite. The deficit declined, but not by half, from $412 billion to $248 billion. If you measure it as a percentage of the economy, Mr. Bush was off by an amount equal to about $15 billion.

Then, Mr. Bush greatly compounded his otherwise modest exaggeration by taking credit for the reduction, when the deficit really fell despite his policies, not because of them. The distinction is crucial, to understand both the current mess — in which debt is mounting just as huge obligations are coming due for Medicare and Social Security — and how best to get out of it.

The drop in the deficit over the past few years was due largely to the cyclical recovery from the earlier recession, and to a boost in revenue when temporary business tax cuts expired after 2004.

Mr. Bush, meanwhile, has pursued a single-minded strategy of spending more while slashing taxes. That is the opposite of deficit reduction; it has made the budget hole deeper than it would have been. Still, Mr. Bush wants you to believe that tax cuts caused the economic recovery, and thus the budget improvement. If you follow that logic, the key to continued improvement would be continued tax cuts, and that is just what Mr. Bush called for last week. He conjured a bright future in which the deficit disappears after he leaves office, without anyone ever having to raise taxes.

That was the speech, and then there is reality, which came knocking within days when the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office released its annual 10-year budget outlook. The outlook is for a cumulative deficit of $2.9 trillion to $3.4 trillion — about $300 billion a year — if, as Mr. Bush wishes, the tax cuts are extended beyond their scheduled expiration in 2010 and tax relief continues for Americans wrongly afflicted by the alternative minimum tax. In arriving at its estimate, the budget agency also assumed that costs for the war in Iraq would start going down next year, an assumption that, if proved wrong, would result in even higher deficits.

In the absence of overt tax increases, that leaves Mr. Bush only three ways to erase the deficit. He would have to make pie-in-the-sky assumptions of revenue growth, which would be dicey in any event, but folly at a time when the economy is slowing. He would have to renege on his pledge to protect taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax, a huge backdoor tax increase. Or he would have to persuade lawmakers to make cuts in spending even more draconian than those already dodged by the previous Republican-controlled Congress.

Fortunately, such cuts are necessary only if one accepts Mr. Bush's premise that taxes must never rise under any circumstances. That is clearly a false premise. Mr. Bush's tax cuts should largely be allowed to expire. Facing that truth is not a fiscal challenge, it's a political one.

Mr. Bush will not meet it. But a future president and Congress will have to.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Lawyer Suited For Tough Inquiries To Replace Harriet Miers (AAS)

By Ken Herman, WASHINGTON BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, January 28, 2007

Democrats' rise created need to replace White House counsel, officials say.

WASHINGTON — White House Counsel Harriet Miers, President Bush's longtime go-to lawyer, is being replaced by a longtime Washington lawyer viewed as more suited for the rough-and-tumble of congressional investigations to come.

For 13 years, Bush had turned to Miers when he needed a personal lawyer, a Texas Lottery Commission leader, a key White House aide and a Supreme Court nominee.

She retains the president's respect and friendship, but three cabinet members, all longtime friends of Miers', said the Democrats' rise contributed to Miers' demise.

The nation's top diplomat put it diplomatically. "Changed circumstances require changed talents," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

The changed circumstances include anticipated Democrat- led congressional investigations of the Bush White House.

When Miers leaves this week, Fred Fielding will become White House counsel, an office in which he worked during the Reagan and Nixon administrations, making him a veteran of the Watergate and Iran-Contra investigations.

Just what the president needs, some say.

Josh Bolten, Bush's chief of staff, acknowledged last week in a National Public Radio interview that the White House is gearing up for "some tough oversight hearings and so on."

In an interview Friday, Miers shed no light on why she is leaving. "I had a series of discussions with (Bolten), and we both concluded that it was time to make a change in the counsel's office," she said.

Asked about Rice's comment, Miers said, "I think the role of the counsel's office is always to guide the presidency in the areas where legal issues are implicated, and to that extent the role will remain the same.

"But every day was different when I was here, and I'm sure every day will be different when I'm not," said Miers, a former Dallas lawyer who has not decided what she will do when she leaves the White House.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, both longtime friends of Miers' dating back to their work for Bush in Texas, agreed that the new Washington reality contributed to the need for a new top White House lawyer.

Gonzales, who preceded Miers as White House counsel, said, "There are others who have dealt with these kinds of issues before, people that have more experience with them than even I do."

Bringing Fielding on board is part of making sure "we have the best assets, the best tools, to deal with those challenges," Gonzales said.

Spellings agreed that change was needed.

"The nature of a job changes as times change," she said, praising Miers as among the most tireless workers in the administration.

Outside experts concur with the insiders' views of why it was time for one of Bush's closest aides to leave the West Wing.

DOJ_NMG_0123522

"I just presumed the White House was going to want to change the counsel to someone who had Washington-based experience and who is a Washington insider who had connections to Capitol Hill," said Nancy Kassop, a State University of New York-New Paltz political scientist who has studied the White House counsel office.

William Marshall, a University of North Carolina law professor who worked in the White House counsel office in the Clinton years, said Miers' departure was predictable.

"It's not a slight on her abilities," he said. "It just recognizes that when you are playing defense in the way the White House will have to that somebody who is experienced in responding to subpoenas and other kinds of things is appropriate."

In October 2005, Bush nominated Miers to succeed Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The selection went down in flames under questions about Miers' qualifications, her conservative credentials and the administration's unwillingness to let senators see sensitive documents Miers had worked on at the White House.

On Friday, Miers had nothing but nice words about her three weeks as a Supreme Court nominee.

"The experience was very, very enjoyable in many, many ways and, of course, it goes without saying, for a lawyer to be nominated to the Supreme Court by the president of the United States — and for me particularly this president — is an incredible honor," Miers said.

She was, however, critical of the judicial confirmation process.

"It's very unfortunate that people view the process as so troublesome that it discourages people from coming forward and offering themselves to serve," said Miers, a top Bush hand in selecting judicial nominees.

Bush, though benefiting from Fielding's experience, could miss the long, close ties he shares with Miers, according to Gonzales.

"I think not having that background is something Fred will have to overcome," he said. "There will be a learning curve for Fred. He doesn't know the president as well as Harriet does."

Experts See Peril In Bush Health Proposal (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27 — With his proposal to uproot a tax break that has been in place for more than 60 years, President Bush has touched off an impassioned debate over the future of the employer-based system that provides health insurance to more than half of all Americans.

“Changing the tax code is a vital and necessary step to making health care affordable for more Americans,” Mr. Bush said in his State of the Union address this week.

Mr. Bush said his proposal would eliminate a bias in the tax code that strongly favored insurance provided by employers over coverage bought by individuals and families outside the workplace.

Paul Fronstin, director of health research at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a nonpartisan organization, said: “The president’s proposal would mean the end of employer-based benefits as we know them. It gives employers a way out of providing the benefits because their employees could get the same tax break on their own.”

Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, denied that the president wanted to move people away from the employer-based system and toward the individual insurance market. “We are seriously agnostic on that,” he said.

It might take years for changes to occur. “Large corporate employers could not immediately terminate their health benefits because there is, at present, no reliable place where employees can get coverage they can afford outside the workplace,” said Frank B. McArdle, a health policy expert at Hewitt Associates, a benefits consulting firm.

The economic rationale for Mr. Bush’s proposal is that too many people have “gold-plated, deluxe” health insurance, which encourages them to use excessive amounts of health care, driving up costs for everyone.

Many economists agree. But they doubt that Mr. Bush’s proposal would do much to hold down costs or cover more people.

“The president’s proposal addresses inequities in the tax code that provide an open-ended subsidy for premiums paid by employers,” said Robert D. Reischauer, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office. “If your employer does not provide health insurance and you have to buy it on your own, you get no tax benefit at all. The president’s plan would eliminate that distinction.”

But Mr. Reischauer said, “A glaring problem with the president’s plan is that he did not call for any stronger regulation of the individual insurance market.” In that market as it now exists in most states, insurers can deny coverage or charge higher rates to sick people.

In their desire to achieve universal coverage, some Democrats have also begun to raise questions about the employer-based system. “We have to ask ourselves if the employer-based system of health care is still the best way for providing insurance to all Americans,” said Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, noting that workers frequently changed jobs.

The Service Employees International Union negotiates with employers to secure health benefits for its members, but the president of the union, Andrew L. Stern, said, "The current employer-based health care system is not the foundation for 21st-century health care reform."

Mr. Bush's proposal differs radically from President Bill Clinton's plan for universal coverage, but experts on health benefits said they were similar in one respect: In an effort to help the uninsured — about one-sixth of the population — they would upend the system that covers most Americans.

The Clinton plan would have provided comprehensive health benefits to 39 million uninsured Americans, with more than $400 billion in new federal spending over 10 years. The White House says the tax changes proposed by Mr. Bush would provide coverage for 3 million to 5 million people at no cost to the government over 10 years.

Since Mr. Bush took office in 2001, the number of people without insurance has increased by more than 5 million, to 46.6 million, according to the Census Bureau. Administration officials said they hoped to reverse that trend by helping states that offered basic private insurance policies to their residents. To pay for such help, the administration would take federal money from hospitals that serve large numbers of poor people.

Under Mr. Bush's proposal, employee health benefits would, for the first time, be treated as income and would be subject to income and payroll taxes, just like wages. At the same time, Mr. Bush would create a tax deduction for health insurance of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. The same deduction would be available to everyone with coverage, regardless of the source or value of the policy.

A family with coverage worth $18,000 would have to pay taxes on the amount exceeding the $15,000 standard deduction — $3,000, in this example.

Katherine Baicker, a member of the president's Council of Economic Advisers, said the proposal would increase taxes for 30 million people with the most generous employer-provided health benefits, unless they "change their behavior" and choose less costly coverage. Ms. Baicker said the proposal would cut taxes for more than 100 million people who bought insurance on their own or had employee health benefits worth less than the standard deduction.

Treasury officials said that under the Bush proposal, an uninsured family of four with an annual income of $60,000 would save $4,545 if it bought coverage in the individual market. By contrast, they said, a family that earns $80,000 and has employer-provided coverage worth $20,000 could see a tax increase of about $1,500.

Joel D. Kaplan, deputy chief of staff at the White House, acknowledged that the proposal could accelerate the trend of employers' dropping health benefits for employees. But he said more people "would be able to buy insurance in the individual market," so there would be "a net increase in the number of insured."

Politicians and health care providers are skeptical.

Representative John D. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who is the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, said, "The president's proposal would do little to help the uninsured, but would undermine the employer-based system through which 160 million people get coverage."

Richard J. Umbdenstock, president of the American Hospital Association, agreed. "The tax proposal would have the effect of driving people to the small-group insurance market — a market that has proved unstable," Mr. Umbdenstock said. "For many people, even with a tax break, coverage would remain unaffordable."

Historically, employers have used benefits as a tool to recruit workers and keep them healthy and productive.

R. Bruce Josten, executive vice president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, praised the general direction of the president's proposal but said his members had serious concerns.

First, Mr. Josten said, the $15,000 cap on tax-free insurance takes no account of wide geographic variation in the cost of health care and insurance. The same package of benefits typically costs more in Boston than in Minneapolis, for example.

Moreover, Mr. Josten said, a health plan may be expensive because it covers older workers with major medical problems, not because it is "gold-plated." A single mother, working as a low-paid secretary at a law firm, could be pushed into a higher tax bracket because she participates in an $18,000 health plan covering older men who have had heart attacks and expensive surgery, Mr. Josten said.

Treasury officials acknowledged that some people with costly, comprehensive benefits had modest incomes.

But deluxe health plans are vanishing fast. In recent years, many workers have found themselves paying more for less comprehensive benefits. From 2000 to 2006, premiums for employer-sponsored coverage rose 87 percent, about four times as fast as workers' earnings, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation.

Rangel And Others Condemn Bush Medicaid Plan (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

DOJ_NMG_0123524

Representative Charles B. Rangel and a number of city officials urged President Bush yesterday to reconsider a proposed change to Medicaid that could cost the city's public hospital network millions of dollars in annual financing.

"We want to make sure the president knows how damaging his health care proposal will be to our Health and Hospitals Corporation," the City Council speaker, Christine C. Quinn, said, referring to the agency that runs the city's 11 public hospitals and dozens of diagnostic centers and health clinics.

Agency officials estimate the president's plan would cost the corporation about $350 million a year, about 7 percent of its annual budget.

Ms. Quinn joined Mr. Rangel and more than a dozen other elected officials and health care representatives at City Hall yesterday to protest the president's proposal.

"Isn't it embarrassing we have to do this," said Mr. Rangel, who promised to join other Democrats and use his post as chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee to cut off funds to the president's health care plans.

"How can a great nation like ours explain that we can't take care of our own," he said, adding that the president's proposals come as "millions are being spent on a war that nobody wants."

Mr. Bush's proposal would end a longstanding regulation that allowed public hospitals to receive more money from Medicaid, the health plan for the poor, than private hospitals receive for the same services.

Federal officials have said that the resulting savings could be sent to the states in the form of "affordable choice grants" and used to provide the uninsured with private health insurance.

Alan D. Aviles, president of the Health and Hospitals Corporation, said that the rule was in place to help public hospitals that provide treatment to the indigent, and that losing it would "shred the safety net of the safety net providers."

The City Council plans to send a letter to the president this week opposing the proposal.

A Deal In The Desert For Sen. Reid? (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer, Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

BULLHEAD CITY, ARIZ. — It's hard to buy undeveloped land in booming northern Arizona for $166 an acre. But now-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid effectively did just that when a longtime friend decided to sell property owned by the employee pension fund that he controlled.

In 2002, Reid (D-Nev.) paid $10,000 to a pension fund controlled by Clair Haycock, a Las Vegas lubricants distributor and his friend for 50 years. The payment gave the senator full control of a 160-acre parcel in Bullhead City that Reid and the pension fund had jointly owned. Reid's price for the equivalent of 60 acres of undeveloped desert was less than one-tenth of the value the assessor placed on it at the time.

Six months after the deal closed, Reid introduced legislation to address the plight of lubricants dealers who had their supplies disrupted by the decisions of big oil companies. It was an issue the Haycock family had brought to Reid's attention in 1994, according to a source familiar with the events.

If Reid were to sell the property for any of the various estimates of its value, his gain on the $10,000 investment could range from $50,000 to $290,000.

It is a potential violation of congressional ethics standards for a member to accept anything of value — including a real estate discount — from a person with interests before Congress.

In a statement, Reid's spokesman Jon Summers said that the transaction was not a gift and that the price was due to the property's history and the fact that only a partial interest was sold. Reid's action on the lubricants issue was unrelated to the sale and reflected the senator's interest in fairness for small businesses, Summers said.

Reid "has never taken any official action to provide personal financial benefit to me, and I would never have asked him to," Clair Haycock has told The Times. Haycock's son, John, who runs the petroleum-products distribution company with him, said in a recent e-mail that it was "absolutely wrong" to connect the land sale and Reid's lubricants legislation, which did not pass.

Legislative efforts

Records and interviews show that beginning in the mid-1990s, Reid tried several times to push legislation that would have protected lubricants distributors from abrupt cancellations by their suppliers. Though unsuccessful, the legislation sent a clear message to the oil firms that there was congressional interest in the matter, according to Sarah Dodge, then-legislative director for an industry group that worked on the bill.

By the time of the land sale, the Haycocks say, they had lost interest in the issue and were not aware that the legislation had been introduced.

Because an employee pension fund had owned the land Reid purchased, labor law experts contacted by The Times said, a below-market sale would raise additional questions. Pension fund trustees like Clair Haycock have a duty in most cases to sell assets for their market value, the experts said.

"I think this would have been considered a potentially serious issue" at the time, said Ian D. Lanoff, who led the Labor Department's pension division during the Carter administration and was provided basic details of the case — though not the identity of the lawmaker — by The Times.

"Theoretically it's a serious issue for the trustee who sold the property, though practically it may not be" because the pension plan is now closed and its obligations were met, Lanoff said.

John Haycock said his workers received all promised benefits from the Haycock Distributing Co. pension plan and were therefore unaffected by the land transaction. Federal records confirm this.

Reid's interest in the barren parcel dates back to the period of 1979 through 1982, when he and Clair Haycock bought the 160 acres. Haycock bought a three-eighths interest, equivalent to 60 acres, for $90,000 — $1,500 an acre. Reid, then a Nevada lawyer and political figure, bought the other five-eighths, the equivalent of 100 acres. They did not divide the parcel.

The property has sweeping mountain and mesa views and now abuts a housing development, which could make it attractive to developers. But there are some limitations. The land has a steep wash, or desert streambed, and the adjacent land has a gravel pit.

In early 1987, Haycock turned over his interest in the land to the pension fund, for which he acts as trustee. The fund provided retirement benefits for about 80 employees, and under law, employers must contribute to such funds each year.

In the early 1990s, California investors bought the entire 160 acres from Reid and Haycock for a little over $1.34 million — around $8,400 an acre. The new owners obtained approval to develop a mobile home and recreational vehicle park. But a few years later they defaulted, and Reid and the pension fund were once again the land's joint owners.

Development slowed in the late 1990s, and Reid and the Haycocks say the property became a cash drain. In 1999, according to Reid's office, the senator began working without success with developer Craig Johnson on a plan for the property. At some point, Reid's office said, he offered to give the land to Johnson, who declined. Johnson has confirmed that offer. In a statement Reid's office provided, Johnson described the listless market and the property's challenges.

In 2001, Haycock Distributing Co. decided to convert its existing pension fund into a 401(k) retirement program. In liquidating its assets, the firm decided that the plan must quickly sell its share of the property.

Lawyers advised the Haycocks that the family could not buy it from the pension fund, so Clair Haycock approached Reid. At first, Reid said "he and his wife were not interested due to the property's past history," Haycock wrote in a letter to The Times.

"Eventually, he gave me $10,000 for my share," Clair Haycock wrote. "I was just happy to have been able to liquidate the property from my pension plan." Reid's office said the senator and his wife purchased it reluctantly. "Because it had minimal value to them, they were willing to pay only a minimal price," a Reid staffer wrote in response to questions.

How good a deal?

How good a deal did Reid get? Paying $166 an acre for Mohave County land is "a super deal," said the county assessor, Ron Nicholson. But the precise answer in this case, Nicholson said, is complicated by the fact that only a minority portion of a partnership was for sale; minority shares can be difficult to sell. Other experts who reviewed the transaction for The Times acknowledged the complexity of the deal but said the senator appeared to have acquired valuable property for a fraction of its value.

"The price strikes me as low," said professor Crocker H. Liu, McCord chair of real estate at Arizona State University's W.P. Carey School of Business. "But I don't know what other considerations — valuable or otherwise — were part of this transaction. Usually when a purchase price is that low, there is other juice in the deal."

Calculating the precise amount of Reid's discount is difficult because of varying values assigned to the property around that time, including some by the senator himself. In his 2001 Senate financial disclosure, Reid valued his Bullhead City acreage at $5,000 to $10,000 an acre. When questioned about the filing several months ago, Reid's office said he might have overstated the value. A Reid spokesman said the senator was in the process of amending his ethics statements to more accurately describe the terms of the deal.

At least twice, Reid appealed to the Mohave County assessor to lower the land valuation and decrease his taxes, in 2002 presenting a 2001 appraisal that valued the land at $1,000 an acre. The assessor's office made a downward adjustment for 2003 but still places the value at about $1,748 an acre.

On a recent property tour, the assessor acknowledged that Reid's land had problems.

"There are topographical issues on this property," Nicholson said as he drove a county-owned four-wheel-drive vehicle through the tract. He pointed out the property's steep wash and another streambed.

An adjacent parcel with similar topography sold in April 2004 for $4,260 an acre.

Reid's spokesman said the senator had paid a fair price for the pension fund's minority interest.

"When a willing buyer pays a willing seller to buy an asset, that is a sale, not a gift," Summers said.

Real estate experts say that minority interests in partnerships are often sold at a discount, sometimes of 20% or more. But they say that such discounts do not necessarily apply in a case like Reid's where he is the majority owner and gains 100% control by the purchase.

"We were happy to get out of the deal as we did," John Haycock said, adding: "Would we have liked to make more money on the Bullhead City land? Of course."

Reid's office produced statements from three Haycock retirees who attested that they believed they had been well-served by the pension plan.

Since taking full control of the parcel in 2002, Reid has pushed for federal funding for a new bridge over the Colorado River a few miles from his property, a spending request The Times disclosed last November.

Reid said he secured funding for the bridge, which would connect fast-growing Bullhead City with the gambling town of Laughlin, Nev., because local residents wanted it. He said the bridge would not affect his property's value.

Losing business

Reid has long been known as a champion of Nevada interests, particularly gambling and mining. But he seemed an unlikely choice to advocate for the beleaguered lubricants industry when he took up the issue in 1994. He did not sit on the Energy Committee.

At that time, the Haycocks went to Reid for help, according to a former employee of the lubricants industry trade group, Petroleum Marketers Assn. of America, who was involved in the events. The employee asked that his name be withheld because his current job involves congressional contacts.

The Haycocks had lost business in 1994 when Mobil Oil Co. canceled the family's distributorship, costing the firm a lucrative contract with the Las Vegas-area General Motors dealers, which had to use Mobil products.

The family was "incensed that this had happened and there was nothing they could do about it," said the former trade group employee.

Reid mentions constituent

The Haycocks — who were considered industry leaders — say they do not recall discussing the matter with Reid. But the former trade group employee said the Haycocks convinced Reid to take action.

Reid "did it because John or Clair asked him to do it," said the former employee.

With the legislative session coming to a close, Reid brought the issue to the Senate floor on Oct. 5, 1994. He described a Nevada constituent whose "franchise agreement to sell lubricating oils to car dealers in Las Vegas was arbitrarily canceled with 30 days' notice," adding: "This seems grossly unfair."

A Washington lawyer who represented the Haycocks in their dispute with Mobil recalls that dealers turned to Reid after other avenues of redress had been exhausted.

"The Haycocks provided access to Sen. Reid," said Al Alfano, the attorney, who still represents distributor interests. However, Alfano said, Reid's efforts brought no relief to the Haycocks. Although the issue remains a concern for many distributors, he said, the Haycocks lost interest after the mid-1990s.

Nonetheless, Reid cited the same constituent example almost word-for-word in 2002, soon after the land sale, and again in 2003 when he introduced legislation, cosponsored by Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), to protect lubricants distributors.

John Haycock said Reid's actions provided no benefit to his company. "I am not aware of any action taken by the senator, relative to lubricants, that has had a financial benefit to our company," Haycock wrote. "At one point I believe Sen. Reid pushed for legislation … but that legislation was never passed and therefore could not have had any impact….

"To my best recollection, I didn't even know Sen. Reid had introduced the legislation," John Haycock said, referring to the legislation in 2002 and 2003.

Reid's spokesman said: "In any event, the Haycocks are Sen. Reid's constituents, and there is absolutely nothing improper about Sen. Reid working to advance good policy on matters of concern to Nevadans and businesses in Nevada."

You Listening To Me? (NYT)

By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times Magazine, January 28, 2007

You have just written your first book, “Positively American: Winning Back the Middle-Class Majority One Family at a Time,” in which you try to produce a functional platform for the famously unfocused Democratic Party. What do Democrats stand for? No one has a good answer. I felt anguish about that. I felt a burning need to have us thinking beyond the immediate.

What about your fellow senator Barack Obama? Did you read his book, "The Audacity of Hope," which similarly insists that politicians need to reclaim the American dream for the middle class? I just read little pieces of it.

You couldn't finish it? I skimmed the parts that were interesting.

He prescribes policy on the same issues you do, from education to health care to the war in Iraq. And he similarly wants to increase support for education. But his is not a platform. The two books, in terms of their outlook, are not dissimilar. In terms of specificity, I think I go a lot further. I hope the presidential candidates will rip off my ideas and use them.

Will you be supporting Obama for president? I'm supporting Hillary. I've worked closer with Hillary and, on experience, I would have to give her the edge. I think she's terrific. When you see her work up close, she is really smart, she asks the right questions and has a good sense of how to balance things.

In your book, you express the travails of the middle class through the example of a couple you invented: Joe Bailey, an optimistic insurance agent, and his devoted wife, Eileen, who "is able to splurge now and then at the mall," as you write. Did you like the description of them?

Not that much. They're fictional characters who lack the artistry of fiction. Oh, please! It's the Baileys! They're everything. I didn't create the Baileys for the book. I have been living with the Baileys for decades. I talk to them. I know them. They're real to me. The Baileys are average people. They could be anyone.

Why did you, a Brooklyn native, make the Baileys suburbanites who own a house in Massapequa, Long Island, and seldom drive into New York City? Massapequa could be any suburb in America. I have always felt connected to average voters. Jerry Seinfeld, you know what he said Massapequa meant? I had no idea. He said it meant in Native American, "It's near the mall."

Regardless of how your book is received, you made history in November as the chief strategist of the Democrats' campaign to regain the Senate, and you subsequently became the third-highest-ranking senator in the new majority. Have you spoken to President Bush since? He called me to congratulate me on taking back the Senate. Look, to his credit, he was gracious. He said: "I never expected you to do this, but congratulations. You did an amazing job."

Does Vice President Cheney talk to you? No. He used to. On energy issues, I talked to him, and then when I didn't agree with him, he stopped talking to me.

Do you think he will remain as large an influence inside the White House in the wake of the Republican drubbing? Unfortunately, yes, maybe more so, because in an odd way, the counter to Cheney was Karl Rove, and he has lost some credibility.

Do you expect the president to respond at all to the ideas of the new majority? I don't have much hope that Bush will moderate, but many of the Republicans in Congress, having seen the handwriting on the wall, may moderate, and that will help us. Dick Lugar, John Warner — these are old-fashioned conservatives who know that this hard-right philosophy is wrong.

Did you send a free copy of your book to the president or any members of his administration? No. I hope they'll buy it.

At Roll Call, An Uneasy Silence (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

The desk is heavy and wooden, well-used, not ornate. Lying flat on the uncluttered glass top is a big calendar. Diagonal blue lines cross out the days as they pass. The felt-tip pen is here, ready to continue marking time's march. But the last day that has been dismissed with a blue slash is Tuesday, Dec. 12.

For Sen. Tim Johnson, the Democrat from South Dakota, time is in suspension now.

Everything in his Hart Building office is exactly how he left it last Dec. 13: The morning when words deserted him, and they rushed him, speechless, to the hospital.

By the calendar is the Dec. 13 edition of the Hill, a Capitol Hill newspaper. Behind his chair on the thick blue carpet is his briefcase, a scuffed black leather satchel, worn gray in places.

Johnson remains in George Washington University Hospital, undergoing speech and physical therapy after surgery to repair a brain hemorrhage. The initial horror and cold calculations of those first days -- when it seemed possible he and the Democrats' one-vote majority in the Senate might not survive -- have subsided. Now the questions are about absence: How long will it last? What does it mean to the state, the nation, the institution, when one senator is missing?

Next to the computer is a pad of paper with the U.S. Senate letterhead. Johnson had scribbled some notes and figures on the pad, federal dollars he was trying to get for projects back home. He was discussing the items on this pad when the bleeding in his brain stopped him, midsentence.

His staff has left everything virtually untouched as a sign of respect, a sign of love, a sign of not knowing what else to do. It is an appeal to presence in the void of absence.

The news from the hospital has been good, so far.

"In talking to his physicians, we really feel optimistic and confident that he is going to make a full recovery," says Brendan Johnson, 31, one of the senator's three children and a lawyer in Sioux Falls, S.D. "It is something that takes time. Unfortunately we don't have any type of exact timetable. What we do know from the therapists and physicians working with him at GW is that he is making much faster progress than anyone anticipated."

Johnson speaks only a few words at a time. "He's not conversational, in terms of long conversation," Brendan Johnson says. "He's clearly registering when we discuss topics. I think he loves to hear about how his [three] grandkids are doing. I also keep him updated on what certain baseball teams are doing."

Johnson has three hours of therapy every day, working with parallel bars and practicing naming objects, according to statements by his doctors released by his office. An MRI showed that the speech center of his brain is undamaged. And an angiogram showed that the surgery successfully repaired the original problem, called an arteriovenous malformation.

An AVM is a tangle of arteries and veins usually present since birth. Most of the estimated 300,000 Americans who have it never know and live symptom-free. In Johnson's case, two weeks shy of his 60th birthday, bleeding caused by the AVM suddenly disrupted his ability to speak and made him weak on his right side.

Johnson's family and staff members say they hope he will recover enough to do some work within "several months." But in the statements released by the office, predictions of his recovery time have never been attributed to his doctors.

"Senator Johnson is showing evidence of more functional, spontaneous speech and is indicating preferences. He is answering questions and following commands appropriately," Philip Marion, medical director for GW's Department of Rehabilitation Medicine, says in the most recent statement, released Thursday.

Johnson's wife, Barbara, spends much of every day with her husband. Several times a day, she taps out updates on her BlackBerry and sends them to staff and family members.

Amusing anecdotes from the hospital, hot off the BlackBerry, are savored and laughed about around the office: Watching football playoffs, the senator groaned in mock dismay when his wife kept referring to the Chicago Bears as the Chicago Cubs. He rolled his eyes when she asked why he wasn't rooting for the Patriots over the Colts, since South Dakota native Adam Vinatieri is the place kicker. Did she not know that Vinatieri had signed with the Colts!?

Staff and family say the senator's wife, an education consultant and a two-time breast-cancer survivor, has been a powerful presence during this period of absence. (She declined to be interviewed for this story.)

"It probably shouldn't be this way, but she's been the source of strength for her kids rather than vice versa," Brendan Johnson says. Tim and Barbara Johnson have been married for 37 years.

The senator wasn't in the House chamber Tuesday evening, but he let his wife know he wanted to watch the State of the Union address. He heard President Bush say, "We pray for the recovery and speedy return of Sen. Tim Johnson."

Barbara Johnson tapped out this bulletin: "Tim was very touched by the President's recognition. It was obvious that he wanted to be there and I reminded him that next year he would be."

From such glimpses, friends and colleagues glean that the old Tim Johnson is present, albeit in a hospital bed.Senate Precedents

When a senator is absent for an extended period, two seemingly contradictory sides of Washington come into focus.

There is an inevitable, almost ruthless, forward momentum that tarries for no senator. The people of South Dakota must be served, partisan interests must be advanced.

Yet, there is also a human side, an instinct for decency, an acknowledgement that life can't fully go on as usual.

"Every senator plays a unique role within the process; all 100 fit a specific place," says Jay Truitt, vice president of government affairs for the National Cattlemen's Beef Association. He relies on Johnson to advocate for his industry. Yet he also knows he can count on others in the meantime. "While one single senator has a great deal of power, they're not bigger than the process. . . . We are going to do an appropriations bill. . . . The work will go on."

"There isn't an event that goes on around here where Tim isn't mentioned and prayers aren't offered," says Sen. John Thune, the Republican from South Dakota.

Thune lost his first race for the Senate to Johnson in 2002 by 524 votes. When the Republican visited Barbara Johnson after her husband was stricken, she noted that her husband is a tough fighter. Thune, recalling that contentious election, said wryly, "Believe me, I know it!"

Expressing both qualities of senatorial absence, Julianne Fisher, Johnson's communications director, finds herself issuing somewhat paradoxical messages: "The office is open and we continue to work." And: "The senator is not replaceable."

Her predicament is obvious. To suggest the work has been seriously disrupted would be to imply the people aren't being served. To say everything is being accomplished too well would imply the senator is superfluous.

Of course, senators might be absent for many reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0123529

Some run for president. In 1996, Majority Leader Robert Dole resigned his seat to campaign against President Clinton. This year, with at least a half-dozen Democratic and Republican senators already vying for 2008 -- and none publicly planning to give up his or her seat -- absenteeism is certain to rise. Phoning in votes from New Hampshire or Iowa is not allowed.

Sometimes senators aren't very active even when they are present. By the time he was 98, in 2001, an exceedingly frail Strom Thurmond of South Carolina rarely participated in debates, gave speeches or interviews, questioned witnesses, wielded a gavel or introduced consequential bills.

Karl Mundt, a Republican from South Dakota, suffered a stroke in 1969, but held his seat until the end of his term in January 1973, even though he could no longer report to the Senate. Johnson holds Mundt's old seat.

In 1988, Joe Biden of Delaware was out for seven months recovering from two brain aneurysms. He proves a senator can bounce back from brain surgery, get reelected and run for president.Something Was Wrong

The recording of the moment when Johnson slipped from present to absent is chilling to hear.

He was in a basement studio in the Capitol for his weekly conference call with South Dakota reporters. There was one last question about funding for four projects, including a medical school and a Boys and Girls Club.

"Ah, ah, second, uh, uh, you know," Johnson stammered. He laughed nervously. For long moments there was more stammering, silence, isolated words.

It was the awful sound of a man struggling mightily to master his thoughts.

"Well said," the senator concluded, trying to make a joke. "Anything, uh, further? Going once, twice. Okay."

On the subway back to Hart, Fisher tried to draw Johnson into conversation. When she asked about his wife -- family was a subject that always got him chattering -- and he gave a one-word reply, she knew something was wrong.

Within minutes the staff summoned a doctor, and Johnson was wheeled to an ambulance. That night he was in surgery.The Mechanics of an Absence

The 46 members of the senator's staff in Washington and South Dakota suddenly found themselves on their own.

"This experience is certainly one of the most surreal of my life," says Drey Samuelson, Johnson's chief of staff for 20 years in the House and Senate.

The first few days brought out the best and worst of Washington: Colleagues from both sides of the aisle rushed to be with his family, sent piles of food to his office. But no one could help speculating: What if Johnson died or resigned? South Dakota's Republican governor probably would pick a Republican successor. The Senate would be divided 50-50. Vice President Cheney would break ties.

"It was hard to see Tim treated as a poker chip as opposed to a human being," Samuelson says.

When it became "clear he was going to live," the story lost its sizzle and the reporters went away, Samuelson says.

Then the quirkier aspects of absence came into play. Senate officials postponed approving reimbursements for official staff travel while Johnson was sedated, which he was until late December, because his agreement could not be verified.

The staff asked the Rules Committee for permission to send out official mail over the chief of staff's signature. For the first time in his career, Samuelson scanned his autograph into an autopen. Wielding his new authority with great deference, he has signed only a brief letter thanking constituents for their input and explaining the unusual situation.

Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada appointed temporary substitutes to key committees where the Democrats could not afford to lack a vote. Barbara Boxer of California would chair Ethics in Johnson's stead; Jack Reed of Rhode Island would chair the Appropriations subcommittee on military construction and veterans affairs; Frank Lautenberg of New Jersey would occupy Johnson's chair on the Budget committee.

There were inadvertent slights. Another Capitol Hill paper, Roll Call, published a supplement listing committee members in the new Congress. Johnson was mistakenly omitted from Budget and Ethics.

"One of the things that makes it easier is jumping back into the work," says Todd Stubbendieck, the legislative director. "We've tried to return to be as normal as we can be, and get back into the swing of things and the normal schedule."

"We all want to work hard so when he comes back, he's proud of the work we've done," Fisher says.

Luckily, Johnson had nearly completed a series of legislative planning meetings in the days before he was stricken. The staff is following that plan.

His key constituencies include farmers, ranchers, veterans, seniors, rural communities. Although his profile is low on Capitol Hill, in South Dakota, a state with fewer people than Prince George's County, residents address their senator as "Tim" when they see him in the coffee shop on Main Street.

"He's one who was never real imbued with the power and the glory, he just wanted to do a good job," says Jerry Oster, news director with WNAX-AM radio in Yankton, who has known Johnson since he was a baby-faced lawyer in Vermillion. "It's part of that Norwegian upbringing. Don't care who gets the credit . . . . We always kid him about being Norwegian powered by coffee."

If Johnson's recuperation lasts longer than several months, then his absence will be felt more keenly. That is when the farm bill will be moving through the Senate, and the appropriations process will be underway.

"Senator Johnson's main impact would come this summer," says Troy Larson, executive director of the Lewis & Clark Rural Water System, which is seeking $35 million for pipeline construction. "It would not be possible for senators in other states to make up that clout."

As always in the political world, some are sizing up Johnson's prospects for reelection in 2008, and whether his illness has made him vulnerable. A moderate Democrat from a very red state, Johnson has twice won tight races for the Senate.

"I think the reelection question is a key one," Samuelson says. "I talked to Barb [Johnson] about whether or not to shut our fundraising operation down. She said that she felt that when Tim recovers, he will want to run for reelection. We can't know that for sure, but that's what she thinks and that's what I think as well."A Small, Empty Desk

Johnson has another desk, as every senator does, rather small, made of mahogany, on the floor of the Senate chamber: the ultimate symbol of his position and, when not occupied, of his absence.

Johnson's is in the second row, between those of Mary Landrieu and Barbara Mikulski. Every morning, the same legislative paperwork is placed on Johnson's desk as on every other, as though he might be present. There is a sharpened pencil in the pencil slot.

Early one afternoon, the clerk calls the roll for another vote. It's on an amendment to the minimum wage bill.

" . . . Mr. Inhofe. Mr. Inouye. Mr. Isakson. Mr. Johnson. Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Kerry . . . "

The senators amble up to the clerk's desk and signal thumbs up or down.

Mr. Johnson is recorded as "not voting."

On Tuesday, the Democrats head to the Lyndon B. Johnson Room for the weekly caucus lunch.

"I think knowing Tim Johnson as I have, respecting him greatly, that I will convey the ideas as he would have them," Lautenberg says of filling Johnson's chair on Budget. "But it's an interpretation. I'll do my best."

"He has a great deal of technical competence, so we miss him," Mikulski says of the Appropriations subcommittee that Johnson is supposed to chair. "At the same time, our good friend Sen. Jack Reed is filling that role. So we can pick up the slack."

One morning, Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) gavels Banking to order. Dodd salutes the absent senator and wishes him a speedy return -- then gets down to business, a hearing on mass transit security.

Johnson is the second-ranking Democrat on Banking, after Dodd, and would ordinarily sit immediately to Dodd's right. But this morning Johnson's chair is not empty. It is occupied by Reed, whose lower rank in the pecking order should place him farther from the chairman.

Afterward, Reed says of Johnson: "He's one of those guys you like to emulate, because of his example as well as what he says. A lot is said around here. When you can provide the example, judgment and decency that he provides, those are very scarce commodities."

What about taking Johnson's chair this morning in Banking?

"I think it's less important where we sit than what we contribute," Reed says. "But I assure you, I'm just keeping that seat warm."

Ginsburg Feels Isolated On Court (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

BOSTON -- U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said Friday that she dislikes being "all alone on the court" nearly a year after the retirement of Sandra Day O'Connor.

Ginsburg, who spoke to an assembly at Suffolk University Law School, said she sees more women in law school, arguing before the court and sitting as federal judges.

"My consolation is that if you look at the federal courts altogether, you get a much different picture than you do if you look only at the U.S. Supreme Court," she said.

Of herself and O'Connor, the court's first female justice, Ginsburg said: "We have very different backgrounds. We divide on a lot of important questions, but we have had the experience of growing up women and we have certain sensitivities that our male colleagues lack."

Ginsburg, 73, did not elaborate or take questions afterward.

DOJ_NMG_0123531

The justices of the Supreme Court have served hard time in the makeup chair in recent months. John Paul Stevens and John G. Roberts Jr. gave prime-time interviews to ABC's Jan Crawford Greenburg; Ruth Bader Ginsburg chatted with CBS's Mike Wallace in chambers; and Stephen G. Breyer has logged almost as much time on camera as Lindsay Lohan -- including a sit-down with Charlie Rose and a gig on "Fox News Sunday." And Roberts, the chief justice, is part of a documentary airing on PBS next week.

Even some of the justices who are reluctant to talk on camera have been more amenable to speaking on the record lately. Breyer and Antonin Scalia engaged in a wide-ranging public debate in December that is available on the Web. And ABC's Crawford Greenburg secured interviews with nine justices for her new book, "Supreme Conflict." Nine justices. That's a far cry from "The Brethren."

What the justices have discussed in these interviews has ranged from the personal -- the chief justice's young son likes Spiderman -- to judicial philosophy. And that has opened the door to a more robust and nuanced national conversation about constitutional law and the role of the judiciary. Whether it's Roberts extolling the virtues of unanimity and minimalism or Breyer selling his constitutional theory of "active liberty," the court has finally taken its case to the airwaves, and that is unequivocally good for a nation that -- for better or worse -- has pretty much taken up permanent residence there.

But a funny thing happened on the way to the sound stage. Some justices are refusing to talk about areas of the law in these extra-judicial discussions. And that raises interesting questions about which justices avoid which topics, and why. Does this sudden selective chill reflect fissures on the court, in the law, or both?

We had, for example, Ginsburg talking openly with CBS's Wallace in October until he raised the subject of abortion. Out came the ice water: "Stop!" she said. "We're not going to talk about abortion." Ginsburg also refused to discuss the separation of church and state and Bush v. Gore, insisting that "questions are going to come before this court on those turbulent issues."

And as Fox's Chris Wallace asked Breyer about abortion in December, Breyer interjected, explaining: "I decide abortion cases when they come up. But I know perfectly well that anything I say on that subject is enormously volatile." Breyer also considered it improper to "talk about that subject, particularly in a public forum that isn't the court." When Wallace asked for clarification, Breyer repeated: "No, not any question to do with abortion." Breyer similarly refused to touch the subject at a public debate with Scalia in Washington in December, even though Scalia had no such qualms.

At first this looks like a variation on the old confirmation two-step. That's the dance that happens at judicial confirmation hearings wherein a prospective justice refuses to answer questions about subjects that "may come before the courts," and, yes, the court heard an abortion case this term. But that's not the calculus that the justices seem to be using these days: At that same debate in December, Breyer spoke about Brown v. Board of Education, even as the high court was hearing two cases that raised related issues that very week. He briefly discussed the presidential powers cases in his interview with Wallace. (You can bet that issue will come before the court again soon.) And in her interview with Mike Wallace, Ginsburg spoke passionately about the court's decision in a major case involving the presidential authority to create military tribunals, concluding, "In this country, we have no royalty, we have no king who has absolute authority."

Stevens recently discussed the flag-burning case. And this week Scalia told an audience at Iona College in New York that Florida's handling of the recount in Bush v. Gore was a violation of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection under the law. "Counting somebody else's dimpled chad and not counting my dimpled chad is not giving equal protection of the law," he said, even though such cases will come before the court again in the future. Scalia let the crowd know that the case is firmly in the history books: "It's water over the deck -- get over it," he said. And given that Bush v. Gore explicitly claims to hold no precedential value in future cases, perhaps he's right.

So how do we account for the justices' sudden silences and pregnant pauses? In part, it must be personality. Roberts seems unwilling to discuss cases or doctrine off the bench; Breyer is inclined to talk about them, but mostly in the abstract; and Scalia is inclined to gab about pretty much anything.

But there's something else at work here -- something to do with what Breyer calls the "volatile" cases and Ginsburg calls the "turbulent" ones. For both justices, abortion clearly falls into that category, but in general they seem to avoid talking about the moral issues that divide the court just as they divide the country: gay rights, race-based decision-making, abortion and religion. On these issues, the courts' liberals often strive to use constitutional doctrine to protect minority rights. And where there is a sound constitutional basis for these positions, it has been tricky for them to explain them in a sound bite.

The unifying theme in most recent judicial speeches has been this: The power belongs to the people. Whether it's Breyer urging citizens to engage in government or Scalia insisting that it's the job of the people, not the court, to modify the Constitution, the universal message of the justices is not to fear the court, but to become active in the legislative process. But that's only half the story, and the justices know it. Those cases are the tough ones, and, invariably, the hardest to explain. As Scalia continues to prove, the taut lines of his theory of "originalism" tend to be an easier sell than the blurriness of a "living Constitution." Which may be why the justices sometimes talk the loudest when they say nothing at all.

Search Ends For 3 In Calif. Copter Crash (AP)

The Navy called off a search Saturday for three missing crew members of a helicopter that crashed in the ocean about 50 miles off California's southern coast.

Friday's crash during a training mission left one sailor dead, and the Navy had searched for the remaining crew through the night and into Saturday afternoon.

"The cold water temperature and the time that elapsed since the crash occurred led Navy officials to conclude that aircrew survivability is extremely unlikely," said Navy Lt. Cmdr. Elizabeth Meydenbauer.

Meydenbauer said the Navy knew the location of the sunken helicopter, but had not decided whether the wreckage would be brought up from the ocean floor.

The MH-60S Sierra helicopter, based at Naval Air Station North Island in Coronado, went down around 5:30 p.m. EST Friday. It was on a mission off the USS Bonhomme Richard.

The pilot radioed a mayday but gave no indications of mechanical malfunctions or fire, Meydenbauer said.

One sailor was pulled from the water but died while being treated on the Bonhomme Richard.

Identities of the helicopter crew members would not be released until relatives were notified, Meydenbauer said.

However, Jim Helman of New Richmond, Wis., said Navy officials informed him that his son, Cory Helman, 27, was one of the crew members and had pronounced him dead.

The Bonhomme Richard is an amphibious assault craft that took Marines to Indonesia after the 2004 tsunami.

The MH-60 Sierra is a twin-turbine craft based on the UH-60L Black Hawk and the Navy's SH-60B Seahawk, according to the manufacturer, United Technologies Corp.'s Sikorsky Aircraft. It is designed to operate off aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers and frigates, ranging up to 100 nautical miles from a ship.

Voting Rights Chicanery (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states . . . ."

-- Constitution of the United States, Article I, Section 2

"What's the Constitution between friends?"

-- Rep. Timothy Campbell, a Tammany Democrat, to Democratic President Grover Cleveland after Cleveland said that a bill Campbell favored was unconstitutional.

There they go again. House Democrats should at least provide variety in their venality. On Wednesday, fresh from legislating new ethics regarding relations with lobbyists, they demonstrated that there are worse forms of corruption than those involving martinis and money.

They again voted to give the delegates to the House from Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands and the District of Columbia, and the resident commissioner from Puerto Rico, the right to vote in the House when it is sitting as the Committee of the Whole, which is how it sits almost all the time. It is in that status that almost all debate about and amending of legislation occurs.

If these five votes decide the outcome of a vote in the Committee of the Whole, the matter at issue will be automatically revoted by the full House without those five participating. Still, these five faux members will have powers equal to those of real members on everything but final passage of bills, which often is more perfunctory than the process that leads to that. Almost always, all five delegates are Democrats. (Puerto Rico's current resident commissioner is the first Republican in 100 years.)

What part of the words "several states" do House Democrats not understand? Their cynical assumption is that "the people of the several states" will not notice this dilution of their representation in the House.

Members of Congress today represent, on average, 687,000 people. The population of Guam is 171,000; of American Samoa, 58,000; and of the Virgin Islands, 109,000. The 3.9 million Puerto Ricans are U.S. citizens and have the right to vote for statehood, which they have rejected in three plebiscites (1967, 1993, 1998).

The 58,000 Samoans pay no federal income taxes, but their delegate will be able to participate in raising the taxes of, say, Montanans. Samoa's delegate will have virtually the same power as Rep. Denny Rehberg, who represents all 944,000 Montanans. Obviously the Democrats' reverence for the principle "one person, one vote" is, well, situational.

January 1993 was the last time Democrats engaged in this cynical political alchemy, transmuting delegates from four island jurisdictions, and one from the seat of the federal government, into the functional equivalents of representatives selected by people of "the several states." In January 1993, two months after they lost 10 House seats, they counterfeited half that many votes -- even though they had an 82-seat majority. One year later, such arrogance contributed to the Democrats' loss of their House majority.

In 1970, Democrats were contemplating allowing Puerto Rico's resident commissioner to serve with powers equal to those of real members, but only on standing committees. Rep. Tom Foley, a Washington Democrat then in his third term, told his colleagues that would be fine because those committees are created by the House, not the Constitution, and they "can be extinguished at will and created at will." Furthermore, service on committees involves only "preliminary advisory votes." But, he added, "it is very clear" that "a constitutional amendment would be required" to give a resident commissioner "a vote in the Committee of the Whole of the full House." By 1992, when Foley, then in his 14th term, was speaker and full of the sense of entitlement that deranged Democrats in the last years of their 40-year hold on the House, he supported what the next Democratic speaker, Nancy Pelosi, has now done. In 1994, Foley became the first speaker since 1862 to lose his congressional seat, and the new Republican majority undid what the Democrats had done.

For Speaker Pelosi, two questions about the possible scope of your majoritarian abuse: Given your disregard of the unambiguous language and clear intent of Article I, Section 2 -- which uses the word "state" eight times to designate the only entity from which a member of the House may be chosen -- do you acknowledge any impediment to using your majority to give "Committee of the Whole" voting power to a delegate from, say, the AFL-CIO?

Or, for that matter: Do you think that Article I, Section 5 ("Each house shall be the judge of the . . . qualifications of its own members") allows your majority to give such voting powers to your hairdresser? If not, why not?

The George W. Bush Library: Scholarly Mecca Or $500 Million Oxymoron? (NYT)

By Dorothy Samuels

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

The news reports that President Bush's representatives seem to be closing in on a deal to put a half-billion-dollar presidential library and policy institute at Southern Methodist University in Dallas has inspired the predictable lame jokes and references to "The Pet Goat."

But the project raises issues that are no laughing matter, touching on the writing of history, the university's scholarly mission, governmental integrity and the rule of law.

S.M.U.'s negotiations regarding Mr. Bush's library are bound to have a large public impact, which is why I'm hoping that the university's president, R. Gerald Turner, and members of his board of trustees (presuming Laura Bush, the best-known trustee, has removed herself from the deliberations) can be persuaded to withhold a final go-ahead unless two basic conditions are met.

First, the university should insist that Mr. Bush rescind Executive Order 13233, his 2001 directive that reverses — illegally in the view of many leading historians, journalists and legal thinkers — the strong presumption of a public right of access to presidential papers embedded in the 1978 Presidential Records Act.

Under this early exertion of presidential power, both sitting presidents and former presidents (and even their heirs) can indefinitely postpone public release of sensitive material past the law's usual 12-year waiting period by simply denying a request for access. No explanation is required, and there is no provision for appealing the denial to a trained professional archivist.

Instead, the executive order requires the person requesting the material to begin a costly and time-consuming lawsuit challenging the stonewalling. It's a formula for keeping embarrassing facts secret in perpetuity and for thwarting a full and accurate accounting of a president's time in office, which, presumably, was among S.M.U.'s prime goals in seeking to be home to the new presidential edifice, along with enhancing the university's visibility, prestige and available financial resources.

Mr. Turner told concerned faculty members that the new library would house "a treasure trove of documents and artifacts that describe one of the most intense and controversial periods in our history." For a university interested in promoting historical research and open inquiry, especially one located in the president's home state, it's undoubtedly a mighty tempting prize. But that is all the more reason Mr. Turner and the trustees owe a duty to act decisively to protect the university's reputation, the public's right to know and history itself from Executive Order 13233, and Mr. Bush's ignominious penchant for excessive secrecy.

Second, there is the pesky issue of fund-raising. Following the corruptive path blazed by White House predecessors, Mr. Bush and members of his library committee apparently plan to spend the administration's remaining days trying to coax huge contributions to the budding library complex from friends and well-heeled special interests. Under present law, the identity of presidential library donors, and the amounts they contribute, need not be disclosed. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, supports legislation to change that, but its timing and fate remain unclear. Meanwhile, S.M.U. officials have an opportunity to advance government integrity, and avoid entangling the university in potentially compromising secret fund-raising, by insisting on disclosure.

Dozens of theologians and S.M.U. faculty members have objected to locating Mr. Bush's library and institute at the university, saying among other things that his awful record on civil liberties, the war in Iraq and the abuse of prisoners should preclude any university affiliation. They have it wrong. But so do those who would minimize the university's duty for making sure the highest standards of scholarship, openness and ethics govern the entire enterprise.

Looking For The Angry Populists In Suburbia (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

IN his confrontational response to President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday, Senator Jim Webb of Virginia said that he was going to focus on only two topics. One, as everyone knew it would be, was Iraq.

But before he turned to the war, the new senator spoke about something else: an economy that he said made it seem "as if we are living in two different countries." In one, stock prices, corporate profits and executive pay are rising. In the other, the middle class is barely scraping by.

Mr. Webb said the situation was reminiscent of the early 20th century, when robber barons were raking in wealth and "dispossessed workers at the bottom were threatening revolt."

It was the sort of speech that one might have expected during a deep economic slump. Yet it came instead as most workers have started receiving significant pay increases for the first time in years and as polls show that most Americans think the economy has grown stronger.

This contrast was arguably the most significant part of the speech. As they plan their strategy on Capitol Hill and begin the 2008 presidential campaign, the leaders of the Democratic Party are betting that the temporary swings of the economic cycle no longer have the political power they once did.

Instead, they say, the economic shocks of recent years — technological change, globalization, the decline of labor unions and business icons like Ford Motor Company — have left many swing voters feeling anxious and insecure about the future.

After years of fighting losing battles against tax cuts, Democrats argue that this economic anxiety has altered the political landscape, making swing voters open to a new role for government — a form of what Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois has called "suburban populism."

With issues like energy policy, immigration and health care having gone largely unaddressed in recent years, Democrats see a way to define themselves as the party that can help Americans survive the 21st-century economy.

An unanswered question, though, is whether suburban populism can still have appeal during good economic times.

"The little ups and downs of the economy are not what's bothering the average American, as much as it is the feeling that there are large forces that buffet them around," said Senator Charles Schumer of New York, whose book laying out an agenda for the party was published last week. "In the past, the attitude was, 'Get government out of the way.' And now it's, 'Gee, I may need it.' "

Amy Klobuchar, a freshman senator from Minnesota, pointed out that her state had one of the strongest economies in the country, yet she still based her winning campaign largely on people's economic worries. "They feel insecure," Ms. Klobuchar said last week. "And the point of this is, they're right."

This strategy certainly has risks. Tax cuts — with a heavy dose of optimism thrown in — have been a much better political bet than populism for decades now, and Republicans are sticking to this script. During his address last week, Mr. Bush described the economy as being "on the move," and he is scheduled to visit Peoria, Ill., this week to call attention to recent wage gains. Republicans are pushing for an extension of the tax cuts passed during Mr. Bush's first term that they say are a major cause of the current boom.

The economy emerged from a recession in late 2001, after the first tax cut went into effect, but wages for most workers still did not keep up with inflation for much of the next few years. Only in recent months has that changed.

In 2006, the average hourly pay of rank-and-file workers, who make up about four-fifths of the work force, rose 4.2 percent, while the consumer price index increased only 2.6 percent. The net result — an inflation-adjusted increase of 1.6 percent — was a bigger annual raise than any that workers received from the late 1970s to the mid-90s.

The direction of wages has historically been one of the best predictors, if not the best, of the public mood, and it, too, has been brightening. In a Gallup Poll conducted in mid-January, the share of respondents calling the economy excellent or good — 52 percent — reached its highest level since the Clinton administration.

But even with the recent increases, the real hourly pay of rank-and-file workers has risen only 3 percent since Mr. Bush took office, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Over the same span, productivity — that is, the value of what the economy produces per hour — has risen 18 percent.

Except for a few years in the late 1990s, in fact, pay increases have been modest for most of the last three decades, which appears to be contributing to the anxiety. In exit polls on Election Day, fewer than one in three people said they expected life for the next generation of Americans to be better than life today.

But even if suburban populism has some appeal, Democrats have been less clear about how to translate it into policy. During their first weeks in control of the House, they have passed bills to raise the minimum wage, to cut the interest rate on federally subsidized loans to college students and allow government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies over the cost of drugs sold through Medicare.

But none of the bills has yet passed the Senate, and even if they do, they are unlikely to have a big effect on most middle-class families — the target audience of the new suburban populism.

Some Democrats, in the party's center and on the left, are starting to push for broader ideas. In his new book, Mr. Schumer calls for biometric employment cards to reduce illegal immigration and a crackdown on tax evasion by the wealthy, among other measures. Tom Vilsack, the former Iowa governor who is running for president, is arguing for a push on new energy technology partly to "elevate our economy above global competition."

It is still not clear how much can be done by a party that, for at least another year, will lack a clear leader. In his speech last week, Senator Webb cited two populist role models, Andrew Jackson and Theodore Roosevelt, both of whom were presidents, not Congressional leaders.

But the coming year will give the party's leaders a chance to hone its message — and to see how long the current economic boom will last.

Clinton Begins Her Run In Earnest (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES, Jan. 27 -- Bursting onto the campaign trail for the first time here on Saturday, Democratic New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton quickly confronted two looming questions about her presidential candidacy: whether voters are ready to elect a woman to the White House and how aggressively she would respond to Republican attacks if she were her party's nominee.

Clinton held her first major public event a week after entering the 2008 campaign. It was a glossy, town-hall-style "conversation" with Iowans at a high school here in Des Moines, and it came nearly a full year before the state's first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses, scheduled for next January.

In an auditorium packed with more than 1,000 people -- many of them women -- Clinton stood alone at center stage, her arms outstretched, as she encouraged Iowans to help her win the presidency. "I'm running for president, and I'm in it to win it," she said to a burst of applause.

But the first question put to her focused on whether she, as a woman, would have extra difficulty winning.

Clinton conceded that there may be special obstacles for any female candidate. "I think you've got to move beyond that," she said. "I am going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life experience. The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom, is part of who I am. But I'm going to ask people to vote for the person they believe would be the best president of the United States."

Clinton got just one question about Iraq, and she deflected it without answering it, speaking instead about health care for veterans.

But at a morning session with Iowa Democratic Party officials, she was asked to address her vote for the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war. That vote, along with her reluctance until late last year to recant, has put her at odds with many antiwar activists in the party and is expected to be a factor as she begins to meet voters in a state with a strong antiwar tradition.

"I've taken responsibility for my vote," she said. "But there are no do-overs in life. I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time." She closed by noting: "I may have a slightly different take on this than some of the people who come through here."

The questions at the town hall meeting were uniformly polite and often adulatory. But her appearance among party officials brought out concerns that have echoed for months among party insiders nationally, all related to whether she may be such a polarizing figure that she will have a difficult time getting elected.

Clinton acknowledged that the campaign ahead might become brutal, particularly if she is picked as the Democratic nominee. She noted that she had overcome doubters who had predicted that she could not win a Senate seat in New York. And in response to a question about the lessons she has learned from Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kerry's loss to President Bush in 2004, Clinton promised to respond aggressively when attacked.

"When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents," she said, after a more tepid initial response. She added: "I want to run a positive, issue-oriented, visionary campaign. But you can count on me to stand my ground and fight back."

Clinton is the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, based on national polls of Democrats, her capacity to raise as much or more money than any of her rivals, and the extensive network of loyalists built up during the presidency of her husband, Bill Clinton. But in Iowa, she is just one of four candidates currently viewed as the strongest contenders.

The others are Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who will formally launch his candidacy in two weeks; former North Carolina senator John Edwards, who has a strong base from his second-place finish here in 2004; and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. Many Democrats here see Edwards currently in the strongest position, and he drew a sizable crowd on his first trip to the state as an announced candidate last month. But the campaign appears wide open at this point.

Clinton promised to return here often. And in her town hall appearance, she wryly remarked that she hopes to "have this as a one-on-one conversation, just you and me, and about several hundred national press people." But she added that the hoopla "will fade, and we'll actually be able to pursue this conversation in a very personal way."

Her interaction with the crowd was personal at times, despite the news media crush. One woman, Terri Hoffman, 53, a teacher from Des Moines, confessed in front of the audience that she is going through menopause. Clinton nodded knowingly and smiled. At another point, a member of the audience shouted to Clinton: "You go, girl!"

"You go with me!" Clinton replied.

At the end of her hour-long appearance, as the tune "You Ain't Seen Nothing Yet" filled the gymnasium, Clinton lingered to shake hands and sign autographs -- a practice more closely associated with her husband.

The immediate reaction to Clinton's performance at East High School was enthusiastic. Still, many said that it is far too early for them to commit to her or to any of the other Democratic candidates vying for the nomination.

"She's an electrically charged presence who is articulate," said Marilyn Musser of Des Moines, who had posed the question about how Clinton intends to deal with the gender issue in the campaign.

Musser said Clinton's candidacy is the "most impressive for me," but she added: "We're a long way from the election." She made clear that the prospect of electing the first female president is a factor in her consideration. "What else do women have to prove?" she asked.

Effie Hall of Grinnell, Iowa, was impressed with how well Clinton connected with the audience. "People say she's cold, but I thought she was quite warm," she said.

But Hall said the questions ignored some major issues facing the country. "Iraq wasn't really part of it," she said. "She talked about the VA and her support of the VA [Veterans Affairs] system, but I thought there would be more. Maybe that's an old story. Maybe people knew she supported [the war] and now has backed off."

The Clinton campaign worked to build the crowds. It ran radio ads encouraging people to attend the candidate's public events and used "robocalls" -- automated phone messages using Clinton's voice -- to let the most likely caucus attendees know she was coming. Clinton's advisers said they made no effort to screen those who came to the town hall meeting or to try to manage the questioning.

In addition to her public events, a busy private schedule filled Clinton's 24 hours in Des Moines. She met with Gov. Chet Culver (D) shortly after arriving on Friday, and later attended a private dinner with 15 to 20 Democratic elected officials. On Saturday morning, Clinton met with labor leaders over breakfast at her hotel.

At a house party in Cedar Rapids on Saturday night, Clinton raised the subject of Iraq herself, expressing strong disapproval of Bush's handling of the war and calling for Congress to cut off funding for Iraqi troops.

"The rest of the world is standing with their arms crossed, just kind of waiting to see what we do," she said. "In the Congress, we are trying to set a different message now."

She said that, through a bipartisan resolution of disapproval, the Democratic-led Congress is "trying to demonstrate to the world that at least some of us understand what has to be done."

"But it's going to be hard because we have very few tools that we can use to try to reverse course. The president has enormous power in the area," Clinton said.

In Iowa, Hillary Off And Running (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton began her presidential bid in earnest yesterday with all the momentum and certainty of a candidate in the final days of a campaign.

"I want to have this as a one-on-one conversation," the New York Democrat told a crowd of more than 1,000 Iowans packed into a high school gymnasium.

Absent from that conversation was the dominant issue of the war in Iraq, which Mrs. Clinton voted to authorize in 2002. She did address her vote during a meeting earlier in the day with state Democratic Party officials.

"There are no do-overs in life," Mrs. Clinton said. "I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time."

Two hours before the former first lady arrived for her town hall-style meeting, the folding chairs at East High School's gym were nearly filled and an overflow room had to be opened.

Tall tripods for 17 television cameras were set up. Idling outside were seven satellite trucks and four industrial generators.

But Iowa voters especially those who will participate in the nation's first caucuses just under a year from now on Jan. 18, 2008 are famously persnickety and expect to be courted with humility, preferably in their own living rooms.

So, Mrs. Clinton began like anyone would.

"Well, I'm Hillary Clinton," she said to ecstatic applause. "And I'm happy to be here in Iowa."

Unlike most early campaign events in Iowa where the voters are undecided, the vast majority of those who showed up yesterday were firmly in Mrs. Clinton's camp. Many wore "Hillary!" stickers and buttons and waved posters with messages such as, "I LOVE HRC!"

Though national polls show Mrs. Clinton far ahead of any rival, surveys of Iowa voters show her trailing former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and the favorite son, former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa. However, such early polls are virtually meaningless, especially since Mrs. Clinton had not visited the state since 2003.

In her meeting yesterday with party officials, she made the case for why she should be given the chance to beat the next Republican nominee for president.

"When you are attacked, you have to deck your opponent," said Mrs. Clinton, who has lived in the glare of the national press for nearly 15 years. "I have been through the political wars longer than some of you have been alive. We've got to be prepared to hold our ground and fight back."

Mrs. Clinton said she would have voted differently on authorizing the Iraq war if she had more accurate information at the time. She also said that as the junior senator from New York, she "lived through 9/11" and has "a slightly different take on this from some of the other people who will be coming through here."

However, Mrs. Clinton was not about to offer herself as a peace candidate.

"I do think we are engaged in a war against heartless, ruthless enemies," she said. "If they could come after us again tomorrow, they would do so."

During her forum with voters, Mrs. Clinton was not asked a single question about her vote authorizing the war.

She was asked how she planned to win election to an office that has been held by men for more than 200 years.

"Sometimes, you have to work harder," Mrs. Clinton said.

There were more women than men in the audience, but she strove to play down the issue of a woman as president.

"There will be more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me," Mrs. Clinton said.

But she did not avoid the topic of women in leadership altogether. She gave a nod to the new Democratic House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, and the crowd erupted.

At one point, a woman in the audience shouted, "You go, girl!"

Mrs. Clinton shot back without missing a beat: "Go with me!"

John Barry, a veteran, rose to ask a question and began by saying, somewhat nervously: "America loves you and you look very nice."

Beaming, Mrs. Clinton thanked him, and the crowd roared with approval.

Another issue she met head-on was her failed effort during her husband's White House tenure to implement socialized medicine.

"The problems we were trying to address are still with us," Mrs. Clinton said. "In fact, they've gotten worse."

She said she remains committed to "universal health care coverage" and predicted that it's a matter of "when," not "if" it will happen.

"We are finally creating a consensus in the country for this," Mrs. Clinton said.

DOJ_NMG_0123538

On global warming, she said: "Of course, global climate change is real, and it is a threat."

On the disparity among states regarding the foster care of children, Mrs. Clinton said: "I do think we need a national approach to that."

Terri Hoffman, 53, an eighth-grade teacher was among those surprised not to hear more about the war. She opposes it, but said she still could support Mrs. Clinton. Her only reservation is that she also likes Mr. Edwards, who has energetically courted voters here for two years.

Miss Hoffman worries that voters might shy away from voting for a woman.

"If they become a team, I guess I would be very happy," she said. "I think she'll be a great vice president."

Natalie Coates, 17, of Goshen, Ind., attended the event with her mother. She has no reservations whatsoever.

"I think it's awesome that she's a woman," Natalie said.

By the time Election Day rolls around, she will be eligible to vote, and she said she would cast her first-ever ballot for Mrs. Clinton.

Clinton Hits Campaign Trail In Iowa (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 27, 2007

DES MOINES — New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton plunged into her presidential campaign Saturday at a town hall meeting complete with professionally printed banners and placards, a live jazz band and a crowd that was anything but tough.

"I'm running for president and I'm in it to win," Clinton told a raucous audience in a gym at East High School, before fielding a series of questions that sometimes began with statements like "I think you look very nice" and "You're one of my idols."

Clinton offered a taste of how she intended to win at an earlier meeting with state party leaders when someone asked what she had learned from Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's losing 2004 campaign.

"When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents," Clinton said to laughter and applause from about 50 members of the Iowa Democratic Party Central Committee. "I want to run a positive, issue-oriented, visionary campaign. But you can count on me to stand my ground and fight back."

The Iowa caucuses kick off the nomination season for both parties in less than a year. Clinton's two-day tour of Des Moines, Cedar rapids and Davenport was her first visit here in more than three years.

While she leads in all national matchups of prospective Democratic nominees, two polls of likely Iowa caucus-goers this month had Clinton in third or fourth place. She was clustered with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, and all three were well behind former North Carolina senator John Edwards.

The gym at East High School was packed with more than 1,000 people and some 150 journalists from around the country and the world, including Japan, England, France, Germany, Italy and Switzerland.. Another 1,000 people watched the meeting from an overflow room.

The level of attention was similar to Obama's trip to New Hampshire, site of the first primary, last month. Some people were diehard Hillary fans; others were checking out the talent. Steve Tuttle, 59, a retired television news director, said he is interested in Clinton and Obama, who is black. "Let's mix it up," he said. "I'm tired of looking at old white guys because I am one."

Clinton told the town meeting that "bad decisions coming out of our government" are undermining "the promise of America" for the poor and middle class. She made clear she would not shy from the issue that was so problematic for her during her husband's administration. "I am committed to universal health care," she said to applause, adding she would offer specific ideas later in the campaign.

Several people asked Clinton how she would handle potential resistance to the notion of a female president. "I don't think I'm the only woman here who feels that sometimes you have to work even harder, right? And I'm prepared to do that," she said. "We are good at breaking barriers and going places nobody's gone before."

Without using the words "Bill" or "my husband," Clinton praised his administration for creating budget surpluses, helping schools finance new buildings and improving medical care for veterans. Talking to the Democratic committee members, she said she has favored repeal of one Clinton era policy — the don't ask, don't tell policy applying to gay people in the military.

Thousands of patriotic Americans have been discharged and "that to me does not make sense," Clinton said, adding the United States should judge military personnel as its allies do: by "actions and behavior, not status."

Clinton took two questions on Iraq from the state committee members. She said she does not support cutting off funds to troops in the field and does support working for a bipartisan resolution in the Senate. "We have to build the political will within the Congress to stop President Bush. That means getting Republicans to turn on this policy and turn against the president," she told them.

Edwards and Vilsack have urged that U.S. troops be withdrawn. Clinton said that "it's easy being on the outside saying 'Do this' or 'Do that.' But inside you've got to figure out how to get the votes to do anything, and that's what we're working on."

Sen. Clinton Woos Voters In Iowa (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton took on the full trappings of a presidential candidate Saturday on her first campaign swing across Iowa, where she defended her early support of the Iraq war and played up her chance to "break a historic barrier" as the first woman to win the White House.

Clinton's Iowa visit opened her yearlong courtship of Democratic voters in the state whose precinct caucuses launch the 2008 presidential nominating process. Clinton, who is leading her Democratic rivals in national polls but not in Iowa, sought above all to spur excitement over her status as the only major female candidate.

"When people tell me, 'Well you know, I don't think a woman can be elected president,' I say, 'Well, I don't believe that, but we're going to find out,' " she told nearly 2,000 Iowans at her campaign kickoff rally in a Des Moines school gymnasium.

Greeted with repeated roars of cheering, the New York senator and former first lady said she expected "more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me."

"I just have accepted that," she said. "And there may be some other kind of funny stories about differences between us, or a little bit of the double standard, but I just reject that. You know, I think we've got to move beyond that. I'm going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life and experience."

Vowing tougher federal action to ensure equal pay for women and men, she told the crowd: "Women have made progress, and I'm very proud of that, but it is still not equitable."

For Clinton, who announced Jan. 20 that she was forming a presidential exploratory committee, the weekend spent in Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Davenport marks her first foray before live voters after several online and carefully screened chats.

At the school rally, Clinton operatives supplied thousands of "Hillary for President" placards and bumper stickers.

Dangling from the gymnasium ceiling were red-white-and-blue banners declaring: "Let the conversation begin! Iowa welcomes Hillary Clinton for President."

But the commotion created by the dozens of television crews and scores of reporters covering her appearance threatened to upend the intimate bonding that Iowans had come to expect from presidential candidates.

"I want to have this as a one-on-one conversation, just you and me and about several hundred national press people," Clinton joked at the rally. "But I have to tell you that will fade, and we'll actually be able to pursue this conversation in a very personal way."

She attempted to do that Saturday evening at a Cedar Rapids gathering with roughly 150 invited guests at a private home where media access was limited.

In larger settings, like the Des Moines school rally, her reception was overwhelmingly favorable.

"Being the first lady, she must have learned a lot there," said Des Moines teacher Samra Olofson, 52, who sees Clinton as the most experienced Democrat in the race. "I've been hoping she would run for a long time."

For now, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the 2004 Democratic nominee for vice president, is leading Iowa polls, followed by Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and others. Edwards, a frequent Iowa visitor over the last two years, has made painstaking efforts to expand his political network in the state, leaving Clinton and Obama to play catch-up.

With that in mind, Clinton met Friday with Iowa Gov. Chet Culver, a Democrat who has not endorsed a presidential candidate. Clinton also dropped by a diner Friday night for a milkshake with a Des Moines Register political columnist and met Saturday with union leaders at a hotel.

In public, Clinton tried to appeal to Democrats in this largely rural state by reminding them of the upstate New York farming regions that she represents in the Senate.

"We have cows — and on our farms live happy cows," she told several dozen Democrats gathered at state party headquarters Saturday morning.

There, as elsewhere, Clinton faced questions about her 2002 vote to authorize the war.

"I've taken responsibility for my vote, but there are no do-overs in life," she said. "I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time."

Clinton reminded the crowd of her support for a cap on the number of U.S. troops in the war and her opposition to President Bush's plan to add more than 20,000.

DOJ_NMG_0123540

"We have to build the political will within the Congress to stop President Bush," she said. "That means getting Republicans to turn on this policy and turn against the president."

At the same time, she said she was against "cutting off funds to troops in the field."

Jim Hutter, a former state Democratic committee member who asked Clinton about the war, said: "I thought it was a great answer."

As she campaigned in Des Moines, Clinton alternated between taking shots at the Bush administration and reminiscing about the Clinton White House years.

"When I was in the White House, I worked to help craft the children's health insurance program, and it has worked extremely well, but now the administration has begun to cut it back," said Clinton, who renewed her call for universal health coverage but provided no details on how to accomplish it.

Clinton praised her husband's record on veterans benefits, but also called for repealing his "don't ask, don't tell" policy, which requires gays and lesbians in the military to hide their sexual orientation. She said thousands had been discharged and "that, to me, does not make sense."

Clinton also cast herself as a strong leader. She said the United States must put tough labor and environmental standards into trade agreements and "make it clear to countries that take advantage of our markets that we're not going to be patsies any longer."

On political matters, too, Clinton struck a tough tone. Responding to a question on lessons from Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential campaign in 2004, she drew guffaws and cheers by responding: "When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents."

Clinton Begins Journey To White House (CHIT)

By Ray Quintanilla

Chicago Tribune, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES—Sen. Hillary Clinton began her presidential journey in this bellwether state on Saturday, raising energy and health-care issues but remaining conspicuously silent on the war in Iraq.

"I want to renew the promise of America. It starts right here in Iowa. I'm in it to win," Clinton (D-N.Y.) told cheering supporters—many of them women—who packed the gym at East High School here.

"You go, girl," came a shout from the audience.

"You come with me," Clinton replied, generating much applause.

Vowing to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil and re-ignite a push for universal health care coverage, the former first lady spoke for an hour during what her campaign billed as a "conversation with Iowans." She also talked of a need to change the "traditional roles" of women across society.

Saturday's event was Clinton's first political speech in the state since declaring a week earlier that she would seek the Democratic Party's nomination for president.

She took questions and spoke of boosting production of ethanol, increasing education funding and revamping how health care is delivered, especially to the poor. She said 20 percent of the nation's Medicaid dollars are related to diabetes, an illness that can be prevented or controlled with proper care. Yet the health care system does little to fund wellness care for those who are at risk, she said, adding: "But our system will pay to have your foot amputated. That has to change."

Missing from the day's "conversation" was a meaningful discussion on the war in Iraq. And that fact wasn't lost on some in the audience who groaned when Clinton spoke at length about standardized tests for schoolchildren.

"How can you get up and speak for an hour, and not talk about the war?" asked Thomasine Johnson, 66, shaking her head as she left the gym. "I am very disappointed she said nothing about why we are there, or how we can get out of Iraq. She voted for the war."

Roberta Hardwick, 35, said Clinton touched on all of the hot-button issues other than the war.

"Clinton talked about the need to help our veterans, and there was a good opportunity to address the war. But it didn't happen," said Hardwick, of Des Moines. "I am kind of disappointed about that."

She did discuss Iraq in an interview with The Associated Press, conceding that "I take responsibility" for voting to give President Bush authority to wage war.

"I have said clearly and consistently for quite some time that I regret the way the president misused the authority" given him by Congress to act in Iraq, Clinton told the AP. "He misled Congress and the country on what he was seeking and what he intended to do."

"I take responsibility for having voted to give him that authority," she said. "My focus is on what we do now. That is the proper debate."

Others who heard Clinton here Saturday praised her for entering the presidential race, and said they left the gym feeling excited about the prospect of having a woman president for the first time.

"She did a thoughtful job of answering all the questions, and I believe her views are right on target," said Dayna Chandler, a 37-year-old mother of four who lives in Des Moines. "She's very confident, and I like that about her."

Jim Hutter, political science professor at Iowa State University in Ames, said Clinton's first major public speech in the Hawkeye State probably won't have much lasting impact, considering that the presidential caucuses are a year away.

Still, he added, Clinton is among the candidates generating interest from Democratic activists, many of whom were on hand Saturday. Others getting attention, he said, are former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's candidacy has sparked excitement as well, Hutter said.

Clinton told the AP she wouldn't concede the black vote to Obama. "I'm going to be asking for the votes of all Americans," she said.

Hutter has been an observer of Iowa's caucuses since the late 1960s.

"Having a political organization on the ground here is important, and so far Sen. Edwards seems to have the inside track," he said. "[Clinton] has to get to work on building an organization," he explained.

Later Saturday, Clinton was to travel to Cedar Rapids for a house party with supporters, and had a similar event planned for Sunday morning in Davenport.

Clinton Explains Role In Authorizing War (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, January 27, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) - New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton blamed President Bush on Saturday for misusing authority given him by Congress to act in Iraq, but conceded "I take responsibility" for her role in allowing that to happen.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Clinton also said she would not cede black votes to Barack Obama and that she had proven as a U.S. senator that gender is irrelevant.

Of her husband, the former president, she said he would have a role in the campaign but "I'm the one running for president."

Clinton was making her first campaign swing through this early nominating state, which twice voted for Bill Clinton for president. She met with key activists and held a raucous town hall meeting with 1,500 cheering backers and hundreds of journalists.

"I have said clearly and consistently for quite some time that I regret the way the president misused the authority," said Clinton. "He misled Congress and the country on what he was seeking and what he intended to do."

The responsibility Clinton said she accepts was helping clear the way for Bush's path in Iraq.

"I take responsibility for having voted to give him that authority," she said. "My focus is on what we do now. That is the proper debate."

In the interview:

Clinton said she expected to attract black votes even though Obama, the freshman Illinois senator, has caught fire. "I'm going to be asking for the votes of all Americans," she said.

Her husband will play a key role in her campaign, though she'll make it clear she's the candidate. "At the end of the day when voters make up their mind, I will have a great team around me, including him," she said.

Her experience in a failed health care reform effort in the White House does not dampen her effort to again deal with the issue. "I think it makes me a more effective messenger," she said. "I now what the roadblocks and obstacles are."

Clinton expressed confidence voters are ready to elect a woman president. "It's one of those issues that evolves over time," she said. "I'm very confident I can see it unfold."

In her first campaign swing through Iowa, the New York senator told party activists that Democrats in 2008 will face "someone on the other side who will be very tough and strong, even bellicose perhaps."

That likely was a reference to Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, who has taken a hard line in supporting more U.S. troops to Iraq, as Bush has announced.

The former first lady also said has learned the lessons of the last two presidential campaigns, both lost by Democrats who responded slowly to criticism.

"When you are attacked, you have to deck your opponent," Clinton said. "I have been through the political wars longer than some of you have been alive. We've got to be prepared to hold our ground and fight back."

Clinton, who announced her candidacy last weekend, said Democrats cannot concede the security issue.

"We have to nominate someone who can have the trust and confidence of the American people to make the tough decisions as commander in chief," she said. "That is the threshold issue."

Her initial foray in Iowa was far different from the traditional caucus campaigning, with a few people in a living room. More than 1,500 people jammed a high school gymnasium for a town hall-style meeting. Some 150 reporters and photographers chronicled the event.

Earlier, she met with state Democrats at the party's headquarters.

Attention focused on Iraq and her vote to authorize the use of force ahead of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Presidential rivals such as former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards now say the vote in support was a mistake.

"There are no do-overs in life," Clinton said. She says Congress received bad information going into the vote and that she would have voted differently given what she knows now.

"As a senator from New York, I lived through 9/11 and I am still dealing with the aftereffects," Clinton said. "I may have a slightly different take on this from some of the other people who will be coming through here."

Clinton said her view is that the nation is engaged in a deadly fight against terrorism, a battle that she contends Bush has botched.

"I do think we are engaged in a war against heartless, ruthless enemies," she said. "If they could come after us again tomorrow they would do so."

Clinton has urged a cap to the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, but has refused to go along with suggestions that Congress use its power of the purse to bring the war to a halt.

"This will be a problem that will be left to the next president," the senator said. "We've got to figure out now, given where we are, how we go forward."

In First Iowa Foray, Clinton Vows To Be Tough (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa -- Newly minted Iowa voter Laura Nutt wore three Hillary Rodham Clinton buttons on her sweatshirt, but the heart underneath was torn between the former first lady and Sen. Barack Obama.

"I really like her, but I'm mostly leaning towards Obama," said the 18-year-old high school senior, one of 2,000 Iowans who jammed the gym of East Hills High School to hear Clinton Saturday. "I'm looking at the war and I'm looking at a whole bunch of issues but I'm leaning toward Obama."

Such was the challenge Clinton faced during her first foray to Iowa as a presidential contestant, a two-day statewide tour with stops in the state capital, Cedar Rapids and Davenport. She steered mostly clear of Iraq -- addressing the issue for less than a minute during her 90-minute high school forum -- instead couching a populist economic message in some pugilistic language.

Clinton said she was the best Democrat to take on "bellicose" GOP opponents, such as Arizona Sen. John McCain and Rudolph Giuliani.

"When you are attacked, you have to deck your opponent," she told Democratic state committee members earlier in the day. "I have been through the political wars longer than some of you have been alive. We've got to be prepared to hold our ground and fight back."

Clinton was given a rock-star welcome at the forum, arriving to Jesus Jones' "Right Here, Right Now," an early '90s dance-floor anthem.

"I will be here over and over again," the New York Democrat promised. "You may not always agree with me and we may not always see the world exactly the same, but I will answer your questions."

Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucus next January is considered a key hurdle for Clinton, 59. She trails in early Iowa polls to Obama, former vice presidential candidate John Edwards and ex-Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

"She's very formidable and now she's on the ground," said former state Democratic chairman Gordon Fischer, a Vilsack supporter. "As she meets with people, as they see how intelligent and charming she is, her poll numbers will move steadily higher. ... She's the person to beat in Iowa."

Clinton was trailed by a brigade of reporters, including at least three TV crews from Japan. On her future Iowa trips, she vowed, the press attention "will fade and we'll be able to pursue this conversation in a very personal way." She went on to predict that reporters soon would embark on a new slate of stories about "my hair and my clothes."

On Friday, Vilsack took an indirect swipe at Clinton, saying her proposal to cap the number of troops in Iraq amounted to staying the course.

Clinton dismissed stronger measures Saturrday, including a cutoff of funding for the troop surge, saying Democrats still needed to "build the will to stop President Bush" in Congress.

"The war is Bush's problem, not Hillary's," said James Jackson, 63, an accountant from Des Moines who supports her.

Clinton In DM: "No Do-overs" On Iraq (DMR)

Des Moines Register, January 28, 2007

U.S. Sen. Hillary Clinton confronted doubts today about her ability to win the 2008 presidential election and defended her position on the Iraq war during her first day in Iowa as a candidate for president.

The New York Democrat, who leads her party's presidential hopefuls in national polls, also insisted that her celebrity status will not inhibit her from waging a hands-on campaign for Iowa's lead-off caucuses.

"Many of the doubts that are being expressed now were certainly present when I made my initial listening tour in New York. There were so many doubts," Clinton said in a Des Moines Register interview.

Clinton insisted that the crush of national and international news media that greeted her at a blockbuster forum at East High School in Des Moines and shadowed her 10-car motorcade around the city would subside as her campaign progressed.

Should that occur, voters will get to know her better, Clinton said.

"People want to assess me for themselves. They don't want to take what other people say about me at face value," she added.

To that end, Clinton's campaign granted broad public access to her events, although she met early Saturday with labor leaders in private.

National media were allowed limited access to Clinton, with all of them congregating at East High.

A half-dozen satellite news trucks purred outside East High's new community center while dozens of news media from Iowa, New York, Washington, D.C., and around the world waited inside.

An especially noticeable contingent of Japanese press was on hand. Producers from some of the international networks said interest in Clinton's candidacy is huge in Japan.

Clinton also acknowledged doubts about her chances in a general election, should she win the nomination, that stem from national polls that consistently show her unfavorable rating to be around 40 percent.

"I do seem to inspire strong feelings," the 59-year-old former first lady told two dozen of Iowa's most influential Democrats at the state party's central committee meeting in Des Moines.

In small groups, during interviews with Iowa media and in front of about 1,500 people at East High, Clinton repeatedly said voters will find her the most qualified Democrat, if they can get past the national hype.

She never mentioned her husband Bill's time in office as the most recent Democrat president. Instead, she touted her six years in the Senate, career as a lawyer in Arkansas and policy efforts while first lady.

"Let's start with what's the most important concern: Who can be the best president?" she said in the Register interview. "I think I'm that person. And if that's the question we get to, then I believe people will feel comfortable supporting me."

Clinton's heralded arrival in Iowa this weekend came a week after she declared she would form a committee to explore the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

The East High forum had the flavor of a fall campaign's closing days, with many in the jammed gymnasium waving "Hillary" signs. Another 1,000 people gathered in the old gym to watch on TV.

Clinton took questions about health care, being a woman presidential candidate and the war in Iraq.

"I'm less skeptical than I was two hours ago," Des Moines Democrat Elizabeth Sedrel said, as supporters and photographers flocked around Clinton at the end of the forum. "But I'm still not sure. There's a long way to go."

Clinton pivoted away from her position about the politically touchy war in Iraq during the forum, and talked more about veterans health benefits.

But during the meeting with state party leaders, she was asked directly about the potential problem her vote for the 2002 resolution authorizing President Bush's use of force in Iraq.

Clinton said, as she has since last month, that she would not have voted for the resolution had she known that the Bush administration's justifications for the war would be proven to be unfounded.

She also shot back at her rivals, who have become more openly critical of Clinton for not saying the vote was a mistake.

"I've taken responsibility for my vote. But there are no do-overs in life. I wish there were," she told the group.

"I've also been a member of the Senate and looked for ways to help try to manage this very dangerous situation," she said earlier, during the interview.

Former Sen. John Edwards, who leads in early caucus polls, and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack have said Clinton has not done enough to stop Bush from sending more troops to Iraq.

"It's easy to be on the sidelines and say this and that," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0123544

Clinton has called for capping troops at existing levels in Iraq, gradually redeploying them and cutting funding for Iraqi security forces.

She opposes Bush's plan to send the additional 21,500 troops to secure Baghdad and other areas in Iraq. But she also opposes blocking funding for those troops.

Instead, she said, getting Republican support for a non-binding resolution expressing opposition to the troop surge can spark a political movement to end the war.

Ames Democrat Jim Hutter, a former member of the state central committee, said Clinton's answer satisfied him.

"My concern is Iowa caucus-goers have not heard her make the statement she made today," said Hutter, who supported former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean in the 2004 caucuses but is undecided about 2008.

Clinton has trailed Edwards in Iowa and has support similar to Vilsack and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, according to recent polls.

Clinton said Iowans have not seen her up close yet. She promised to wage an all-out campaign for the caucuses, less than a year away.

She planned to campaign tonight in Cedar Rapids and Sunday in Davenport. Her first event in Davenport, originally planned as a small-group gathering at a restaurant, is now scheduled as another town hall-style forum at the Mississippi Valley Fairgrounds.

Clinton stopped short of saying she expected to win the Iowa caucuses.

"I have no expectations," she said. "I'm starting off (with) the idea I have to earn every vote. That's what I did in New York. That's what I'm going to try to do in Iowa."

Pool Report 1: Sen. Clinton At Iowa Democratic Party Central Committee Meeting (POL)

The Politico, January 27, 2007

Because Hillary Clinton's media entourage in Iowa is so large, her staff designated some events as "pool only." The pool reporter is responsible for telling colleagues at other news organizations what happened at pool-only events. This pool report was filed by Jackie Calmes, a political reporter for The Wall Street Journal.

In her first publicly scheduled meeting of a frigid Iowa campaign weekend, Sen. Clinton arrived this morning to a polite standing ovation from about 50 Democrats who were mostly at two long tables arranged parallel to each other and perpendicular to the podium.

"I thought I'd drop by," she started out, to some chuckles. "I was just looking around for something to do on a Saturday." Then getting right to the point, she continued, "I'm in, I'm in to win," and will campaign "exactly along the lines Iowans expect," going from living rooms to church basements to union halls. She noted her New York record of going all over the state, proving the doubters wrong –including the media that believed she'd find it too "boring"—by winning and then getting reelected.

Think NY is so different from Iowa? "We even have farms…34,000 at last count," she said, joking that "I actually took so much grief" during past debate on a farm bill from colleagues under the impression NY is an urban place. "They made so much fun of me." She boasted that her adopted state is No. 2 in apple production, No. 3 in dairy. "We have cows and on our farms live happy cows." Lots of laughter from the Iowans.

Then to issues.

* "We're going to get to universal health care coverage," she said, acknowledging she doesn't exactly know how. But "since I do have a little experience in this area, I know what not to do." More laughter.

* "We're going to have a new energy future in America….We should have something like a Manhattan Project. (Lots of applause here)

* Global climate change: Unlike President Bush, "We know it's real; we've got to tackle it." In doing so, jobs will be created for "a win-win."

* Education: "From preschool through higher education, we're losing ground." She recounted her record of involvement in education going back to her days as Arkansas' first lady.

* Then the war: "We've got to bring the Iraq War to the right end." (More below from Q-and-A portion)

* "Repair and rebuild our alliances"

* Support "labor and environmental standards in trade agreements."

"I think I know what I'm getting into," she continued. "I do seem to inspire strong feelings." More chuckles from the crowd, and scattered applause.

"I'm going to go out and try to earn your votes. I love this."

Then she said she'd take a few questions. A man asked what lessons she'd learned from the Kerry campaign. Clinton initially seemed to duck the point, noting "I've learned a lot of lessons" from the years of campaigns she's been involved in, her own and her husband's. She said "I believe strongly as a Democrat and a progressive" that Democrats have lay out their visions. Then she added that she also believes, "When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents." The group liked that—laughter, clapping.

"I want to run a positive, issue-oriented, visionary campaign. But you can count on me to stand my ground and fight back."

Second question: whether she supports the military's don't-ask-don't-tell policy, this from a man who suggested he agreed with those who say the (Clinton Administration) policy is bad for the military.

"I have been in favor of repealing 'don't ask, don't tell,'" she said. (Spokesman Howard Wolfson says this isn't a new stand for her.) She said thousands of patriotic Americans have been discharged. "That to me does not make sense," she said. She noted that the US should judge military personnel –as US allies do --by "Actions and behavior, not status."

Third question: Her view on "the surge" and whether the Senate resolution has "teeth."

"I oppose the president's escalation," she said, and support a cap on troops. "I'm not for cutting off funds to troops in the field." She said she supports working toward a bipartisan resolution in the Senate, telling the Iowans that even if the president hasn't taken the anti-war message from the '06 election results, many Republicans in Congress have. "We have to build the political will within the Congress to stop President Bush. That means getting Republicans to turn on this policy and turn against the president."

After some further discussion of Democrats' efforts for a phased redeployment since 2005, she said, "It's easy being on the outside saying 'Do this' or 'Do that.' But inside you've got to figure out how to get the votes to do anything, and that's what we're working on."

Fourth and last: Another question on the war from a man (Jim Hutter, a former central committee member, now here as an interested –and uncommitted—party activist) who asked the senator to 'say more" about her 2002 vote on the use of force. He said some people "simply don't seem to want to get past that."

Clinton did her riff about how if we'd known then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote. "I've taken responsibility for my vote. But there are no do-overs in life. I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time. I said this was not a vote for preemptive war. The president took my vote, and others' votes, and basically misused the authority we gave him." As president, she said, "I would never have diverted our attention and our focus from Afghanistan." This got some of the biggest applause of the event.

She closed, adding this: "I may have a slightly different take on this than some of the people who come through here."

She got an enthusiastic standing ovation, then spent a good 10-15 minutes signing autographs, including in copies of her books. Then she retired to a back room to meet state party officials privately. For what it's worth, Mr. Hutter said of her war vote answer, "I thought it was a great answer."

Dour McCain (NOVAK)

Robert Novak, January 27, 2007

Democratic strategists who had feared Sen. John McCain as the potentially unbeatable Republican candidate for president in 2008 were surprised and delighted by his dour appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press" last Sunday.

One Democratic leader referred to McCain's performance, in suggesting President Bush's additional 21,000 troops may be inadequate, as "comatose." A Republican adviser to McCain said it was one of the worst performances ever on "Meet the Press." The senator's defender said he could not be expected to be cheerful about a plan to send additional U.S. troops in harm's way.

A footnote: Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is picking up support for president among House Republicans, headed by former Speaker Dennis Hastert.

Whither Rahm?

Sources close to Sen. Barack Obama are sure that Rep. Rahm Emanuel will not support his fellow Illinois Democrat for the presidential nomination but will back Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

If so, Emanuel would be the only prominent Democratic officeholder in Illinois not for Obama. As a senior White House aide, Emanuel was one of President Bill Clinton's favorites. Emanuel has been close to both of the Clintons.

Emanuel refuses to talk about his 2008 presidential choice. He says he was deeply engaged in politics for two years as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and in his new role, as House Democratic Caucus chairman, he is committed to legislation.

Undermining Hillary

Jerome Corsi, co-author of the 2004 campaign book "Unfit for Command" attacking Sen. John Kerry's war record, joined up Tuesday with the organization intended to similarly undermine Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in the 2008 campaign.

TheVanguard.org is intended to be a right-wing version of the leftist MoveOn.Org. It was founded by Silicon Valley entrepreneurs, including Gil Amelio, former CEO of Apple and National Semiconductor.

DOJ_NMG_0123546

Coming on board Feb. 16 as TheVanguard's full-time editorial and creative director will be Richard Poe, who has served as editor-in-chief of FrontPage Magazine. He has been described as the conservative movement's leading expert on MoveOn.Org's strategy in bringing together disparate elements with a common viewpoint.

Bush on Abortion

President Bush extended his stay at Camp David last weekend to arrive back at the White House Monday afternoon, missing the annual anti-abortion March for Life that morning in Washington to mark the anniversary of the Roe v. Wade decision.

Bush was at the White House on Jan. 22, 2001, for the first March of his presidency but sent a written statement rather than attend in person. For the next five years, he was out of town for the event: Charleston, W.Va. (2002), St. Louis (2003), Roswell, N.M. (2004), Camp David (2005) and Manhattan, Kan. (2006). His routine is to address the event by phone.

A footnote: Only two of the many Republican presidential hopefuls attended this year's March for Life: Rep. Duncan Hunter of California and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas. On Sunday, Brownback visited the Holiday Inn on Capitol Hill, mingling with marchers from Iowa (the first state in the presidential nomination process).

Dollars for Rudy

Texas Republican contributors are being solicited to spend $30,000 for dinner with former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani at the Houstonian Hotel in Houston Feb. 1 to finance his "presidential exploratory committee." The "private" dinner will follow a 6:30 to 8 p.m. cocktail reception, costing $2,100 a person and $4,200 for couples.

The best-known host of Giuliani's Houston event is billionaire oilman T. Boone Pickens Jr., chairman of the private equity firm BP Capital Management. Also on Giuliani's Texas fund-raising team are Tom Hicks, whose company owns the Texas Rangers baseball team; oil industry executive Jim Lee; and lawyer Patrick C. Oxford.

A footnote: A Giuliani fund-raiser will be held Jan. 29 in Pacific Palisades, Calif., at the home of Bill Simon, the 2002 Republican candidate for governor of California, costing $2,300 a person and $4,600 per couple. Hillary Pushes Personality, Ducks Iraq (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES - - In her first face-to-face meeting with voters since announcing for president, Hillary Clinton was asked about Iraq and ducked the question.

A man, who identified himself as a Gulf War vet, asked the New York senator at a town meeting in a high school gym here Saturday if the surge of new troops to Iraq “was going to be enough?”

Instead of answering, Hillary (as she is officially called by her campaign) said, “Thanks so much for your service” and then talked about how she visits military hospitals and believes America needs to provide good medical care for its veterans.

In the one-hour town meeting, Hillary did not mention Iraq a single time. She mentioned ethanol twice.

Ethanol, a gasoline substitute that can be made from corn, is wildly popular in this state where corn grows in profusion.

Iraq is far less popular here. In an interview with Gov. Chet Culver Friday, he told me, “We have lost 50 heroes, 50 Iowans in Iraq and Afghanistan. Every day it is becoming more of an issue.”

Hillary’s refusal to apologize for her vote to authorize the Iraq war rankles some Democrats here. Bruce Stone from Grimes, Iowa, said: “My problems with Hillary is she voted for the Iraq war and, until a few months ago, she supported it. I am a Vietnam-era vet and I take war very seriously. Her husband? He walks on water.”

But it is Hillary’s turn to slog through the presidential waters now. Before her town meeting, she went to Democratic state headquarters to meet with party activists. When asked about the war there, she said: “There are no do-overs in life." According to the Associated Press, she said Congress received bad information going into the vote and that she would have voted differently given what she knows now.

It is possible Hillary did not mean to duck the Iraq question from the Gulf War vet. Perhaps she was a little rattled when the vet, who identified himself as John Barry, ended his question to her by saying, “I think you look very nice.”

Earlier in her town meeting, Hillary had said with a smile, “I suppose there will be more stories about my clothes and hair than some other people running for president.” The crowd laughed.

Except for that one moment regarding Iraq, Hillary gave a virtually flawless performance from the moment she walked into the overflowing gym with her Secret Service detail discreetly sitting in the crowd, not standing in front of the low stage.

(Hillary gets Secret Service protection by virtue of her being a former First Lady, not because she is a presidential candidate. While security can keep you at a distance from voters, it also makes a campaign look big time - - something Hillary's campaign would probably look like anyway.)

The crowd of about 1,400 had waited outside the gym in weather 9 degrees below freezing, a balmy day for Iowa in January in other words. One man held a sign that said, "Bill Clinton: First Lady's Man," which was either negative or just literal.

Hillary told the crowd, "I want a one-on-one conversation - - you me and several hundred national press." Both Hillary and the crowd laughed. "But I have to tell you, that will fade," she said.

Probably not.

By virtue of the polls and her background, Hillary is the front runner. Although she is only just days into her second term in the Senate, she is the candidate of experience among the top tier of Democratic candidates, which is made up of Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards.

Being in the Senate is hardly a guarantee of getting to the White House, however. Only two senators in history - - Warren G. Harding and John F. Kennedy - - went directly from the Senate to the presidency. (And both died in office.)

Voters seem to prefer governors. Just in the last few decades, we have had former governors Ronald Reagan, Bill Clinton and George W. Bush elected to the presidency, all of whom served two terms.

There are at least three reasons for this: First, governors have executive experience and know how to get things done and that is appealing to voters. Second, unlike Senators, governors do not have hundreds of votes they have to defend against attack at campaign time. Third, governors can exploit anti-Washington feeling to their advantage.

But that was before 9/11. Doesn't 9/11 make American voters want a candidate with national security experience like some senators have?

I asked Tom Vilsack, the former two-term governor of Iowa, who is running for president, that precise question.

"Questions like that makes me want to reach across this table and strangle you," Vilsack said. (Rarely, if ever, do presidential candidates follow up on their death threats.) "It is not about what experience you have, but how you make decisions. I don't think 9/11 changes the dynamic."

When Mike Huckabee, former Republican governor of Arkansas, was asked recently at a lunch with reporters what he brings to a presidential campaigns, he said, "I think four things are necessary for a successful campaign: Message, understanding of Media, Motivated volunteers, and Money." Experience, which doesn't start with an M, did not make his list.

When he was asked about this, he said, "I believe it's going to be more about leadership. I don't think a Washington address and being in Congress will be an asset."

He hopes.

Hillary, on the other, hand, told the crowd Saturday, "I believe I have a lifetime of experiences that qualify me to take office in January, 2009."

"Go, girl!" a woman shouted from the crowd.

"Go with me!" Hillary replied.

Clinton's Presidential Posturing (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

When Lt. Gen. David Petraeus went before the Senate Armed Services Committee last week in open session, its members understandably had many questions for the new commander of American forces in Iraq.

They knew of his reputation as a battlefield leader, trainer of Iraqi troops and co-author of the Army manual on counterinsurgency warfare. They also recognized the difficulty and importance of his new assignment.

Many of the questions probed the rationale for the president's new strategy of injecting more U.S. troops into Baghdad neighborhoods racked by killings by rival Sunni and Shiite gangs. Others challenged the readiness of Iraqi forces and the Baghdad government to do their part in reducing sectarian violence.

A few of the questions were naive, self-serving or tangents. But virtually all members of the committee were present, and senators of both parties recognized the value of probing this experienced and candid witness.

With one exception. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York used her time to make a speech about Iraq policy and did not ask a single question of the man who will be leading the military campaign.

Her speech replayed some of the themes from her news conference the previous week, on her return from Iraq, when she made clear her disagreement with President Bush's decision to add 21,500 soldiers and Marines to Petraeus's force.

She began by blaming the Iraq crisis on a "Congress [that] was supine under the Republican majority, failing to conduct oversight and demanding accountability, and because the president and his team, particularly the former secretary of defense, refused to adapt to the changing circumstances on the ground."

From that partisan opening, Clinton went on to decry "the failures of the Iraqis to step up and take responsibility for their own future." She said that the escalation Bush ordered was too little and too late and instead called on Congress to "threaten to cut money for the Iraqi troops and for the security for the Iraqi leadership," as a way to break the political gridlock in Baghdad and force efforts at national reconciliation.

She wound up the speech by saying that despite her disagreement with the policy, she wanted Petraeus's assurance that "we have every possible piece of equipment and resource necessary to protect these young men and women" going into battle.

"I'll do that, Senator," Petraeus said, and after that four-word response, Clinton was finished. She had no questions to ask.

Judging by all the polls, Clinton is the leading candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a leading candidate for the Republican nomination, is also a member of the Armed Services Committee.

McCain asked Petraeus 14 questions, ranging from the political situation in Iraq to the morale of the troops to the timeline for the planned "surge." He ran out of time before he ran out of questions -- quite a contrast to Clinton.

Clinton aides said that the senator thought it was important to rebut the comments from several other committee members suggesting that congressional resolutions opposing the president's policy would "undercut the troops," so she used her time for that purpose. But I can think of three other possible explanations for her remarkable reluctance to probe the general's thinking.

First, she has been treading a careful line from her early support of military action against Saddam Hussein to an increasingly sharp criticism of the war and calls for troop reductions. Perhaps she feared that dialogue with Petraeus would lead her into dangerous, uncharted waters. Caution is commendable, but she is sometimes faulted for being too calculating.

Second, the hearing came only three days after she announced her presidential exploratory committee, and she may have decided it was a good opportunity to repeat her views on Iraq policy before TV cameras rather than share time with the general. That wouldn't say much about her priorities as she begins a second six-year term as senator, but New York voters presumably knew in November that she might have loftier goals than just minding her Senate duties.

The third, less benign possibility is that Clinton is reverting to the mode of her ill-fated 1993-94 health-care initiative, when she gave members of Congress and other interested folks the impression that she thought she had all the answers -- so please just do as I say. In that period, she and her deputy, Ira Magaziner, two of the smartest policy wonks in captivity, were also supremely self-confident -- and in some eyes, arrogant. And it cost them support, even among potential allies.

This month Clinton began her presidential campaign, as she did her first race for the Senate in New York, by saying that she wanted to do a lot of listening. She sure wasn't listening to Gen. Petraeus. She wasn't even asking.

Hillary Clinton's Mission Unaccomplished (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

HILLARY CLINTON has an answer to those who suspect that her "I'm in to win" Webcast last weekend was forced by Barack Obama's Webcast of just four days earlier. "I wanted to do it before the president's State of the Union," she explained to Brian Williams on NBC, "because I wanted to draw the contrast between what we've seen over the last six years, and the kind of leadership and experience that I would bring to the office."

She couldn't have set the bar any lower. President Bush's speech was less compelling than the Monty Python sketch playing out behind it: the unacknowledged race between Nancy Pelosi and Dick Cheney to be the first to stand up for each bipartisan ovation. (Winner: Pelosi.)

As we've been much reminded, the most recent presidents to face Congress in such low estate were Harry Truman in 1952 and Richard Nixon in 1974, both in the last ebbs of their administrations, both mired in unpopular wars that their successors would soon end, and both eager to change the subject just as Mr. Bush did. In his '52 State of the Union address, Truman vowed "to bring the cost of modern medical care within the reach of all the people" while Nixon, 22 years later, promised "a new system that makes high-quality health care available to every American." Not to be outdone, Mr. Bush offered a dead-on-arrival proposal that "all our citizens have affordable and available health care." The empty promise of a free intravenous lunch, it seems, is the last refuge of desperate war presidents.

Few Americans know more than Senator Clinton about health care, as it happens, and if 27 Americans hadn't been killed in Iraq last weekend, voters might be in the mood to listen to her about it. But polls continue to show Iraq dwarfing every other issue as the nation's No. 1 concern. The Democrats' pre-eminent presidential candidate can't escape the war any more than the president can. And so she was blindsided Tuesday night, just as Mr. Bush was, by an unexpected gate crasher, the rookie senator from Virginia, Jim Webb. Though he's not a candidate for national office, Mr. Webb's nine-minute Democratic response not only upstaged the president but also, in an unintended political drive-by shooting, gave Mrs. Clinton a more pointed State of the Union "contrast" than she had bargained for.

To the political consultants favored by both Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Bush, Mr. Webb is an amateur. More than a few Washington insiders initially wrote him off in last year's race to unseat a star presidential prospect, the incumbent Senator George Allen. Mr. Webb is standoffish. He doesn't care whom he offends, including in his own base. He gives the impression — as he did Tuesday night — that he just might punch out his opponent. When he had his famously testy exchange with Mr. Bush over the war at a White House reception after his victory, Beltway pooh-bahs labeled him a boor, much as they had that other interloper who refused to censor himself before the president last year, Stephen Colbert.

But this country is at a grave crossroads. It craves leadership. When Mr. Webb spoke on Tuesday, he stepped into that vacuum and, for a few minutes anyway, filled it. It's not merely his military credentials as a Vietnam veteran and a former Navy secretary for Ronald Reagan that gave him authority, or the fact that his son, also a marine, is serving in Iraq. It was the simplicity and honesty of Mr. Webb's message. Like Senator Obama, he was a talented professional writer before entering politics, so he could discard whatever risk-averse speech his party handed him and write his own. His exquisitely calibrated threat of Democratic pushback should Mr. Bush fail to change course on the war — "If he does not, we will be showing him the way" — continued to charge the air even as Mrs. Clinton made the post-speech rounds on the networks.

Mrs. Clinton cannot rewrite her own history on Iraq to match Mr. Obama's early opposition to the war, or Mr. Webb's. She was not prescient enough to see, as Mr. Webb wrote in The Washington Post back in September 2002, that "unilateral wars designed to bring about regime change and a long-term occupation should be undertaken only when a nation's existence is clearly at stake." But she's hardly alone in this failing, and the point now is not that she mimic John Edwards with a prostrate apology for her vote to authorize the war. ("You don't get do-overs in life or in politics," she has said.) What matters to the country is what happens next. What matters is the leadership that will take us out of the fiasco.

Mr. Webb made his own proposals for ending the war, some of them anticipating those of the Iraq Study Group, while running against a popular incumbent in a reddish state. Mrs. Clinton, running for re-election in a safe seat in blue New York, settled for ratcheting up her old complaints about the war's execution and for endorsing other senators' calls for vaguely defined "phased redeployments." Even now, after the Nov. 7 results confirmed that two-thirds of voters nationwide want out, she struggles to parse formulations about Iraq.

This is how she explains her vote to authorize the war: "I would never have expected any president, if we knew then what we know now, to come to ask for a vote. There would not have been a vote, and I certainly would not have voted for it." John Kerry could not have said it worse himself. No wonder last weekend's "Saturday Night Live" gave us a "Hillary" who said, "Knowing what we know now, that you could vote against the war and still be elected president, I would never have pretended to support it."

Compounding this problem for Mrs. Clinton is that the theatrics of her fledgling campaign are already echoing the content: they are so overscripted and focus-group bland that they underline rather than combat the perennial criticism that she is a cautious triangulator too willing to trim convictions for political gain. Last week she conducted three online Web chats that she billed as opportunities for voters to see her "in an unfiltered way." Surely she was kidding. Everything was filtered, from the phony living-room set to the appearance of a "campaign blogger" who wasn't blogging to the softball questions and canned responses. Even the rare query touching on a nominally controversial topic, gay civil rights, avoided any mention of the word marriage, let alone Bill Clinton's enactment of the federal Defense of Marriage Act.

When a 14-year-old boy from Armonk, N.Y., asked Mrs. Clinton what made her "so inspirational," it was a telltale flashback to those well-rehearsed "town-hall meetings" Mr. Bush billed as unfiltered exchanges with voters during the 2004 campaign. One of those "Ask President Bush" sessions yielded the memorable question, "Mr. President, as a child, how can I help you get votes?"

After six years of "Ask President Bush," "Mission Accomplished" and stage sets plastered with "Plan for Victory," Americans hunger for a presidency with some authenticity. Patently synthetic play-acting and carefully manicured sound bites like Mrs. Clinton's look out of touch. (Mr. Obama's bare-bones Webcast and Web site shrewdly play Google to Mrs. Clinton's AOL.) Besides, the belief that an image can be tightly controlled in the viral media era is pure fantasy. Just ask the former Virginia senator, Mr. Allen, whose past prowess as a disciplined, image-conscious politician proved worthless once the Webb campaign posted on YouTube a grainy but authentic video capturing him in an embarrassing off-script public moment.

The image that Mrs. Clinton wants to sell is summed up by her frequent invocation of the word middle, as in "I grew up in a middle-class family in the middle of America." She's not left or right, you see, but exactly in the center where everyone feels safe. But as the fierce war critic Chuck Hagel, the Republican senator from Nebraska, argues in a must-read interview at gq.com, the war is "starting to redefine the political landscape" and scramble the old party labels. Like Mrs. Clinton, the middle-American Mr. Hagel voted to authorize the Iraq war, but that has not impeded his leadership in questioning it ever since.

The issue raised by the tragedy of Iraq is not who's on the left or the right, but who is in front and who is behind. Mrs. Clinton has always been a follower of public opinion on the war, not a leader. Now events are outrunning her. Support for the war both in the polls and among Republicans in Congress is plummeting faster than she can recalibrate her rhetoric; unreliable Iraqi troops are already proving no-shows in the new Iraqi-American "joint patrols" of Baghdad; the Congressional showdown over fresh appropriations for Iraq is just weeks away.

This, in other words, is a moment of crisis in our history and there will be no do-overs. Should Mrs. Clinton actually seek unfiltered exposure to voters, she will learn that they are anxiously waiting to see just who in Washington is brave enough to act.

You've Come A Long Way, Maybe (WP)

By Linda Hirshman

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

Hillary Rodham Clinton sure got it right when she announced her candidacy for president while sitting on her living room couch. Her success may very well turn on the decisions of millions of women sitting on their living room couches.

Clinton advisers James Carville and Mark Penn have said they're counting on a women's vote (the "X factor") to catapult their client into the White House. They're obviously hoping that a female candidate will get much more support from women and are banking on the "gender gap," the idea, trumpeted by the media and women's organizations, that women believe in liberal policies and will therefore, as rational political actors, support the Democratic Party.

But I have news for Messrs. Carville and Penn: All the gender gap talk notwithstanding, there's no guarantee that Clinton would receive enough votes from women to be elected. I've studied women and women's politics for 20 years, and if there's one thing I know, it's that, except for possibly once in 1996, female voters have not by themselves put anyone in the White House.

If Clinton is going to attract the women she needs, she's probably going to have to do something more than simply have a pair of X chromosomes herself. And much as it pains a feminist like me to say it, a lot of her campaign will have to involve putting her on the couch and analyzing her character and motivation. Again.

In every election, there's a chance that women will be the decisive force that will elect someone who embraces their views. Yet they seem never to have done so, and I've never seen a satisfactory answer as to why. My own theory is that women don't decide elections because they're not rational political actors -- they don't make firm policy commitments and back the candidates who will move society in the direction they want it to go. Instead, they vote on impulse, and on elusive factors such as personality.

With Clinton's candidacy on the horizon, I decided to test my theory by asking a few white, married women -- the key demographic -- what they are up to this time.

If any women were going to be politically aware, I figured, it would be those in the Washington area. So I contacted half a dozen members of the Wednesday Morning Group, a D.C. area organization that provides speakers and programs mostly for stay-at-home moms. (One even told me I had caught her sitting on her living room couch.)

All the women voted in the midterm elections last year and intend to vote in 2008. But how do they decide which lever to pull? My small sampling is admittedly unscientific, but what they told me reveals a lot about why campaigning to women is so tricky.

A 49-year-old former public relations executive in suburban Maryland told me she votes the political agenda she learned from her lefty father. She reads The Washington Post, but there are no books on her bedside table. She counts on her husband to tell her what's in the Nation magazine and on the Web.

A 36-year-old former financial sales executive considers herself an independent, reads only the Style and Weekend sections of The Post and the Marketplace and Personal Journal sections of the Wall Street Journal, and also counts on her husband, a Republican, to tell her what's interesting in the rest of the paper.

A former human rights activist told me that she still reads the New York Times, skims the Economist, and gathers political information from PBS's "News Hour," a local broadcast from the BBC and from her church.

Neither the former teacher nor the retired television reporter read any newspapers at all.

There are some constants. Most of the women read People and Real Simple magazines. They all listen to news on the car radio, mostly National Public Radio. And almost all their full-time working husbands consume immeasurably more political information than they do ("He reads 10 times what I do," one told me), reading news magazines and political Web sites and bringing home political information from their jobs. The women gather little information from their almost exclusively female society of other stay-at-home moms.

They all said that after Clinton announced, they were "really excited." "She's been in politics a long time," a woman coincidentally named Hillary said. "She's tough as nails," added another gleefully. Jennifer, meanwhile, was won by Clinton's "combination of soft edges, as a mother and a nurturer and a strong person."

No one focused on any political agenda, policy or program. What seemed to matter to them all was character. Jennifer contrasted herself with her husband, who, while a Democrat, was not so sure he would support Clinton. "He doesn't look at character or personality," she said. "He's very much of an issue/policy person. I look at the whole picture."

Explaining why she did not vote for George W. Bush in 2000 even though she expressed concern over taxes, Hillary said: "I just could not get past the fact that I didn't like the man."

As inattentive as they were to Clinton's policy record, they were knowledgeable about her biography. They saw her as "smart" and determined not to be just another first lady. They were sorry that she had failed in her first foray into national policymaking with her health-care proposal. They understood her withdrawal into the East Wing and party-throwing as a necessary concession to her husband's career needs.

But they were clearly defensive about her decision to stay the course after the Monica Lewinsky scandal. "She set herself up in her life," one explained, "to get wherever she wanted to go. That's what men do all the time. . . . When a woman does it, what's wrong with that?"

I had such mixed feelings listening to these women describe their political selves. They're clearly idealistic, want to be good citizens, make an effort to get the information they need. It was hard not to like them. Their delight in seeing a woman so close to real power was palpable. Yet I couldn't escape the fact that they took in little of politics, especially compared with their husbands, that their decision-making seemed impulsive and that their response to Clinton's candidacy was driven to an amazing extent by personality.

They unwittingly confirmed my theory about why women don't decide elections. But that theory is supported by a wealth of statistical information, too.

Women have voted more Democratic than men recently, but since the ratification of the 19th Amendment in 1920, only once has the women's vote arguably been different enough from the men's vote to determine the outcome of a presidential election. In 1980, 1984 and 1988, more women, like men, favored the winning Republican candidate over the losing Democrat. Geraldine Ferraro's presence on the Democratic ticket in 1984 apparently made little difference. In 1992, more women, like men, favored the winning Democrat over the losing Republican. The men's vote was so divided in 1996 that exit polls show Clinton one percentage point behind among men (a statistical tie), while winning the female vote. In 2004, more women, unlike men, favored the losing Democrat, but by such a small majority (51 percent) that they had no effect on the outcome of the male-driven election. Since the '96 elections was so close among men, it's fair to say that only in 2000 did women clearly part company with men, voting for Democrat Al Gore in large enough numbers to offset the male votes for Bush -- but the female majorities were not distributed among enough states to carry the electoral college.

Any campaign that needs women to win would have to break the 88-year record of women failing to produce election results that men oppose.

To this day -- as even my D.C. area correspondents seemed to confirm -- women just aren't as interested in politics as men are. The Center for Civic Education recently reported that American women are less likely than men to discuss politics, contribute to campaigns, contact public officials or join a political organization. About 42 percent of men told University of Michigan researchers last year that "they are 'very interested' in government and public affairs, compared with 34 percent of women."

Worse, women consistently score 10 to 20 percentage points lower than men on studies of political knowledge, regardless of their education or income level. Studies dating to 1997 have shown that fewer women than men can name their senator, or know one First Amendment right. They even know less about the Supreme Court's decision in Roe v. Wade than men do.

As a 2006 study by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press put it, American adults live in "A World of His and Hers." Two million more men than women read either Time or Newsweek; more men listen to radio news and talk radio, read the paper and get news online. Only broadcast television news plays to more women than men, and a lot of that is TV news magazines and morning shows. Not only do fewer women read the newspaper, but almost half the women surveyed said they "sometimes do not follow international news because of excessive coverage of wars and violence."

So-called liberal women are the majority of swing voters -- those tantalizing independent late deciders -- in every election. While men remained committed to Republicans Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush throughout the campaigns, women polled heavily for Democrats Walter F. Mondale, Michael S. Dukakis and John F. Kerry as late as September before settling in to vote Republican or anemically Democratic in November.

So what does all this mean for Hillary Clinton, or any woman who would be president?

First, when it comes to women who vote, the political is the personal. The Wednesday Morning women spoke passionately about Clinton's public and private travails but seemed oddly indifferent to her position on the Iraq war. If the polls continue to reflect male aversion to her beyond the baseline male Republican tilt, Clinton may have to go personal to bring the women home. Maybe she could get a couch on casters.

Unlike the married suburban women she must attract in large numbers, Clinton didn't stay home from work. Remember the "baking cookies" remark? On the other hand, she has had the soap opera story of the century with that charismatic, faithless husband. This has made her suffer, something one of the Wednesday women specifically singled out as a reason to support a candidate. Will she be willing to open that old wound to convince potential female supporters that her policies, such as universal child health care, arise out of her concern for women like them, rather than being just the usual liberal agenda? Worse, if she does play the wronged wife again, does she risk alienating the women who think she should have left her husband long ago?

The second lesson is that elections that turn on the female electorate bear an unfortunate resemblance to a popularity contest. The Republicans have succeeded with women at the polls when they've made Democrats look not just mistaken, but clownish or geeky. Reagan in blue jeans beat Jimmy Carter in a cardigan. George H.W. Bush looked like John Wayne next to Dukakis peering over the edge of a tank in a helmet. And who knows what would have happened if Kerry hadn't donned a wetsuit to go wind-surfing? Even the devil wears Prada. And women know it.

If Clinton is going to stand a chance in 2008, her campaign may have to discredit the Republican nominee. As political scientist Dianne Bystrom has found, it doesn't hurt female candidates when they go negative, and if women are going to make their political decisions based on impulse, then anyone needing their votes is going to have to make sure no one wants to sit with the other guy in the cafeteria. It was illuminating how often the Wednesday women spoke of Clinton's toughness.

A suffering wife and mother whose campaign mysteriously unleashes attacks on her opponents? It's not the current game plan, no doubt. But I'm drawing on the lessons of history. I'd rather promote cheery stories of the gender gap -- but those stories are just a diversion from the hard work of bringing women into the world of governance. Mark my words: Those who do not study women's history are doomed to repeat its failures.

Giuliani Is Sounding More Like A Candidate (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-Peña

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

MANCHESTER, N. H., Jan. 27 — Rudolph W. Giuliani sounded nearer than ever to being a presidential candidate on Saturday, repeatedly talking about the prospect of running, and inviting voters to judge him by his record as mayor of New York City.

Though he has long been thought to be a presidential contender, he has fallen behind other candidates in declaring his intention, and the language he used on Saturday, while suggesting a run, also contained built-in escape hatches. Speaking to a convention of the New Hampshire Republican Party, he advised the delegates on “what you should look for in whatever decision you make in presidential primaries,” and added, “when I promise you things, if I do, when I do, as I do, I’ll promise them because I’ve done them before.”

He returned to that theme moments later, and as he has done in recent days, drew a direct analogy between fighting crime in his home city and establishing peace in Iraq.

“When I say to you that we should reduce taxes to stimulate the economy, I’ll say it to you because I did it and I saw it work,” he said. “When I say we have to bring peace and security as sort of the beginning of anything, whether it’s in Baghdad or in other parts of the world or here at home, I’ll say that to you because I saw that happen in New York, and I made it happen. I did it.”

In his first trip since last fall to the state that holds the earliest presidential primary, Mr. Giuliani stepped closer than he has before to suggesting that he will run.

“Government has got to work in order to allow people to have confidence in it,” he said. “And as I look at this, I believe there is something I can do about that.”

Whether or not he is serious about a campaign, he may need to send such a signal to keep his options open. He has raised money, traveled extensively and put together a more robust organization in recent weeks, but as other candidates enter the race, many Republicans — and some publications — have questioned whether he will go through with it.

On this trip, he met privately with several elected officials, including the mayor of Manchester, Frank Guinta — the kind of personal courting people here expect, and that other top contenders have done more than Mr. Giuliani has. “He’s going to have to spend a lot more with these people,” said Senator John E. Sununu.

When he speaks, Mr. Giuliani normally walks around the stage and does not refer to notes, joking and making matter-of-fact arguments. But Saturday’s speech, at the old Palace Theater, was unusually formal for him — he stayed behind the lectern and worked from notes — and also more overtly boastful and partisan, and more designed to rouse his audience.

Mr. Giuliani has taken the politically risky position of supporting President Bush's unpopular decision to send more troops to Iraq, as have the other Republicans who rank highest in early polls, Senator John S. McCain and Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor. But for the second time in as many days, Mr. Giuliani cautioned Saturday that the strategy might not work, and that it should not be viewed as the last word in the war.

"We hope and we root for and we pray for a successful outcome in Iraq," he said. "But our ultimate victory is not going to be a military victory. Our ultimate victory against terrorism is going to be a victory of ideas."

But he stayed away from the divisive social issues that put him at odds with much of his party, like his support of abortion rights and gay civil unions. Some delegates here said they had hoped Mr. Giuliani would explain support his past support for gun controls in New York that would be unpopular here.

Still, Republican officials here take him very seriously as a presidential contender, based primarily on his reputation for leadership in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I would say his chances are excellent," said State Representative John Reagan. "Everyone knows he has been severely tested."

Giuliani Plays It Close To The Vest (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Will he or won't he?

The Rudy Giuliani Mystery Theater played the Palace on Saturday, a brief engagement at the city's landmark performing arts center and perennial campaign stop here in the first presidential primary state.

He gave away nothing about plans for a White House run.

Speaking from notes on a stage bathed by 12 small spotlights, the former New York mayor offered carefully qualified remarks to a convention of Republican activists. There were plenty of "ifs," as in: "People should vote for me or someone else, if I run … because they believe we can make this country better."

Outside, after his entourage bulled its way through the lobby crowd, Giuliani spoke with reporters just long enough to elude the presidential question with talk of examining his "heart and soul."

Giuliani finds himself in the happy position of sitting atop many opinion polls, even as he remains officially on the sidelines. While other candidates leap into the White House fray — former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is expected to join the Republican contest Monday — Giuliani remains coy.

Asked his timetable for a decision, he said Saturday that there was none. "The timetable is: when's the right time?" he said.

So far, the most noteworthy aspect of Giuliani's exploratory efforts has been the surfacing of an internal strategy document — the Giuliani camp says it was pilfered — which gave the world a look at 140 pages of campaign analysis, including the ex-mayor's perceived pitfalls. (Among them, his messy divorce and ties to disgraced former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik.) But for the last two days in New Hampshire, at least, Giuliani displayed all the trappings of a bona fide presidential contender — including some he could have done without.

On Friday, he drew several hundred people to a Chamber of Commerce dinner in Littleton, in the White Mountains. On Saturday, he received a standing ovation and repeated applause from several hundred more at the New Hampshire Republican State Committee meeting in Manchester, delivering a speech that was long on platitudes and short on specifics:

"You've got a beautiful state. A beautiful state in the winter. A beautiful state in the summer."

He put some distance between himself and President Bush — "I don't agree with him on everything," Giuliani said — and also subtly differed with his proclaimed hero, President Reagan, on the proper role of government. Where Reagan once declared government part of the problem, Giuliani took a more measured view, suggesting, "We need to make government work again, as Republicans. Because we're the more practical party."

New Hampshire may be uniquely suited to the promise and perils of a Giuliani presidential run.

His profile — permissive for a Republican on social issues, conservative on fiscal matters — is well tailored to a state where Republicans tend to be moderate and independents can vote in the GOP primary. "Anybody who's been to New York in the last few years can't help but be impressed," said Charles Arlinghaus, a longtime Republican activist and head of a free-market think tank in Concord.

But Giuliani's famously prickly style could be a problem. New Hampshire voters expect a highly personal touch, not the kind of imperious display the Giuliani camp put on Saturday. As the ex-mayor was being swept into an SUV outside the Palace Theatre, a man pushed his way forward and threw an arm over Giuliani's shoulder, posing for a picture. A burly security guard lifted the man's arm off, like a piece of bad meat.

"He's only been exposed to rock star audiences up here," said Andrew Smith, the state's top political pollster. "What happens when he's asked not tough questions, but annoying questions? It will be interesting to see how Giuliani deals with them."

In N.H., Activists Embrace Giuliani (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Judging by the effusive greeting Rudolph W. Giuliani received yesterday from Republican activists in the nation's first primary state, it seemed like the former New York City mayor was already running for president.

But he isn't -- at least not yet. The man made famous by his steely resolve and decisive leadership after the 2001 terrorist attacks on his city said yesterday he has no idea when he will decide whether to run.

"Every day you get closer, but we don't have a timetable yet. The timetable is, when's the right time and when do you have the confidence and the sense that you have the whole organization," Mr. Giuliani said, standing next to his wife, Judith Nathan.

"But most of it is about Judith and I deciding that there's a really unique contribution that we can make," he said.

The former mayor, who formed a presidential exploratory committee late last year, said that if he decides to enter the race, he will stress his leadership experience to voters to distinguish himself from his rivals.

"Leadership is about vision and performance," Mr. Giuliani told about 500 party activists in a speech about himself and his beliefs. "Who has the vision, and who can perform? Because you need both. ... You can ultimately judge whatever I promise you and whatever vision that I have by the things that I've done."

Like other Republican candidates, Mr. Giuliani -- who is pro-choice and supports homosexual rights, gun control and embryonic stem-cell research -- sought to burnish his party credentials, even poking a bit of fun at his own liberal social views, which irk many staunch conservatives.

"My great hero was Ronald Reagan. I have tremendous admiration for President Bush. I don't agree with them on everything. You know, I don't agree with myself on everything," Mr. Giuliani said with a laugh, drawing a good-natured response from the hundreds of people packed into the Palace Theatre.

Mr. Giuliani yesterday juggled a day full of events, paying homage to New Hampshire Republican activists, who can ease his ascension or hamper his ambitions, then dropping in to a Manchester restaurant to shake hands with potential voters.

But questions remain about whether the fiercely independent former mayor is serious about a national race. Some analysts say he is already far behind the curve set by Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, both of whom have in recent weeks snapped up top campaign veterans.

"The former mayor of New York City is quickly losing the campaign to acquire top talent," said Jordan Lieberman, publisher of Campaigns & Elections magazine.

"While Mayor Giuliani has hired former RNC Political Director Mike DuHaime, among the most gifted operatives in the country, Rudy's campaign staff lacks the essential depth and experience that McCain and Romney have acquired," he said.

But Mr. DuHaime said the rumors that Mr. Giuliani will soon drop out of the race are aimed at slowing the former mayor's momentum.

"There is an attempt to slow the campaign by saying that Mr. Giuliani is not serious," said Mr. DuHaime, speculating that the reports are coming from competing camps. "But he is very serious."

And some in the crowd yesterday said they are not troubled by Mr. Giuliani's positions.

"He's our moderate Republican," said Pamela Goodman of Exeter, N.H. "From a Christian standpoint, I wrestle with some of his policies, but I think it's a matter of looking @ who else is there. He has shown that he can get the job done, and that is the most important thing."

Giuliani Inches His Way To The White House (POL)

The Politico, January 27, 2007

BRETTON WOODS, NH, -- Appearing in New Hampshire for the first time since creating a presidential exploratory committee, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani appeared to inch closer to a White House bid. Joined by his wife, Judith Nathan, and a phalanx of security guards and aides, Giuliani braved subzero temperatures to speak to about 500 members of a local chamber of commerce at the historic Mt. Washington hotel here.

One audience member got straight to the point after Giuliani gave an extemporaneous speech focusing on leadership and then asked for questions.

“Will we see you on the next presidential ballot?”

After waiting for the applause that the question drew to die down, Giuliani said, “That may be more up to you than me.”

DOJ_NMG_0123555

"I have to make a decision about my exploratory committee and running, but ultimately the more important decision is what you make a year from now."

After praising New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary, Hizzoner reiterated that his assessment "has something to do with the decision Judith and I make, but it has a lot more to do with the decision you make."

Warming the hearts of Giuliani's new campaign team on a night so cold that even the inside of the hotel had drafty spots, the questioner responded by telling the former mayor, to applause: "You have a lot more support than you realize."

Shaking hands, signing autographs and posing for pictures on his way out of the ballroom, Giuliani was again asked by a supporter when he was going to make an announcement.

"Not quite sure, we're getting there," he half-whispered.

But asked directly by this reporter what his timetable was for making a decision, Giuliani was vague.

"Don't have one. Timeline is when you've considered everything you've had to consider."

In a speech that lasted about 20 minutes, Giuliani focused on the namesake of his book and the attribute that many in the room associated with him in interviews after the program. Holding up as examples the top two presidents in the Republican pantheon, Lincoln and Reagan, Giuliani explained their leadership qualities.

"I don't imagine that they had those favorable/unfavorable things back during the Civil War," but Lincoln would not have fared well, Giuliani said.

Seeming to draw present-day comparisons, Giuliani noted that Lincoln even faced riots in New York City because people were unhappy with the war. "They wanted to quit because it was getting too tough."

There were extensive casualties, the conflict dragged on and Lincoln had to fire many of his generals, Giuliani reminded the salad-eating crowd.

Yet there came no comparison to President Bush and the war in Iraq. Instead, Giuliani lavished praised on the 40th president, recalling his days working in the Reagan Justice Department.

"He knew where he was taking the country," Giuliani said of Reagan, and did so based on principle.

"We have too many people in politics who take decisions based on polls. They tell you what they want to hear. It does not make them leaders, it makes them actors."

Giuliani also discussed his battle against prostate cancer and his response to 9/11, but Reagan kept seeming to come back up. Asked by an audience member about how he would deal with the federal budget, Giuliani said Washington needed to embrace the sort of "budget discipline" not seen since "back in the Reagan years." Answering a question about how he foresees the administration getting along with the new Democratic Congress, Hizzoner noted that he's "an optimist – I learned that from Ronald Reagan also." Then there was the easiest query of them all: What was his favorite story about the Gipper? (the most "moving" one, Giuliani replied, was his recollection of having breakfast with Reagan the day he was shot).

If Reagan's name was mentioned by the dozens, it was difficult to recall more than one passing mention of the current Republican occupant of the White House. Indeed, Gov. Jeb Bush came in for more praise than his brother as Giuliani spoke of the Floridian's emergency preparedness efforts and adroit handling of the many hurricanes that struck the state.

Until the end, though, the speech was almost entirely bereft of any mention of Giuliani's presidential ambitions. Thanking his hosts, the New Yorker said he'd be back to the resort for golf and his wife skiing.

"Maybe we'll come back and do some politics, too," he added to applause

Many of the mostly-Republican attendees liked what they heard and said they'd likely support Giuliani in a White House bid.

"I would vote for him any day of the week," said Jean Mercier, the wife of a local fire chief. Mercier, who grew teary-eyed as Giuliani inscribed a 9/11 memorial book before the speech, said Giuliani's response to the terrorist attacks still "resonates with anybody who has been to Ground Zero" or has a connection to "first responders."

Schulyer Sweet, a transplant to the region from upstate New York seemed to pick up Giuliani's message. "I liked his analogies to President Reagan."

Ronay Bovarnick, the lady who asked Giuliani when he would launch a campaign as he worked the room, was even more helpful, despite her husband's efforts to keep her from saying anything impolitic.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, she explained, "doesn't have convictions" while Arizona Sen. John McCain "waffles back and forth."

But Giuliani is just right, she said. "We need somebody strong."

If the response was glowing, the stagecraft was even better.

Giuliani arrived at the century-old hotel, best known for holding the 1944 international conference that would create the first world monetary system, to a group of girl scouts selling their cookies. The former mayor quickly offered up $80 for 20 boxes (they usually go for $3.50 each). Mostly evading the media scrum on the way out, Giuliani and his wife ran into a couple who happened to be up for a ski weekend with their adorable 3 ½ year-old and 14-month-old. More pictures taken, it was then it was back out into -11-degree air that probably didn't feel as harsh to Giuliani as it did on the way in.

Building A Serious Staff (WP)

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

Former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) is on a hiring tear of late, putting to rest speculation that he isn't serious about running for president in 2008. His latest signing is Bill Stepien, who will be his national field director. Stepien, like many of the operatives in the senior staffs of Giuliani, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R), has his political roots in the Bush campaigns; he served as a New Hampshire field director in the president's reelection bid. Last cycle he directed the 72-Hour Project, the Republican National Committee's much-ballyhooed turnout apparatus.

In Law School, Obama Found Political Voice (NYT)

By Jodi Kantor

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 23 — The peers who elected Barack Obama as the first black president of the Harvard Law Review say he was a natural leader, an impressive student, a nice guy. But in the 1990 Revue — the graduating editors' gleeful parody of their elite publication — they said quite a bit more.

"I was born in Oslo, Norway, the son of a Volvo factory worker and part-time ice fisherman," a mock self-tribute begins. "My mother was a backup singer for Abba. They were good folks." In Chicago, "I discovered I was black, and I have remained so ever since."

After his election, the Faux-bama says, he united warring students into "a happy, cohesive folk," while "empowering all the folks out there in America who didn't know about me by giving a series of articulate and startlingly mature interviews to all the folks in the media."

In his two memoirs and the biographical video on his Web site, Senator Obama's legal education is barely a blip, one of the least known chapters of his life. But for the Illinois Democrat who is all but certainly running for the presidency, Harvard was the place where he first became a political sensation.

He arrived there as an unknown, Afro-wearing community organizer who had spent years searching for his identity; by the time he left, he had his first national news media exposure, a book contract and a shot of confidence from running the most powerful legal journal in the country.

As the ribbing in the Revue suggests, Mr. Obama was realizing the power of his own biography. He proved deft at navigating an institution scorched with ideological battles, many of which revolved around race. He developed a leadership style based more on furthering consensus than on imposing his own ideas. Surrounded by students who enjoyed the sound of their own voices, Mr. Obama cast himself as an eager listener, sometimes giving warring classmates the impression that he agreed with all of them at once.

Friends say he did not want anyone to assume they knew his mind — and because of that, even those close to him did not always know exactly where he stood. It is a tendency that could prove perilous on the campaign trail, as voters, rivals and the news media try to fix the positions of a senator with only two years in office.

"He then and now is very hard to pin down," said Kenneth Mack, a classmate and now a professor at the law school, referring to the senator's on-the-one-hand, on-the-other-hand style.

Charles J. Ogletree Jr., another Harvard law professor and a mentor of Mr. Obama, said, "He can enter your space and organize your thoughts without necessarily revealing his own concerns and conflicts."

Many of his former professors and classmates say they are cheering on Mr. Obama, 45, in his candidacy. But the skills he displayed in law school may not serve him as well in American presidential politics, which sometimes rewards other qualities — like delivering sound bites instead of deliberateness or fidelity to a base of supporters instead of compromise.

The law review is "fairly disconnected from the breadth and the rough and tumble of real politics," said Bruce Spiva, a former review editor who now practices civil rights law in Washington. "It's an election among a closed group. It's more like electing a pope."

Mr. Obama declined to comment about his time at Harvard. He arrived at the law school in 1988 with a well-inked passport — he had grown up in Hawaii and Indonesia, son of a black Kenyan father and a white American mother — and years of community organizing experience in Chicago, making him, at 27, an elder statesman among the students who had tested and term-papered their way straight there.

Mr. Obama spent much of his time alone, curtailing his dating life after his first summer, when he met his future wife, a Harvard Law graduate named Michelle Robinson who was working in Chicago. He often played pickup basketball, replacing his deliberative off-court style with sharp elbows and aggressive grabs for the ball.

Along with 40-odd classmates, he won a precious spot on the law review at the end of his first year through grades and a writing competition. But the next year, when other students implored him to run for the presidency, he demurred; he wanted to return to community work in Chicago, he said, and the credential would be no help. Late in the process, he finally agreed, saying he might be uniquely able to heal the review's partisan divisions.

The election was an all-day affair with the ego-crushing drama of a reality TV show. Inside Pound Hall, the editors picked apart the intellectual and social skills of the 19 contenders, eliminating them in batches. At the last moment, the conservative faction, its initial candidates defeated, threw its support to Mr. Obama. "Whatever his politics, we felt he would give us a fair shake," said Bradford Berenson, a former associate White House counsel in the Bush administration.

The two finalists were invited back into the room. But before the winner could be announced, Mr. Mack, a black student who had rejoined the editors after being eliminated, lunged toward Mr. Obama, so moved by the barrier that had just fallen that he embraced him tightly, tears streaming down both men's cheeks.

Newspapers and magazines swarmed around the first black student to win the most coveted spot at the most vaunted club at one of America's most prestigious institutions. In interviews, Mr. Obama was modest and careful. (In a rare slip, he told The Associated Press: "I'm not interested in the suburbs. The suburbs bore me.") He signed a contract to write a memoir. A prankster posted a cast list for a movie version of his life, starring Blair Underwood. When Mr. Underwood visited the school, he questioned Mr. Obama for material for "L.A. Law."

"People were always asking me, do young black attorneys really exist like that?" Mr. Underwood said in a recent interview. "I would refer to Barack."

Winning the job was simpler than doing it. The president had to reject articles by some of the school's famous professors and persuade a divided group of editors to stop arguing and start editing.

"I have worked in the Supreme Court and the White House and I never saw politics as bitter as at Harvard Law Review in the early '90s," Mr. Berenson said. "The law school was populated by a bunch of would-be Daniel Websters harnessed to extreme political ideologies." They were so ardent that they would boo and hiss one another in class.

Even trickier, Mr. Obama was the most prominent minority student on a campus shaken by racial politics. A group agitating for greater faculty diversity occupied the dean's office and sued the school for discrimination; Derrick Bell, a black law professor, resigned over the issue.

The law review struggled to decide whether affirmative action should factor into the selection of editors, and how much voice to give to critical race theorists, who argued that the legal system was inherently biased against minorities. That drew the ridicule of conservative students.

And it left the new president with a difficult choice. If he failed to use his office to criticize Harvard, Mr. Obama would anger black and liberal students; by speaking out, he would risk dragging himself and the review into the center of shrill debates.

People had a way of hearing what they wanted in Mr. Obama's words. Earlier, after a long, tortured discussion about whether it was better to be called "black" or "African-American," Mr. Obama dismissed the question, saying semantics did not matter as much as real-life issues, recalled Cassandra Butts, still a close friend. According to Mr. Ogletree, students on each side of the debate thought he was endorsing their side. "Everyone was nodding, Oh, he agrees with me," he said.

As the president of the review, Mr. Obama once again walked a delicate line. He served on the board of the Black Law Students Association, often speaking passionately about the tempest of the week, but in a way that white classmates say made them feel reassured rather than defensive. He distanced himself from bombast; he did a mischievous impersonation of the Rev. Jesse Jackson when he came to speak on campus, recalled Franklin Amanat, now a federal prosecutor in Brooklyn. Mr. Obama's boldest moment came at a rally for faculty diversity, where he compared Professor Bell to Rosa Parks.

But mainly, Mr. Obama stayed away from the extremes of campus debate, often choosing safe topics for his speeches. At the black law students' annual conference, he exhorted students to remember the obligations that came with their privileged education. His speeches, delivered in the oratorical manner of a Baptist minister, were more memorable for style than substance, Mr. Mack said.

"It's the inspiration of the speech rather than the specific content," he said.

Just as he does now that he is a senator, Mr. Obama spoke then about his own biography — initially, Mr. Ogletree said, to correct anyone who assumed he had acquired his position with ease. His message, Mr. Ogletree said, was, "Don't look at my success and assume that I have had a silver spoon in my mouth and gold coins in my hand."

During the constant arguments about race and merit, everyone could point to Mr. Obama and find justification for their views. He had acknowledged benefiting from affirmative action in the past, so those who supported it saw him as the happy product of their beliefs.

But those who opposed it saw his presidency as the triumph of meritocracy. He was a black man who had helped one of Harvard's most celebrated professors, Laurence H. Tribe, with an article on law and physics, and would graduate magna cum laude.

Another of Mr. Obama's techniques relied on his seemingly limitless appetite for hearing the opinions of others, no matter how redundant or extreme. That could lead to endless debates — a mouse infestation at the review office provoked a long exchange about rodent rights — as well as some uncertainty about what Mr. Obama himself thought about the issue at hand.

In dozens of interviews, his friends said they could not remember his specific views from that era, beyond a general emphasis on diversity and social and economic justice.

Instead, they wonder how the style of leadership they observed on campus could translate to another kind of historic presidency.

"The things that make law school politics fractious are different from the things that make American politics fractious," said Ron Klain, who preceded Mr. Obama at the law review and later served as Vice President Al Gore's chief of staff. Mr. Klain has watched the senator's rise.

"The interesting caveat," he said, "is that is a style of leadership more effective running a law review than running a country."

At Harvard Law, A Unifying Voice (BOS)

By Michael Levenson, Jonathan Saltzman

The Boston Globe, January 28, 2007

CAMBRIDGE -- It was just a five-on-five game between some law students at a Harvard gym, until someone jabbed a hard foul. An argument broke out, and pretty soon players were in one another's faces.

To the players who were on the court that day, it seemed punches were about to be thrown.

Then a skinny, soft-spoken forward with tight shorts and high socks named Barack Obama raced out from the sideline and put himself between two of the warring players.

"He said, 'Guys, this is not serious -- it's just a pickup game,' " recalled one of the players, Earl Martin Phalen, Harvard Law Class of 1993. Laughing, he added: "There was all this testosterone exploding, and he just kind of had perspective. . . . We ended up chilling it out."

These days, Obama is the hot new candidate for the White House, trying to end the warring in Washington with a warm message of unity and optimism. But years before taking that message to the national political stage, he was defusing battles large and small from the sharp-elbowed basketball games to the cutthroat classrooms at Harvard Law School.

Standing apart from others Right from the start, when he arrived in the fall of 1988 at the age of 27, Obama seemed different. With his leather bomber jacket, tattered jeans, and pack of cigarettes, he was older and appeared less starchy than many of his fresh-faced classmates newly arrived from the Ivy League. He was also one of the small minority of black students on the campus of about 1,500 of the nation's most ambitious future lawyers, judges, and corporate executives.

Beyond his appearance, what set him apart was his approach to argument, the lifeblood of the law school and the constant occupation of the young lawyers-in-training. While other students were determined to prove the merits of their beliefs through logic and determination, Obama preferred to listen, seek others' views, and find a middle way.

"A lot of people at the time were just talking past each other, very committed to their opinions, their point of view, and not particularly interested in what other people had to say," said Crystal Nix Hines, a classmate who is now a television writer. "Barack transcended that."

He confronted his most charged debates as president of the Harvard Law Review, the exclusive club of 80 student editors and future Supreme Court justices who publish a regular journal of legal writings. Classmates recall an especially emotional debate in the spring of 1990 over affirmative action, which conservative students wanted to abolish.

Presiding over an assembly of 60 mostly white editors in a law school classroom, Obama listened to impassioned pleas and pressed conservatives to explain their reasoning and liberals to sharpen their thinking. But he never spoke about his own point of view or mentioned that he believed he had benefit ed from affirmative action.

"If anybody had walked by, they would have assumed he was a professor," said Thomas J. Perrelli, a classmate and former counsel to Attorney General Janet Reno. "He was leading the discussion but he wasn't trying to impose his own perspective on it. He was much more mediating."

Obama was so evenhanded and solicitous in his interactions that fellow students would do impressions of his Socratic chin-stroking approach to everything, even seeking a consensus on popcorn preferences at the movies. "Do you want salt on your popcorn?" one classmate, Nancy L. McCullough, recalled, mimicking his sensitive bass voice. "Do you even want popcorn?"

Obama, who declined to be interviewed for this story, lived all three years in the same basement apartment on Broadway in Somerville, near Winter Hill. He kept the place spotless and decorated it with second hand furniture.

"He was a model tenant," said John K. Holmes of Arlington, his landlord. "I can remember when he told me he was leaving, I can remember being disappointed."

He skipped most parties and made his friends in class, including one good buddy, Rob Fisher, a first-year student from Maryland, whom he met on the first day of classes. Obama called Fisher, who is white, "brother," and teased him about his raggedy clothes. They watched Bulls games . Both idolized Michael Jordan.

Even in his first year, students saw Obama as a peacemaker. When his class needed someone to present an end-of-the-year gift to one stuffy contracts professor, the students chose Obama, who delivered a brief, gracious tribute.

"It was a moment of diffused tension and levity," said Kenneth W. Mack, a Harvard Law School professor who was in Obama's class. "He pulled it off."

At the end of his first year, Obama joined the Law Review. He nearly missed the deadline to apply when his 1984 Toyota Tercel broke down, and beg ged Fisher for a ride and sweet - talk ed his way to the front of a line at the post office to have his envelope postmarked before noon.

"That's the one modest contribution I've made to his success," Fisher, now a Washington lawyer, said in a recent interview.

Obama won a slot on the review. He was growing more serious in his personal life, too. After casually dating women at the law school, he flew back to Chicago after his first year and met Michelle Robinson, a 1988 Harvard Law graduate, whom he later married.

Law review prestige In the fall of 1989, when Obama returned to campus for his second year, students were protesting the lack of minority law school faculty. They staged sit-ins in the law library, camped outside the office of Dean Robert C. Clark, and carried signs that read "Diversity Now" and "Homogeneity Feeds Hatred." The tensions continued the following spring, reaching a high when Derrick A. Bell Jr., the first tenured black professor at the school, resigned in protest. Obama was a member of the Black Law Students Association, which organized many demonstrations that spring. But he was less confrontational than some of his peers.

"Barack was a stabilizing influence in that he would absolutely support those efforts, but was also someone who could discuss and debate them with students or faculty who had different views," said Professor Charles J. Ogletree Jr., who became Harvard's seventh tenured black professor in 1993.

In February 1990, when the time came to elect a new president of the law review, Obama was initially reluctant, said Nix Hines. The presidency seemed better suited for careerist types who were aiming for positions at top-flight law firms, Obama told her at the time. The son of a black Kenyan father and a white mother from Kansas, he wanted to return to his work in Chicago as a community organizer.

"I was surprised because I knew he was very popular and well-regarded and obviously had the ability to do the job," Nix Hines said.

But at a dinner at Obama's apartment, an older black student challenged Obama and other black students to compete for the job. "And I do remember Barack saying that was the moment he finally decided, 'I'm going to do this,' " said Mack.

The law review president's election is a fussy affair, part intellectual debate, part frat house ritual. Obama was one of 19 candidates. As the 61 editors not running for the job debated the merits of the candidates behind closed doors on a Sunday morning in late February, the hopefuls cooked them breakfast, lunch, and dinner . Every few hours, the editors winnowed the list further, until just after midnight, when only Obama and a 24-year-old Harvard graduate named David Goldberg remained contenders .

At about 12:30 a.m., the editors called Obama into the room, told him he had won, and broke into applause. Mack, another black editor, pulled Obama in for a hug.

"It was a hard hug, and it lasted a while," Obama told the Harvard Law Record, the school newspaper, at the time. "At that point, I realized this was not just an individual thing. . . but something much bigger."

Obama gained instant fame, was profiled glowingly in newspapers across the country, and landed a contract for a book that would become "Dreams from My Father," his best-selling memoir.

There was buzz on campus, too. Blair Underwood, the actor who played a black lawyer on L.A. Law, one of the campus' s favorite shows, came to visit Obama at the Law Review and took him out for a Chinese food banquet. People who had helped pave the way were also moved.

"You should not underestimate the significance of him being the first black president of the Harvard Law Review because that was and remains a very elite group," said Bell, now a law professor at New York University. "These were some tough folks. . . . It's almost as impressive that he was elected president of the Harvard Law Review as him being elected senator of Illinois."

As editor for two semesters, Obama spent 50 to 60 hours a week holed up in a second-floor office of Gannett House, a 19th century building overlooking Cambridge Common. He reviewed hundreds of articles, on topics ranging from corporate law to racial bias in auto pricing, and presided over long, heated debates in the cluttered first-floor lounge.

"Even though he was clearly a liberal, he didn't appear to the conservatives in the review to be taking sides in the tribal warfare," said Bradford A. Berenson, a former Bush administration lawyer who was an editor at the review.

"The politics of the Harvard Law Review were incredibly petty and incredibly vicious," Berenson said. "The editors of the review were constantly at each other's throats. And Barack tended to treat those disputes with a certain air of detachment and amusement. The feeling was almost, come on kids, can't we just behave here?"

A polished leader Sometimes he sounded like he was already running for public office, giving studied, measured responses in interviews with The Harvard Law Record. Asked in 1991 if he could do one thing differently in his last year at the Review, Obama said, "I don't know that it was possible to do it any other way than I did it, but I would have liked to have had the luxury of being more strategic about my tenure."

Basketball was his outlet. He played often at Hemenway, the law school gymnasium, just off Harvard Square. Hill Harper, a classmate and frequent defender, said Obama, who stands about 6 feet 1 inch tall, had a quick first step and could easily sink midrange jump shots. "If there was any knock against Barack, he pulled his socks up a little too high and his shorts were a little too small," Harper said, laughing. "We were just at the beginning of the Michael Jordan era. He more harkened back to the Julius Erving era."

Some students got their first glimpse of Obama, the orator, in the spring of 1991, when the Black Law Students Association broke with tradition and asked him, rather than a renowned judge or professor, to deliver the keynote address at the association's annual conference. Standing before hundreds , Obama gave what classmates recall as a stirring call to action.

"It was a clarion call," recalled Randall L. Kennedy, a law school professor who attended the conference. "We've gotten this education, we've gotten this great halo, this great career-enhancing benefit. Let's not just feather our nests. Let's go forward and address the many ills that confront our society."

Now that he's traveling the country as a full-fledged presidential candidate, Obama is clearly proud of his training at Harvard, and he is remembered proudly here.

From the landlord who showed him his $700 a month apartment to the learned professors who mentored him, everyone seems to recall him as an exceptionally conscientious young man.

But in some ways, he was just a typical, forgetful grad uate student. Records from Somerville show that he still owes the city $72.63 in excise taxes and $45 in late penalties on two parking violations.

The bright, young law student parked illegally in a bus stop in 1990 and illegally in a street-sweeping zone in 1991.

"I kind of kidded with the mayor and said, "If he comes to Somerville, he might get booted,' " said Walter Pero, a city alderman.

Secrets Of Obama Family Unlocked (LONT)

By Michael Sheridan, Sarah Baxter

Times of London, January 28, 2007

WHEN Barack Obama, America's newest presidential hopeful, was hit by allegations that he had attended a radical Islamic madrasah school as a boy in Indonesia, the claims spread like a virus through the media and internet.

It was a lie — the school was barely more religious than British church schools — but it was also a sign that Obama's chances of winning the presidency depend to an unusual degree on his life story and character.

The race is on to define the gifted but little-known senator for Illinois and The Sunday Times can reveal that his heritage is far more diverse and astonishing than anything American voters have heard so far.

Obama, 45, has two half- sisters, one living in Britain, and five surviving half-brothers, the eldest of whom converted to Islam, and whose stories span the globe.

Nobody was more surprised to hear that Obama had reportedly been educated in a madrasah than Julia Suryakusuma, a close friend of his mother until her death from ovarian cancer in 1995.

Suryakusuma, 53, one of Indonesia's most outspoken feminist writers, has fearlessly taken on extremist Muslim clerics in print. Last week she described Ann Dunham, Obama's mother, "as a liberal and a humanist", who learnt to speak fluent Indonesian and adored the culture.

DOJ_NMG_0123561

“She was interested in religions but didn’t follow one. She was a free-thinker,” Suryakusuma said. “She was a pioneer and when she came to Indonesia she was ensnared and enchanted.”

On the coffee table in her cool modern house in Jakarta, full of the beautiful Indonesian fabrics and carvings which captivated her friend, lies an album of photographs which record the happy times.

There is Dunham, pale-skinned, jolly and frizzy-haired, celebrating with her friends at an art gallery opening or a drinks party, wearing the baggy, free-flowing clothes often favoured by bohemian western women in Asia. She always seemed to be laughing.

“You know Ann was really, really white,” smiled Suryakusuma, looking through the album, “even though she told me she had some Cherokee blood in her. I think she just loved people of a different skin colour, brown people.”

Dunham was from Wichita, Kansas, but her parents moved to Hawaii in search of a better life. According to Obama, a distant ancestor was a “full-blooded Cherokee”.

Dunham’s first marriage was to a Kenyan student, also called Barack Obama, but he left the family to study at Harvard and returned to Africa.

She went on to marry Lolo Soetoro, another foreign student, and moved to his native Indonesia with six-year-old Barack in 1967, after the new dictator Suharto summoned the country’s citizens home.

Soetoro became a government relations consultant with a big US oil company. “He changed when he came back to Indonesia,” Suryakusuma recalled. “Men can be a certain way when they are in the West and when they come back they are sucked into their own culture.”

In his memoir, Dreams from My Father, first published in 1995, Obama does not conceal the estrangement between his mother and stepfather as Soetoro made compromises with Indonesia’s power elite. They divorced and he died decades later of a liver complaint.

At 10, Obama returned to Hawaii, where he lived with his grandparents and attended an elite private school. His mother went back to Indonesia with Obama’s half-sister Maya, now a professor at the University of Hawaii, and became an expert on the “feminine crafts”, such as weaving and basket-making, practised by the women of Java.

Suryakusuma recalled that Dunham called her son “Berry” — Barry with an Indonesian lilt. “We were both mothers and we talked about how difficult it was for a mother to separate herself and send her child away, but she was really concerned about Barry’s education.”

She first met Obama when he came to visit his mother as a young adult. “She was so proud of him. I remember she was glowing with pride when he became the first black president of the Harvard Law Review.

“You know, having a white mother and a black father and coming to Indonesia,” Suryakusuma reflected, “I could see he had the same kind of empathy with people that his mother had.”

Obama’s multi-hued heritage has put a distance between him and the African-American community, which has been reluctant to claim him as a “brother”.

America’s white community, in contrast, has embraced Obama as a hopeful affirmation that the fabled melting pot can transcend race. With his middle name Hussein (like Saddam) and surname Obama (like Osama), he is a rare and exotic figure in American politics.

“I believe the American electorate is ready to support leaders who embody the American dream despite their differences. In doing so, we affirm ourselves as a tolerant people,” said William Galston, a senior fellow in public policy at the Brookings Institution in Washington.

Yet there are details in Obama’s life that have yet to be subjected to full scrutiny. It may not be the information itself that matters, according to Galston, but “how Obama talks about the facts as they emerge and handles questions and controversies”.

The Chicago Sun-Times columnist Lynn Sweet was the first to spot in 2004, when Obama burst on the national stage at the Democratic party convention, that his memoir, Dreams from My Father, contained “composite” characters and changed names.

“Except for public figures and his family, it is impossible to know who is real and who is not,” she pointed out.

Obama admitted as much in his introduction, saying he had altered characters “for the sake of their privacy”. As with the revelation that he took cocaine in his youth, he appears to have been candid about potential areas of controversy.

Obama’s African family is particularly complicated. By his own account, his father never really left Kezia, his first wife, in Kenya. She bore Obama Sr two children, Roy and Auma, who now works in social services in Berkshire.

They were separated, Obama’s mother claimed, but “it was a village wedding and there was no document that could suggest a divorce”.

His own father and mother's wedding in Hawaii may not have been properly documented either. "How and when the marriage occurred remains a bit murky, a bill of particulars that I have never quite had the courage to explore," Obama writes in his memoir.

After his father left Ann and two-year-old Barack to study at Harvard, he went to Africa with another American woman, Ruth, who became his third wife. She bore him two sons in Kenya, one of whom died in a motorcycle accident, but Obama Sr continued to see Kezia.

"Traditionally, she was still his wife," a relative explained. Kezia went on to bear two more sons, Abo and Bernard. Although their paternity is disputed by some relatives, Obama Sr regarded them as his own. Later in life, he fathered another son, George, by a young Kenyan woman.

After his parents split up, Obama saw his father only once before learning that he had died in a car crash in Kenya in 1982.

Obama's eldest brother Roy moved to America and went on to convert to Islam.

Obama, in contrast, became a committed Christian while he was working as a community activist in Chicago. Last week he denounced the reports that he was educated in a madrasah as a "ludicrous" smear.

Larry Sabato, professor of political science at the University of Virginia, believes Obama's richly textured African and Indonesian background will attract voters, no matter how controversial it is.

"America loves a success story — the new generation that rises from the sins and misfortunes of the older generation," Sabato said.

In Indonesia, Suryakusuma said she could still feel the "warm" presence of Obama's mother Ann. "She would be so proud if she knew about Barry, so proud to think that her little boy would be running for president of the United States."

Sticks, Stones And Mr. Obama (WP)

IT'S BECOME a fad among some conservatives to refer to the junior senator from Illinois by his full name: Barack Hussein Obama. This would be merely juvenile if it weren't so contemptible. Republican lobbyist Ed Rogers, on "Hardball," was one of the early adopters of this sleazy tactic. "Count me down as somebody who underestimates Barack Hussein Obama," he said. Radio host Rush Limbaugh, demonstrating his usual maturity, got a chuckle out of the senator's allegedly oversized ears, calling him "Barack Hussein Odumbo." And Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council issued this e-mail alert: "Joining an already glutted field of hopefuls, Sen. Barack Hussein Obama (D-Ill.) announced his candidacy for the 2008 Democratic nomination yesterday."

Insight magazine managed to further degrade the public discourse with a scurrilous "report" alleging that Mr. Obama, as a child in Indonesia, attended a radical Islamic madrassa. In fact, Mr. Obama attended a public school in Jakarta that was predominantly Muslim -- no surprise given that Indonesia is a predominantly Muslim country. Insight, whose piece was eagerly touted by Fox News Network, might have learned this if it had bothered to check its story rather than cravenly attributing the false report to "Hillary Clinton's camp," citing unnamed "sources close to the background check" that the New York senator supposedly conducted into Mr. Obama.

When the madrassa story was debunked by CNN and the Associated Press, Insight didn't even have the decency to slink away. "The media uproar over our reporting reveals a media establishment choosing not to ask the tough questions about Obama's Muslim past: If he was raised in a secular household (as he claims), why does he have -- or retain -- Muslim names, Barack and Hussein?" the magazine asked in a posting on its Web site. "Were his father and stepfather as secular as he says? What is the exact nature of Obama's current religious affiliation and what are the beliefs and teachings of his current church in Chicago, the Trinity United Church of Christ?"

Mr. Obama's slimers seem to think such name-calling and Muslim-baiting can score points with the American people. On the contrary, Mr. Obama's multicultural background (his father was Kenyan, and he spent several years living in Indonesia with his mother and stepfather) ought to be viewed as a plus. A president with an understanding of Islam and the developing world would be welcomed by those who too often feel misunderstood and slighted by the United States.

Mr. Obama has never tried to hide his past or his family name: He has written about being educated at a predominantly Muslim school. His father, a non-practicing Muslim, was Barack Hussein Obama Sr. His grandmother is Sara Hussein Obama.

The senator, however, does not use his middle name. Those who take pains to insert it when referring to him are trying, none too subtly, to stir up scary images of menacing terrorists and evil dictators. They embarrass only themselves.

In A Sea Of Political Endorsements, Six That Could Make Waves (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

DOJ_NMG_0123563

Every day the potential presidential candidates fill The Fix's inbox with press releases touting some new endorsement from a sheriff in South Carolina or a state legislator in Michigan. For the most part, these endorsements are aimed at building momentum but have zero practical effect on the hunt for votes. Not all endorsements are created equal, however. Some really do matter. Here's a look at six of the most important.Republicans

Former governor Jeb Bush (Fla.): Not only is Florida expected to move its primary all the way up to Feb. 5, 2008, it is also a treasure trove of campaign contributions if you run in the right circles. Bush knows all the political and financial road maps. He also happens to be the president's brother.

Rep. Steve King (Iowa): King represents the vast -- and overwhelmingly Republican -- 5th District in western Iowa. He's also one of the state's leading conservatives and an outspoken opponent of immigration reform.

Gov. Mark Sanford (S.C.): Most of the statewide elected officials in the Palmetto State have chosen sides, but not Sanford. Although he backed Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in 2000, Sanford has made clear that he hasn't decided where to throw his support this time.Democrats

Sen. Ted Kennedy (Mass.): Sen. John Kerry's decision to step out of the 2008 race makes Kennedy one of the most sought-after free agents in the field. Kennedy has ties to several of the candidates, although Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) stands to benefit most from an endorsement by the liberal icon.

Rep. Jim Clyburn (S.C.): The highest-ranking African American in the House, Clyburn is the rare modern politician with a proven political machine at his disposal. And he sits in a state that will vote on Jan. 29, 2008.

Former governor Jeanne Shaheen (N.H.): Shaheen, a former three-term governor, maintains an active political organization in the state, overseen by her husband, Billy. She may not be able to endorse from her current perch at Harvard, but a lot can change in a year's time.A Winter Showdown in the Sunshine State?

So long ethanol, hellllo offshore drilling and big sugar .

Pandering to Iowa farmers is part of the job description for presidential candidates, but if several big states move up their 2008 primary dates, the promises will multiply like bugs on a Florida windshield.

The Sunshine State could be a particularly interesting addition, if the legislature decides, as expected, to reschedule from its usual March date to Feb. 5, just after New Hampshire votes. Florida features a complex mix of niche issues, including relations with Cuba, Everglades restoration and energy exploration in the Gulf of Mexico.

In the Senate, Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) have taken opposite positions on both Cuba and offshore drilling. Obama twice voted to cut off funding for TV Marti, which is jammed by the Cuban government, while Clinton supported maintaining the signal. Clinton backed an expansion of oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico; Obama voted against it.

GOP candidates are starting to carve up the state, with former governor Mitt Romney (Mass.) making a strong early showing, with support from members of Jeb Bush's inner circle. But state GOP insiders believe that Gov. Charlie Crist (R) is a McCain man.

The Faint Hoofbeats? That's The Dark Horse (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON dashed to Iowa this weekend to hang an open-for-business sign on her new campaign operation. Barack Obama is besieged by admirers begging to join his team. And John Edwards has already dipped his toes into each of Iowa's 99 counties — and started his second lap.

So is the Democratic stable too full for a dark horse presidential candidate to emerge?

The current thinking suggests that only famous candidates, Democrat or Republican, can seize their party's nomination. But it has never been a wise bet to rule out the dark horse, a staple of American politics since James K. Polk went to the Democratic convention in 1844 and became the presidential nominee by accident after the favorite, former President Martin Van Buren, lost Southern support.

But perhaps more than any other presidential contest, 2008's could help determine whether the dark horse, a term borrowed from English racetrack lingo, is on the verge of extinction, particularly since the entry fee in the race for the White House has been raised yet again.

For the first time since 1928, neither a sitting president nor vice president will be a candidate in the race, theoretically creating a wide-open fight for both nominations and making it possible for a dark horse to pull stealthily ahead. But the contest is front-loaded as never before — California and other big states are rushing to wedge their caucuses and primaries into early February — so little-known candidates concede they have an even more difficult task.

Already, the leading contenders are making plans to reject public financing in the primary and general election campaigns for the first time since Watergate. The cost of preparing for a race, strategists believe, could swell beyond $75 million this year alone, which most dark horse candidates may struggle to meet, given the calendar.

"It makes it almost impossible for a dark horse to win," said Dayton Duncan, who worked on the 1984 and 1988 Democratic presidential races of Walter Mondale and Michael Dukakis and wrote "Grass Roots: One Year in the Life of the New Hampshire Presidential Primary." "But it might be the only chance for a dark horse candidate if they really caught lightning in a jar and were catapulted to the national stage."

The window will be narrow for a second-tier candidate. With rapid back-to-back primaries, a promising showing in Iowa or New Hampshire is critical to advancing.

But even before the rules and the calendar take shape for the 2008 race, dark horse candidates have one piece of storybook history to hold onto: Jimmy Carter, 1976.

After Mr. Carter declared his candidacy on Dec. 12, 1974, a Harris poll listed 35 prospective presidential candidates. Mr. Carter, a one-term Georgia governor, was not among them. Yet 13 months later, after spending day after day traipsing from the Missouri to the Mississippi, he won the Iowa caucuses, that all-important first test of a candidacy. The victory replenished his bank account and sustained him through the rest of the primary campaign.

But now, with the campaign's cost significantly higher and less time to raise money and attract supporters between primaries, it is hard to imagine a candidate's emerging from the shadows on persistence alone.

"Without a doubt, it's more difficult for someone to emerge today since you've got people who can raise tens of millions of dollars at the drop of a hat," said Senator Charles E. Grassley, an Iowa Republican, who as a young congressman watched the 1976 campaign with interest. "Little guys like Carter could never compete with that."

The Iowa caucuses not only created the lore of Mr. Carter, but Mr. Carter added to the lore of the Iowa caucuses. And for the last three decades, his out-of-nowhere victory has lured ambitious politicians convinced that they, too, could pull off the feat.

In 2004, the brief rise of Howard Dean again illustrated that little-known candidates could catch fire and raise money to compete with candidates blessed by the political establishment, but it also reinforced Iowa's importance. He finished third, his chances to become the nominee collapsing.

Mr. Dean tapped into the promise of the Internet like no other. And the next evolution of Internet fund-raising and activism — combined with old-fashioned discipline — might resuscitate the dark horse.

"The Internet can spontaneously combust a dark-horse candidacy that can take everyone out," said Joe Trippi, who managed Mr. Dean's campaign. "Everybody is sure it's going to be Hillary, Edwards or Obama, but my guess is that someone no one is talking about right now is going to give these three the scare of their life."

The Internet could be the great equalizer. First, candidates who struggle to raise money through traditional means could tap into the grassroots to close the gap. Second, if a front-runner's stumble is caught on camera it is sure to be widely disseminated on YouTube and its ilk, which could clear a path for an outsider.

With the rush of candidates announcing their bids in the last few weeks, you could almost forget that the first primary votes won't be cast for another year. Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama are among the hopefuls whose high profile will deny them the advantage of learning on the fly, a privilege reserved for the dark horse. If, for example, former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa missteps, he might be able to pick himself up without attracting as much notice as one of his more prominent rivals.

"A lot can change in a month," said Senator Tom Harkin, also of Iowa, who in 1992 sought the Democratic presidential nomination. "One of the problems of being a front-runner like Hillary and Barack, if they make a mistake, it will be magnified way beyond its own dimensions. If others stumble, it's not a big deal."

As he left the Senate floor to begin a weekend of campaigning, Sam Brownback of Kansas, one of many Republican candidates in the field, stopped for a moment to chat about his prospects. After describing himself as the "true conservative in the field," he acknowledged finding solace in the legends of Democratic dark horses.

"You have people like Jimmy Carter, who came out of nowhere. And Bill Clinton! They were not household names when they started this process," Mr. Brownback said. Asked when he was heading to Iowa, he paused for barely a beat and replied, "Next week."

Cullen Elected State GOP Chairman (NHUL)

By Garry Rayno

New Hampshire Union Leader, January 28, 2007

Manchester – Fergus Cullen was elected Republican state chairman on the first ballot at the party's annual meeting today at the Palace Theater in Manchester.

DOJ_NMG_0123565

The vote for Cullen, a Wolfeboro businessman, was decisive: 247 votes, vs. 129 for Fran Wendelboe of New Hampton, who has served in the Legislature for 10 years, and 25 votes for three-term Manchester state Rep. William Infantine.

Cullen succeeds Wayne Semprini as party chairman.

Cullen calls himself "a conservative in the mainstream conservative wing of the Republican Party." He said the state party "has fallen down in many areas, including organization, candidate recruitment and fundraising. There are also basic infrastructure needs, such as updated computer and telephone systems."

Cullen said the party also needs to rebuild its get-out-the-vote program, which was absent this year, in time for the 2008 election. Cullen conferred with a lot of activists and party leaders before deciding to enter the race.

Move Up The California Primary (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

CALIFORNIA WILL be scorned no more. That is the sentiment driving state legislators to move up the state's next presidential primary, in 2008, to early February. Even though it held its 2004 primary in March instead of June, the nation's largest state was not a factor in the parties' nomination battles because they were all but over by the time Californians went to the polls.

The state was going to return to a June primary. But the Legislature is considering having only a local primary in June and catapulting to near the front of the line with a presidential primary that would immediately follow the first contests in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Sacramento is right to want to make the state a player in presidential races. At the same time, the front-loading of each party's nomination process is not a healthy development. As this month has shown, the compressed nomination schedule drives candidates to launch their presidential bids nearly two years in advance of the election. And by the time the voting begins, the fundraising primary — in which California's deep pockets do figure prominently — will have already helped determine the shape of the race.

It wasn't supposed to be this way. The primary season was intended to make party nominations more accessible to worthy but lesser-known candidates, forcing the parties to sponsor a cross-country debate on the issues. In theory, a modestly financed candidate could gain traction in the retail politics of New Hampshire and Iowa, then take his or her campaign to bigger states. The theory also holds that the grueling primary season helps vet, and develop, candidates.

In reality, the primary season has been getting shorter. In 2004, Iowa and New Hampshire almost served as national primaries for the Democrats, with the party keen to crown a victor early and protect him from extended intramural bashing. The days when candidates could slowly gather momentum during the primary season are long gone, and it is a shame that the parties have refused to take steps to bring them back.

The best solution here would be a series of regional, rotating primaries (so that your state might go first if it went last the previous election). Such a tournament would force candidates to campaign nationwide and would draw out the nomination battles until May or June.

Alas, the parties have not taken meaningful steps to curtail the front-loading of the nomination process. The Democrats recently failed to adopt a plan to stretch out the primary season, opting instead to simply let Nevada and South Carolina join Iowa and New Hampshire at the front of the line. The message to the rest of the country: It's a free-for-all, so suit yourselves.

So it's understandable for California to want to hold its primary on the first permissible date under party rules: Feb. 5, 2008. This would force candidates to come to the nation's most-populous state not merely to raise money for their battles elsewhere (centered on other regions' concerns) but to focus on issues important to Californians. And if a California vote in February, with its high costs, makes the primary process seem untenably front-loaded to the point that it forces party leaders to establish a more rational calendar, then the state will have provided the entire nation a worthy service.

How Dems Can Use California To Win In '08 (LAT)

By Christopher S. Lehane

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

IN RECENT WEEKS, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and legislators have talked about giving California a well-deserved bigger say in the presidential campaign by moving up the state's primary. However, if Democrats really want to put the party in the strongest possible position to succeed in presidential elections, let's completely rethink the current primary system and replace it with a nominating process designed to pick the candidate best able to win.

In 2004, the primary season was frontloaded around a few early, relatively small and not especially diverse states in order to identify as quickly as possible the "most electable" candidate and to conserve money for the general election. Because these were small states that are historically won one voter and one constituency group at a time, candidates were rewarded for their retail campaign skills: one-on-one politics, constituency group building and a good biography. Unfortunately, these skills are about as relevant to a 21st century national presidential campaign as horseback riding is relevant to driving a car.

Modern presidential campaigns are tests of character; they're a hunt for candidates who have broad appeal (as opposed to a biography attractive to only a limited range of voters). They're about identifying candidates with the ability to articulate a message that speaks to all Americans, rather than those who rely on the typical 12-point plans constructed for one constituency group or another. Modern presidential races are about the ability to connect with voters over the TV in their living rooms — not about a candidate's charm when he meets with them in person in their own living rooms. And they're about the capacity to assemble and run a far-flung organization capable of raising well in excess of $100 million in just a few years.

With three reforms, the Democrats can put in place a nominating system that will produce the strongest and, yes, most electable candidate.

First, the Democratic primary schedule should open with a group of states that, when taken together, represents the mosaic that is America. Along with a Midwestern Iowa and a Northeastern New Hampshire, let's have a state from the Southwest, South and West all voting on the same day.

A multi-state campaign taking place on one day and involving a diverse set of states will begin the process of identifying the candidate who can put together the winning qualities of a national campaign.

Second, the primary season needs to be spread over a longer time period — not just in theory but in practice as well, so candidates are truly tested. Beginning in early February and going until May, Democrats should schedule a series of 10 primaries, with each involving five geographically diverse states voting every two weeks. The diverse and multi-state nature of the races would make it far more likely that the campaign would be competitive for a longer period. (Under the current system, the 2008 primary could effectively be over after four early states vote in a span of a few weeks, as it was in 2004. The compressed time period and winner-take-all nature of the existing system means that whoever does well in these first states, especially the first two, is in all likelihood the presumptive nominee.)

This sort of diverse process over an extended time period worked in 1992 — the only time in the last 25 years that the Democrats nominated a candidate, Bill Clinton, who went on to be sworn in as president. That year, because Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin was running in the Iowa caucuses and because New Hampshire voters chose former Sen. Paul Tsongas of neighboring Massachusetts, neither Iowa nor New Hampshire played their historically determinative roles. In fact, the 1992 election was the first time in history that a candidate became president who did not win the New Hampshire primary. Instead, Democrats had to compete vigorously over the course of several months in such places as South Dakota, and then in Georgia (where Clinton got his first win), Maryland, Colorado, South Carolina, Arizona, Super Tuesday, and then on to Connecticut, New York and eventually California, where Clinton wrapped up the nomination in early June.

If Democrats had been using the 2004 primary system in 1992, their nominee could well have been Tsongas. The longer, diversified schedule, however, allowed Clinton to prove himself to voters, exposed the candidates' relative strengths and weaknesses and allowed the Democrats to stay on the offensive and define the terms of the general election. Democrats ended up with a candidate who actually won a number of states in the South and all the states in the upper Midwest — and who had the message, the battle-hardened ability and the proven campaign operation needed to beat the Republicans.

The third reform, in order to encourage more voter participation and loosen the grip of the Washington establishment on the Democratic Party's nomination process, is a three-part proposal: Eliminate the "super delegate" system. Super delegates are a significant pool of at-large, free-agent delegates representing the Democratic apparatus (including both party and elected officials) in the nominating process. In addition, the party should establish a system that more closely resembles the system that states such as Maine and Nebraska use in the general election, in which they divide nominating delegates by congressional districts, with votes for each district and additional points for whichever candidate wins the majority of the state's total vote. Finally, as in New Hampshire, independents should be allowed to vote in Democratic primaries.

These changes would force candidates to compete for an ideologically broader range of voters throughout all regions of a state, including in urban, suburban, exurban and rural districts.

Even a cursory glance at a red-and-blue color-coded map that divides the country's counties up shows that Democrats need to compete in more than just the major cities and coastal regions. Not only will this be of enormous help to producing a candidate who can compete nationally — it will help the party's candidates lower down on the ballot, where Democrats face challenges in traditional swing communities.

The winning coalition for Democrats will in all likelihood not be the old Democratic coalition of labor, minorities, women and coastal progressives. As the 2006 midterms demonstrated, for the Democratic Party to regain a permanent majority status, our candidates must win by talking to all Americans.

How California Can Spoil The '08 Election (LAT)

By Philip J. Trounstine

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

WITH SUPPORT FROM Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and leaders of both parties in the Legislature, the prospects are looking good that California will move its 2008 presidential primary from June to February.

That would put the contest for the largest bloc of delegates (about 12% or so) needed to win a party nomination at the front end of the nominating process, after Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina.

From the standpoint of California — which traditionally has served as little more than an ATM for campaign cash — this would be a good thing. Why should such a big and important state weigh in at the end of the nominating process, when the races are all but settled by puny, one-dimensional states that matter not a lick in November?

Think about it:

· Iowa, which is 92% white, has a population about the size of San Diego County.

· New Hampshire — 94% white — is smaller than Sacramento County.

· Nevada's population is just a bit larger than that of San Bernardino County, and South Carolina's is considerably smaller than the San Francisco Bay Area's.

To run well in California, a presidential primary candidate can't get by with boutique issues and handshakes in living rooms and coffee shops. He or she must demonstrate broad appeal to party members, must not only be able to perform hand-to-hand politics but display a media presence and the ability to speak to myriad constituencies on a wide range of issues.

And because you don't exist in California politics if you're not on TV, a candidate must have the ability to raise and spend a lot of money effectively. But that's not enough. He or she has to have something to say, for without a clear and simple strategic message, no candidate can capture California.

A Democrat who wants to carry California must appeal to labor liberals in Los Angeles and Oakland, to gun-rack flag wavers in Fresno and Bakersfield, tree huggers in Marin and Ventura counties and high-tech pragmatists in San Jose and San Diego. He or she has to connect with Latinos, blacks and Asians without driving away white union members in Long Beach.

A Republican has to appeal to churchgoers in Riverside and Anaheim, business owners in Redlands and Huntington Beach, middle managers in Fullerton and Pasadena, farmers and ranchers in Modesto and Delano. He or she has to capture the pro-life, prayer-in-school crowd without alienating all those moderate suburban Little League parents.

In short, a candidate who can capture California, with all its diversity, can be competitive in his or her party in virtually all the big states — Texas, New York, Florida, Illinois, Pennsylvania and Ohio, for example. A statewide victor in California is a national, not just a regional, candidate. Win California and you're ready for prime time.

But it's increasingly looking like California will not get to exercise its political weight unilaterally. Indeed, Feb. 5, 2008, may become Super-Duper Tuesday with, perhaps, Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma and Utah voting on the same day.

If Super-Duper Tuesday does occur, California would still represent the biggest bloc in what would be, in effect, a national primary. But as the law of unintended consequences is wont to do, all this may actually increase, rather than decrease, the importance of Iowa and New Hampshire (and perhaps Nevada and South Carolina), because winners in those states would have the only momentum heading into Super-Duper Tuesday. It's the slingshot effect.

According to a variety of campaign consultants, a candidate, to be viable, would need something like $100 million in the bank and a fully functional national campaign operation to make it past Super-Duper Tuesday. For the Democrats, that likely winnows the field right off the bat to Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama and maybe a third contender. For Republicans, John McCain and Rudy Giuliani look like the only likely contenders right now.

So the nominating process itself may screen the field, even before a single vote is cast. That's not necessarily good for the country.

Those with name recognition and early money will have a huge built-in advantage. There won't be time to test, appraise and evaluate the candidates, to see them handle the slings and arrows that we expect our presidents to be able to deflect. Under a hyper-compressed primary system, Jimmy Carter would not have had a chance to beat George C. Wallace in Florida in 1976, and Pat Buchanan might have rode with his pitchfork right out of New Hampshire and into the 1996 November election.

The media would determine who is a viable candidate and who is not. They'll do that anyway, of course, but there won't be time for the voters to exercise their own, independent opinions. Even California — where contrarian Democrats opted for Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) over President Carter in 1980 and Sen. Gary Hart (D-Colo.) over Vice President Walter Mondale in 1984 — might get swept up in the stampede.

So, if the governor and Legislature strike a deal — keep your eyes peeled for a package that includes a February primary, reapportionment reform and an extension of term limits for state legislators — it may mean that California voters will have an early say in the nominating process. But when California is tossed in with lots of other states, its influence still won't match its measure. And the nominating process may become a mad dash for closure that serves no one well.

Dems Aim To Lift State's Stature In Presidential Race (DENP)

By Karen E. Crummy

Denver Post, January 28, 2007

Colorado Democrats are considering moving up the state's caucuses to the first week of February 2008 in an effort to be politically relevant in the next presidential election.

If Colorado moves its caucuses from the third week in March to Feb. 5, however, it would join more than a dozen other states that have either already moved their caucuses or primaries up to the same date, or are thinking about it. As a result, some political observers say, Colorado probably becomes insignificant.

"The chances are you get less attention on (Feb.) 5th than if you're some other place on the calendar," said Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics. "Independently, states are making a rational decision to move things up, but collectively they are cutting their throats."

On the other hand, with at least four states holding presidential contests in January and more states holding them on Feb. 5, a contest past that date also risks irrelevancy because the nominees will effectively be picked.

Pat Waak, head of the state Democratic Party, has discussed moving up Colorado's caucuses with national party officials so they would coincide with other states in the region. On Friday, Waak was talking to county chairs to see if it would be logistically possible to reschedule the caucuses for the first Tuesday in February of next year.

U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar said that moving up the state's caucuses made sense.

"The candidates won't ignore Colorado," he said. "If there is a possibility that Colorado could be in a position to help decide the nominee in either party, it would make sense to do it."

Tired of being flyover territory for presidential candidates on their way to hefty electoral states such as California or Florida, elected officials in the Rocky Mountain West have for years discussed having a regional primary. But it never materialized.

Next year, however, Nevada's caucus is Jan. 19, sandwiched between the Iowa caucus on Jan. 14 and the New Hampshire primary on Jan. 22. Utah and New Mexico are set for Feb. 5. Arizona and Montana, along now with Colorado, are also considering moving their contests into February.

But so is California. And Florida is thinking about moving its primary up to the end of January.

If Waak and the party decide to move ahead with their Feb. 5 plan, it must be approved by the state legislature. It would apply to Republicans as well.

Dick Wadhams, a political strategist who is running to be state GOP chair starting in March, said he didn't object to an earlier caucus but wasn't sure it was going to make much of a difference. History indicates that candidates get the most momentum and media coverage from the first few contests.

"I don't think it changes the fact that Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina really determine the races," Wadhams said.

The consequences of the front- loaded political calendar have created problems for candidates - and potentially voters.

Most analysts predict both major-party nominations essentially will be determined by early February. That means the candidates are pouring massive amounts of money into the process early on. Those who can't ante up will have to get out.

Several analysts already have predicted that 2008 will be the first $1 billion presidential race and that to be taken seriously a candidate probably would need $100 million.

Additionally, with early primaries and caucuses comes a nine-month general-election campaign - for better or worse.

"The parties are stuck with those nominees. There's no opportunity for buyer's remorse," Sabato said, even if the candidate comes with heavy political baggage that might alter the course of an election.

"You could have a nominee that unfortunately hasn't been seriously vetted until the general (election)," said Jennifer Duffy, managing editor of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Bill Clinton In '08! (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

THERE'S something about the upcoming presidential election that already feels terribly unsatisfying, and I think I've figured out what it is: the 22nd Amendment.

The 22nd Amendment, of course, forbids presidents from running for reelection after their second term in office. Republicans enacted it in a fit of pique at Franklin Roosevelt and his supposedly dictatorial tendencies. And the prohibition on a third term is, I suppose, one way of preventing a president from making himself a dictator (unless, of course, he's dictatorial enough to suspend the 22nd Amendment). But sometimes it makes our politics incoherent, and now is one of those times.

First consider the Democrats. The Hillary Clinton campaign is a product of the fact that her husband can't run for reelection. She is certainly highly intelligent and qualified to hold the presidency, but if her husband was running, she wouldn't be. People react to her candidacy largely on the basis of how they felt about Bill Clinton. Those who yearn for a return to his policies generally support her; those who disliked his policies don't.

Indeed, Democratic presidential politics since Clinton has consisted largely of referendum-by-proxy on Clinton. In the 2000 primary, Al Gore had the support of Clinton loyalists. Bill Bradley had the support of Democrats who opposed Clinton. You had the odd spectacle of Bradley getting support from liberal Democratic dissidents (such as former Labor Secretary Robert Reich, who bemoaned Clinton's stingy social investment) and conservative Democratic dissidents (such as Bob Kerrey, who bemoaned Clinton's failure to slash social spending).

In 2004, Howard Dean's campaign was powered in large part by liberal dissidents against Clintonism. He railed against the Washington Democratic establishment. This was the Clinton establishment. This time around, John Edwards is trying to collect the support of those anti-Clinton liberals. His embrace of anti-poverty measures is an implicit rebuke to Clinton's focus on the middle class and support for welfare reform. Barack Obama, meanwhile, isn't attacking Clintonism per se, but he is talking about leaving behind the debates of the 1990s.

So the Democratic voters are being asked to make a choice about Clintonism, but they're being asked in a roundabout fashion. It's like junior high, where your friend asks a girl's friend if the girl likes you or likes you likes you. Shouldn't we be able to vote on the real thing, up or down, rather than sort-of-pretend we're voting on something else?

Meanwhile, the Republican situation is even more frustrating. George W. Bush is going to leave office deeply unpopular with the American public. But what do Republicans think? According to a recent poll, three-quarters of them still approve of Bush's performance.

Because Bush can't run again, though, Republicans won't have to confront whether they want to stick with him or move in a different direction. So you have the spectacle of, for instance, John McCain sending out wildly contradictory signals — hugging Bush one day, excoriating his execution of the war the next (though carefully blaming it on others). I'm guessing McCain's plan is to convince Republicans that he mostly wants to continue Bush's policies, get the nomination, win the presidency and then announce a U-turn. If it happens, Republicans will be annoyed, and I don't blame them.

As a confirmed Bush-hater, I'm annoyed myself. Why should I only get one chance to register my verdict on Bush's presidency, especially when the vehicle for that verdict is John Kerry? Yes, the 2006 elections were fun, but punishing his co-partisans (many of whom had already abandoned him anyway) lacks the satisfying thump of actually throwing the bum himself out of office. Now Bush is going to go down in history as a two-term president, forever tied for second place in most terms awarded by the American voter.

If we had a straight dictatorship, Bush would long ago have been dragged out of the White House either by an angry mob or by disgruntled generals. (Note to oversensitive conservatives: I'm strongly against both dictatorships and assassinating Bush or any other president.) If we could vote for whoever we want, regardless of prior service, Bush would probably be dumped unceremoniously in 2008. Only our kooky current system lets him retire undefeated.

What this country really needs is to have Bill Clinton run against George W. Bush.

Fund for rebuilding rentals urged

Congress is getting ready to address the scarcity of affordable rental housing in New Orleans. The Feb. 6 hearing by the House Financial Services Committee is expected to be a prelude to legislation to rebuild the affordable-housing stock along the Gulf Coast decimated in Hurricane Katrina. Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., who has called the Bush administration's commitment to housing in the Gulf Coast an "abject failure," is expected to resurrect legislation that would peel hundreds of millions of dollars from the profits of government-backed mortgage buyers Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac for a rebuilding fund. The bill, pushed last year by Rep. Richard Baker, R-Baton Rouge, passed the House but stalled in the Senate.

Pair seek to expand police hiring grant

Two leaders of the new Democratic majority in Congress promised the nation's mayors last week that they will try to restore financing for a 1994 federal program that provided grants to help cities hire more police officers. The program has seen most of its money cut in recent years. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., a senior member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said that growing crime problems in major cities, including New Orleans, shows that the program needs to be restored. "In 1994 we had historically high rates of violent crimes like murders, forcible rapes, and aggravated assaults," Biden said. "Because we put more cops on the streets in more neighborhoods, we were able to reduce these crimes to the lowest levels in a generation. Fewer people were murdered, fewer people became victims, and fewer children will become criminals." No word on where financing for the new Democratic proposal would come from, or whether the Bush administration will go along.

Attorney general's response praised

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., who has been critical of what she has termed unacceptable delays in getting federal assistance to Katrina-ravaged Louisiana, praised U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last week for agreeing to help New Orleans address violent crime, after she had sent him a list of critical needs. "I am grateful to Attorney General Gonzales for quickly acting on my requests, and look forward to continuing to work with him, Senate Judiciary Chairman (Patrick) Leahy and local law enforcement authorities to implement the remaining elements of the plan," Landrieu said. "Additional federal resources and technical assistance is only one solution. More reform and coordination on the ground in New Orleans must continue." Sen. David Vitter, R-La., also praised the attorney general's action, which was announced at a New Orleans news conference.

Bush's energy plans get a mixed reaction

While most of the focus on President Bush's State of the Union address last week was on the defense of his decision to increase troop levels in Iraq, he did offer some new domestic initiatives on health care and energy. Louisiana's two senators, Democrat Mary Landrieu and Republican David Vitter, viewed them differently. "I liked that he spoke in bold terms about some key domestic challenges like health care and energy," Vitter said. "We all need to think and act outside the box in a bold way." But Landrieu said she was disappointed Bush's latest energy proposal, combining some new conservation and alternative energy projects with more domestic production, doesn't reflect "the great urgency" her constituents express about making the United States less dependent on foreign oil.

Lobbyist for N.O. has ties to Bush

Arnold Havens, a former acting deputy secretary and general counsel for the Treasury Department, has joined the Washington government affairs shop of New Orleans-based law firm Jones Walker. Havens, who will become a partner at the firm, said he will help the firm lobby for some of its New Orleans area clients, including the city of New Orleans and Tulane University, as they seek continued help with Katrina recovery efforts. Havens, who worked in both Bush administrations, is barred under federal rules from lobbying his former colleagues at the Treasury until August 2007, one year after he left the administration.

Bid for forgiveness of loans renewed

Louisiana is, once again, trying to persuade Congress to forgive its disaster loans. The federal government authorized hundreds of millions of dollars in loans to cities, towns, sheriffs' offices and other governmental entities struggling to recover from Hurricane Katrina. With their tax base wiped out in the storm, some of the money was used to pay city employees and put police on the streets. But the Republican-controlled Congress insisted the money should be paid back. Now with Democrats in charge, Louisiana is asking again. "We were in the minority (in the past) and it wasn't a priority," said Melanie Roussell, spokeswoman for Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans. "We're in a different Congress now." The House delegation filed a bill last week seeking to have the loans forgiven, and a similar measure was filed in the Senate earlier this month.

Baker weighing run for U.S. Senate seat

Rep. Richard Baker, R-Baton Rouge, isn't ruling out a run against Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., next year. "Folks in D.C. have talked to him about it. Folks in Louisiana have talked to him about it," Michael DiResto, Baker's spokesman, said. "He's thinking about it." The veteran congressman wasn't well-known outside his district until he proposed a community redevelopment plan for post-Katrina Louisiana that won accolades from state leaders, including Landrieu and Gov. Kathleen Blanco. It died when the Bush administration opposed it, but the effort boosted Baker's profile statewide.

Melancon promises meaningful oversight

The White House is said to be hunkering down for a barrage of investigations from the Democratic-led Congress -- and for good reason. Last week, Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, had a feisty tone when announcing his appointment to the Energy and Commerce Committee's panel on oversight and investigations. "The Constitution mandates that Congress conduct meaningful oversight of the federal government, yet there have been almost no oversight hearings held or subpoenas issued in the past six years," said Melancon, who will serve as vice chairman of the subcommittee headed by Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich. "It's time to change that." A Melancon spokeswoman said the congressman wasn't ready to name his targets yet.

Questions center on mayors' meeting

DOJ_NMG_0123571

The head of the World Conference of Mayors says he's mystified why his organization would be of interest to federal investigators looking into Rep. William Jefferson's business dealings. The attorney for Allison Anadi, a Southern University criminal justice professor, said investigators in the probe had asked his client about a 2001 World Conference of Mayors meeting in Nigeria. Johnny Ford, chairman of the World Conference and mayor of Tuskegee, Ala., said that the conference was called to help officials from the Nigerian state of Akwa Ibom deal with serious pollution problems from a U.S.-operated refinery. Jefferson, D-New Orleans, attended the meeting, Ford said, but nothing out of the ordinary occurred. "We were just trying to find a way to help officials deal with some terrible pollution problems," Ford said. The FBI has asked Nigerian officials for bank records for Anadi, along with any money transfers of more than $5,000. Anadi's attorney Glen Woods said he doesn't know why the feds would be interested in his client's banking transactions. Jefferson has not been charged in the investigation, which began in March 2005, and denies wrongdoing. Two of Jefferson's former associates have pleaded guilty to bribery-related charges.

Jeb Bush Rallies Conservatives At Summit (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

At a time when the conservative movement is looking bereft, humbled by midterm-election defeats and hungering for a presidential candidate to rally around, Jeb Bush delivered yesterday in Washington a resounding endorsement of conservative principles, bringing his audience repeatedly to its feet.

In his lunchtime remarks to the Conservative Summit, Bush struck every conservative chord, blaming Republicans' defeat in November on the party's abandonment of tenets including limited government and fiscal restraint.

"Don't take offense personally if I get mad at Congress," the Republican former Florida governor began. "It's important for us to realize we lost, and there are significant reasons that happened, but it isn't because conservatives were rejected. But it's because we rejected the conservative philosophy in this country."

He added, "If the promise of pork and more programs is the way Republicans think they'll regain the majority, then they've got a problem."

Bush's speech prompted three standing ovations from the audience of hundreds at the National Review Institute's conference at the JW Marriott Hotel, reflecting the widespread concern among conservatives that exorbitant government spending led to the loss of majorities in the House and Senate and concern about whether Republicans would again embrace the traditional principles.

To Ed Gillespie, a prominent lobbyist and former chairman of the Republican National Committee, Bush's two terms in Tallahassee -- where he developed a reputation as a tax-cutter and staunch spending hawk -- exemplified conservative politics at its best, and what makes for a compelling presidential candidate.

"For those who are worried if you can put forward a vigorous conservative policy agenda in a state like Florida and still get elected and still be popular: Our keynote speaker left office with approval ratings above 60 percent," Gillespie said.

"If he were former two-term governor Jeb Smith, he might be in Des Moines today," Gillespie said, alluding to presidential hopefuls' campaigning.

Bush says he will not run for president in 2008, however, and conservatives continue to look for a candidate to excite their interest.

"So far there's definitely a lukewarm feeling about the field, but it's still early, and conservatives want to see how these guys run. And it's still possible that one or the other of the candidates will really inspire conservatives," said Rich Lowry, editor of the National Review.

Two men eyeing the GOP's conservative base as a platform for a presidential candidacy also gave speeches yesterday. In the morning, former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) addressed the conference, and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney was scheduled to speak last night. Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, mentioned as another presidential possibility, is expected to speak this morning.

Gingrich, the architect of the 1994 "Republican revolution" that saw the GOP win control of Congress for the first time in 40 years, sharply criticized his party.

"You have a Republican Party that resents ideas," he said. "We worked for 16 years to get a majority, which was thrown away."

Gingrich, who received a warm reception, said he will not make a decision on running until much later this year.

Huckabee, meanwhile, might form an exploratory committee as soon as tomorrow. Romney, already exploring a bid, is criticized by some conservatives for the liberal social views he expressed in the 1990s.

With little disagreement at the conference about the prudence of the president's strategy for Iraq, the war appeared not to figure into the thinking of conservatives as an issue that could further cost the GOP.

At a Friday night panel on the state of conservatism, commentator Laura Ingraham argued that Republicans -- if they are to have any chance of winning in 2008 -- must wake up to the fact that Democrats are embracing politicians such as Sen. James Webb (Va.), a gruff military veteran who delivered his party's response to the State of the Union on Tuesday by attacking President Bush's Iraq plan while offering a populist economic message.

"We have to be careful with conservatives not to remain in an echo chamber," Ingraham said. "The party that comes off as the party that represents the American worker best is the party that wins in 2008."

U.S. Missiles In E. Europe Opposed By Locals, Russia (WP)

By Bruce I. Konviser

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

PRAGUE -- A Bush administration plan to deploy a missile defense shield in Eastern Europe is drawing protests from Russia and from residents who oppose hosting foreign military bases and fear the facilities might make their countries targets for attack.

The proposed placement of about 10 interceptor missiles in Poland and a radar tracking station in the Czech Republic would pose a "clear threat" to Russia, Col. Gen. Vladimir Popovkin, chief of Russia's Space Forces, told reporters last week. He spoke after the United States announced it would open formal negotiations with the two former client states of the Soviet Union.

Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mikhail Kamynin underlined his government's opposition Friday, saying in an interview with the ITAR-Tass news agency that "the creation of a U.S. European anti-missile base can only be regarded as a substantial reconfiguration of the American military presence in Europe." He called the move "a mistaken step with negative consequences for international security."

The Bush administration maintains that the missile system is limited and not meant to counter Russia, with its huge nuclear arsenal, but to protect against a "rogue state" such as Iran or North Korea attacking with a small number of intercontinental ballistic missiles. Eastern Europe lies along the flight path such rockets would follow from the Middle East to the United States.

Since the fall of communism, political leaders in Prague and Warsaw have viewed U.S. military prowess as key to their countries' security. They favor the U.S. plans for missile defense, but that may not be enough to carry the day -- there is considerable public opposition to the plans in both countries.

After nearly eight months of political paralysis, a new Czech government finally won a vote of confidence this month -- and the United States issued its request for negotiations shortly afterward. But the government is ruling without a majority in Parliament, which would have to ratify any agreement. It is far from certain that such a vote would win today, political analysts said.

Jitka Pozdenova, who works for a nongovernmental organization that promotes international exchange programs for high school students, said that she opposes the base and that people don't trust U.S. intentions.

"A lot of people are against it because it is an American thing and not a Czech or European operation," she said. "People feel America is doing it for itself."

Ales Janda, a physician, said many Czechs oppose the site being under U.S. control because of the bad memories of the Soviet Union's military presence here. "People are afraid of having a foreign army here, but it is totally different now," he said. "I think if we're a part of NATO, we can't be against it."

Opponents say they will push for a public referendum on the issue, which would intensify the debate.

Some residents here worry that the facilities would make the country a target if there was war. And the Iraq war has cooled public enthusiasm for close military cooperation with the United States, though it remains the most powerful ally of the Czech Republic and Poland.

In addition, emotional scars remain from communist days, when the Soviet Union operated a network of military bases here. Nobody is likening the United States to the country's former master, but the notion of a foreign power controlling a military base on their territory makes many people uncomfortable.

Some analysts are also concerned that bilateral agreements between NATO members will ultimately weaken the alliance. Lubomir Zaoralek, a leading member of the opposition Social Democrats, calls that his chief concern. "There would be no problem if it was a common strategy of NATO," he said.

One other issue is affecting the debate here: visas. At present, citizens of newer European Union member states, most of them from the former Soviet bloc, cannot visit the United States without visas, a fact that rankles many here.

Now, the United States is suddenly moving to change its visa-waiver law to admit people from countries considered good friends and reliable partners, Poland and the Czech Republic among them. All sides insist there is no quid pro quo for accommodation on the missile program.

But in remarks last week, Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg acknowledged the obvious: "These matters, of course, are not in principle interconnected. But the atmosphere in the Congress, when deciding on whether the Czech Republic is to be admitted in the program, can be substantially improved if we show we are a faithful ally of the U.S.A."

Lost in much of the discussion here is that the anti-missile system remains unproved after tens of billions of dollars of development work.

Assuming it worked, it would still be a chicken-and-egg game as to whether the system would enhance U.S. security, said Michael Codner, director of military sciences at the Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies, a British think tank.

"One could argue that the principle reason for Iran and North Korea having nuclear systems is precisely because they then render themselves much safer from invasion," he said, "bearing in mind that Iraq was invaded and North Korea never has been."

Plan To Revive Trade Talks Is Offered In Davos (NYT)

By Carter Dougherty

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 27 — Leading trade ministers on Saturday embraced an unusual game plan for reviving trade talks, saying they would try to hash out details on technical issues, rather than first agreeing on the broad outlines of an accord.

During a meeting at the World Economic Forum, officials from 30 countries including the United States, the European Union and emerging markets like India and Brazil vowed to move forward in the Doha round of World Trade Organization talks, which began more than five years ago in the Persian Gulf emirate of Qatar but collapsed in July because of disagreements about farm subsidies and tariff cuts. They hope to reach a deal within a year.

To resuscitate the talks, the ministers endorsed a strategy that is highly unusual in these negotiations, but now appears to offer the only chance to conclude the trade round. Instead of creating a framework for agreement and then working out details on technical issues like tariffs and subsidies later, countries will aim to work out most specifics up front. Then, they will decide whether a final push is warranted at a meeting of all World Trade Organization members in Geneva.

Pascal Lamy, the organization's director general, said the process would have to achieve a genuine breakthrough in "months, not quarters," for a meeting of all the group's members to occur. Apart from agriculture, it would also have to address tariff cuts for industrial products and services like finance and telecommunications.

After the Geneva meeting, Mr. Lamy said countries would tackle other, less contentious issues, including simplifying customs procedures, environmental rules and antidumping rules.

The W.T.O. negotiations would dovetail with a bid by the Bush administration to extend the United States trade negotiating authority that expires on June 30. Next week, President Bush will give two major addresses on economic policy calling on Congress to take that step, American officials said.

Blair Says G-8 Should Expand, Disagrees With Merkel (BLOOM)

By John Fraher

Bloomberg, January 28, 2007

Jan. 27 - U.K. Prime Minister Tony Blair said the Group of Eight industrialized nations should eventually expand to include countries such as China and India, putting him at odds with current G-8 head Angela Merkel.

``The G-8 is already well on its way to metamorphosis into G- 8 plus five," said Blair in a speech in Davos, Switzerland. ``At G-8 plus five it can be a forum for agreement between the most powerful nations with a true modern global reach. Sooner or later, the metamorphosis should be complete."

Politicians from the G-8 are debating whether to allow some of the world's fastest growing economies into their club and grant them a top table presence on talks ranging from foreign exchange policy to development aid. While Blair argued for expansion, Merkel rejected the idea in her opening address on Jan. 24.

``These countries have very different priorities" on issues such as carbon emissions and development, she said.

Blair, who said his speech today will be his last in Davos as prime minister, is running out of time to build a foreign policy legacy beyond the war in Iraq before he steps down later this year. He repeated a call made last May to fuse the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to strengthen the influence of emerging economies.

Merge IMF, World Bank

``There is a powerful case for merging the IMF and the World Bank and for increasing the influence of the developing countries within them," he said. ``A strong transatlantic push" to reform organizations such as the IMF and the World Bank is ``overdue."

Blair also said G-8 countries may be ``on the verge of a breakthrough" on climate change.

``The German G-8 Presidency gives us an opportunity to agree at least the principles of a new binding international agreement to come into effect when the Kyoto Protocol expires in 2001," according to Blair.

U.S. President George W. Bush's State of the Union speech on Jan. 23, in which he pledged to lower gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next decade, shows the ``mood in the U.S. is in the process of a quantum shift," said Blair.

3 Killed As Hamas And Fatah Fight On (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 27 — At least three more Palestinians were killed Saturday in Gaza in continuing battles between fighters loyal to Fatah and Hamas, which has been celebrating its victory a year ago over Fatah in legislative elections.

At least 14 Palestinians, including a 2-year-old boy, died Friday in daylong clashes and retaliatory attacks. The death toll has reached 20 since Thursday, with more than 65 people wounded, news agencies reported.

Those killed Saturday were identified as Mahmoud Khalil Khatib, 17, who appears to have been a student bystander, and two members of the security forces, Ibrahim al-Khalout, 25, and Mohammad Khattab, 33.

The fighting started near the Hamas Islamic University, the headquarters of the Fatah-dominated preventive security force in Gaza City and the Shifa Hospital a few blocks away.

Hamas, which leads the Palestinian Authority, said Friday that it was suspending new talks with the Fatah movement of the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, on forming a national unity government because of the violence. Mr. Abbas, who was at a conference in Switzerland and then in Spain, said he expected negotiations on a government to last at least another three weeks.

If the talks fail, Mr. Abbas said he would move to make good on his Dec. 16 call for early presidential and parliamentary elections, despite Hamas's victory a year ago. Hamas has labeled the call an attempted coup, and said it would resist or obstruct any new legislative elections.

Mr. Abbas went to Damascus, Syria, last week to meet with the Hamas political director, Khaled Meshal, who lives there in exile, and the two said they had made progress. But Hamas is insisting that the current prime minister, Ismail Haniya, remain in the job and that Hamas retain effective control of major ministries, including the Interior Ministry.

The latest talks between Hamas and Fatah started Tuesday. On Saturday, Tawfiq Abu Khoussa, a Fatah spokesman in Gaza, blamed Hamas for starting the latest mayhem. "We in Fatah did not stop the dialogue," he said. "Those who stopped the dialogue are required to return."

Hamas blamed Fatah, saying in a statement that the unity talks were close to an agreement "when putschists inside Fatah rushed to blow up the situation to serve their own interests and a foreign agenda."

The point of a new government would be to try to meet international requirements that the Palestinian Authority accept the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept previous Palestinian-Israeli agreements. Hamas has refused to do that, but has negotiated with Mr. Abbas for months over a political program for a government that could meet the standards and thus let Western budgetary aid resume.

The fight for power in Gaza between Fatah and Hamas has been intermittently bloody, with more than 30 people killed between mid-December and early January in urban fighting. Palestinians warned then of a possible civil war, though the factions tend to calm down after a spike in violence, in part because of growing popular disgust with the gunmen.

The United States is continuing to try to support Mr. Abbas and his loyal presidential guard with more than $80 million in what is supposed to be nonlethal aid. Washington, which will sponsor a meeting of Middle East diplomats on Feb. 2 before holding joint talks with Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, is trying to provide a "political horizon" for a peace settlement to the Palestinians, again to try to bolster Fatah, which supports a Palestinian state next to an independent Israel.

But the last year of isolation has not overthrown Hamas, though it is less popular. More important, Hamas is more firmly entrenched, having built a parallel paramilitary force in Gaza of nearly 6,000 men known as the Executive Force, which is loyal to the Hamas interior minister, Said Siam, not to Mr. Abbas.

In addition to the deaths since Thursday, nine members of Hamas and five members of Fatah were kidnapped in tit-for-tat abductions in Gaza and the occupied West Bank on Friday, and nine Hamas members were kidnapped in the northern village of Kafr Qalil by Fatah, security sources said.

Late on Friday, Hamas attacked the Gaza headquarters of the Preventive Security Service, a force dominated by Fatah, with mortars and rocket-propelled grenades. No injuries were reported. Grenades were also fired at the home of Rashid Abu Shbak of Fatah, who is in charge of internal security for the Palestinian Authority. The Gaza home of the Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar, the foreign minister, was also hit by grenades but no one was injured.

Mr. Haniya said in an interview published in the London Arabic newspaper Al Hayat that the long effort to negotiate the release of an Israeli soldier captured in June in return for Palestinian prisoners was “complex and difficult” and would require more work.

7 Dead On Day 3 Of Hamas-Fatah Conflict (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 28, 2007

Gunmen from the rival Hamas and Fatah movements battled in Gaza City for a third straight day Saturday, firing mortars and grenades in clashes that killed seven people in the increasingly bloody power struggle over the Palestinian government.

The deaths brought to 25 the number of Palestinians killed since late Thursday, with at least 68 people wounded and efforts to forge a coalition government at a standstill.

The latest fighting, which started late Thursday after a Hamas activist was killed in a bombing, has been among the deadliest in nearly two months of clashes.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, and a spokesman for President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, both appealed for calm. But after a brief lull, fighting flared up again.

In a clear jab at the moderate Abbas, Haniyeh criticized "troublemakers who are trying to veer away from the path of our people" by receiving "dirty American funding and arms." The White House is seeking some $85 million to help bolster Abbas' forces.

The violence has been fueled by Abbas' pledge to call early elections if the talks between Hamas and Fatah fail. Abbas, who is traveling in Europe, said this week he would move forward with his election plan if the coalition talks fail to produce results within three weeks.

Hamas, which defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections last year, opposes a new vote.

Streets in the hardest-hit neighborhoods were deserted Saturday, and only bakeries and grocery stores opened for business. Gaza City's main outdoor market was closed. Al Azhar University called off exams scheduled for Saturday, and the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry, which oversees several security forces, told its employees to go home.

Late Saturday night, a 12-year-old boy was killed and two people were wounded in the northern Gaza Strip during a shootout between Hamas and Fatah gunmen, witnesses and hospital officials said. One of the Hamas men was killed in the gunbattle, hospital officials said.

The boy's father, Baher Abu El-Karaya, a local Fatah leader, was injured in the battle. From his hospital bed, he told the Associated Press that Hamas gunmen attacked his home.

Two men were also killed in a car explosion north of Gaza City, Palestinian security officials said. The identities of the men were not immediately known.

A gun battle erupted Saturday near the Islamic University, killing one man, according to hospital officials. In a firefight elsewhere in the city, a Palestinian policeman was killed.

Before dawn Saturday, Hamas gunmen fired mortars at the Abbas-allied Preventive Security Service headquarters and at the home of the force's chief, Rashid Abu Shbak, officials said. The rocket fire started anew Saturday night.

In fighting around the compound on Friday, six Hamas gunmen were killed and a seventh died Saturday of wounds sustained in that battle, said Hamas spokesman Ayman Taha.

He accused Fatah loyalists of storming a mosque near the security headquarters and executing a senior Hamas activist inside while he was reading the Quran, the Muslim holy book. On Saturday, blood stains were still visible on the mosque's carpet and the bathroom tiles.

Fatah denied it had stormed the mosque, but said Hamas gunmen had used the mosque as a base for attacking the security headquarters.

At another Gaza City mosque, Hamas activists hung posters with photos of Hamas supporters killed or wounded in the fighting. "These are the criminal activities of the pro-Zionist, American criminals," the caption read, in reference to Fatah.

Mediators from two small factions, meanwhile, tried to win the release of hostages taken by the two sides. Late Saturday, seven Hamas activists and four Fatah members were freed in the southern town of Khan Younis, officials said.

Kidnappings have become a common tactic during the infighting. In all cases so far, hostages have been released unharmed. As of late Saturday, roughly a dozen people on each side remained in captivity, officials said.

Tensions have been high since Hamas swept parliamentary elections in January 2006, ending four decades of Fatah rule. Those tensions have frequently erupted into violence, killing some 50 people in Gaza since early December.

In its election campaign, Hamas promised to root out corruption and improve social services. But the Hamas-led government has been paralyzed by an international boycott and accomplished little on its agenda.

Israel and Western donors have cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in funding to the Palestinian government, demanding Hamas renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist. Hamas has rejected the conditions, despite deepening poverty in the West Bank and Gaza caused by the sanctions.

Seeking a way out of the crisis, Abbas has called on Hamas to join Fatah in a moderate coalition government. Abbas, who was elected separately, hopes a moderate platform will get the sanctions lifted and allow him to restart peace talks with Israel.

Both Fatah and Hamas officials said late Friday that unity talks would be suspended until the fighting ends. Both sides blamed each other for the breakdown.

Death Toll Mounts In Gaza Battles (BBC)

BBC.com, January 27, 2007

Deadly battles between rival Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah have continued in the Gaza Strip, leaving at least five more dead.

Saturday's deaths raise the toll since Thursday night to at least 22.

However, despite tension, the funerals for those killed on the previous day passed off peacefully on Saturday.

Clashes erupted in Gaza after weeks of relative calm and renewed efforts to form a national unity government. Both sides say they have suspended talks.

Those killed on Saturday included a boy of 11 or 12 who was hit during a shootout late at night between the two factions in the northern Gaza Strip.

Earlier at least one person died in a gun battle near Gaza's Islamic University, while another died in a car explosion - rumoured to be caused when explosives being carried in the vehicle exploded.

Kidnappings

Shops were shut up and the streets of Gaza City were almost empty on Saturday as people hid inside from the gangs of gunmen stalking the streets.

Members of Hamas and Fatah have fired mortars and grenades at each other and mounted tit-for-tat kidnappings.

Friday was one of the worst days of violence between Hamas and Fatah supporters since Hamas took control of the Palestinian administration a year ago, with at least 13 people reported killed.

Signs of spreading

Both sides blamed the other for the outbreak of violence, which followed a period of relative calm, in which both sides were thought to have been near joining a unity government.

"The unity government talks were on the verge of full agreement and the announcement of a unity government when putschists inside Fatah... rushed to blow up the situation to serve their own interests and a foreign agenda," said Hamas.

Funerals for those killed in the fighting were peaceful

Fatah spokesman Tawfiq Abu Khussa said: "It's clear that Hamas doesn't want the dialogue to succeed. The escalation began with Hamas."

Both sides said they were suspending talks.

The discord has been condemned by the Arab League, the Organisation of the Islamic Conference and Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, which said: "They speak responsible words and yet the fighting continues."

There has been intensive mediation by Egyptian diplomats to try to stop the bloodshed.

The UN's Middle East envoy Alvaro de Soto called on all the factions "to cease clashes and comply with international humanitarian law by refraining from acts which endanger civilians".

The violence also showed signs of spreading to the West Bank, where Palestinian police clashed with about 200 Hamas supporters.

Israel May Have Violated Arms Pact, U.S. Officials Say (NYT)

By David S. Cloud, Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan 27 — The Bush administration will inform Congress on Monday that Israel may have violated agreements with the United States when it fired American-supplied cluster munitions into southern Lebanon during its fight with Hezbollah last summer, the State Department said Saturday.

The finding, though preliminary, has prompted a contentious debate within the administration over whether the United States should penalize Israel for its use of cluster munitions against towns and villages where Hezbollah had placed its rocket launchers.

Cluster munitions are anti-personnel weapons that scatter tiny but deadly bomblets over a wide area. The grenadelike munitions, tens of thousands of which have been found in southern Lebanon, have caused 30 deaths and 180 injuries among civilians since the end of the war, according to the United Nations Mine Action Service.

Midlevel officials at the Pentagon and the State Department have argued that Israel violated American prohibitions on using cluster munitions against populated areas, according to officials who described the deliberations. But other officials in both departments contend that Israel's use of the weapons was for self-defense and aimed at stopping the Hezbollah rocket attacks that killed 159 Israeli citizens and at worst was only a technical violation.

Any sanctions against Israel would be an extraordinary move by the Bush administration, a strong backer of Israel, and several officials said they expected little further action, if any, on the matter.

But sanctions against Israel for misusing the weapons would not be unprecedented. The Reagan administration imposed a six-year ban on cluster-weapon sales to Israel in 1982, after a Congressional investigation found that Israel had used the weapons in civilian areas during its 1982 invasion of Lebanon. One option under discussion is to bar additional sales of cluster munitions for some period, an official said.

The State Department is required to notify Congress even of preliminary findings of possible violations of the Arms Export Control Act, the statute governing arms sales. It began an investigation in August.

Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said that the notification to Congress would occur Monday but that a final determination about whether Israel violated the agreements on use of cluster bombs was still being debated.

"It is important to remember the kind of war Hezbollah waged," he said. "They used innocent civilians as a way to shield their fighters."

Even if Israel is found to be in violation, the statute gives President Bush discretion about whether to impose sanctions, unless Congress decides to take legislative action. Israel makes its own cluster munitions, so a cutoff of American supplies would have mainly symbolic significance.

Israel gave the State Department a dozen-page report late last year in which it acknowledged firing thousands of American cluster munitions into southern Lebanon but denied violating agreements that prohibit their use in civilian areas, the officials said. The cluster munitions included artillery shells, rockets and bombs dropped from aircraft, many of which had been sold to Israel years ago, one official said.

Before firing at rocket sites in towns and villages, the Israeli report said, the Israeli military dropped leaflets warning civilians of the attacks. The report, which has not previously been disclosed, also noted that many of the villages were deserted because civilians had fled the fighting, the officials said.

David Siegel, a spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington, said Israel "provided a detailed response to the administration's request for information" on its use of cluster munitions "to halt Hezbollah's unprovoked rockets attacks against our civilian populations centers."

He added, "Israel suffered heavy casualties in these attacks and acted as any government would in exercise of its right to self-defense."

John Hillen, who was assistant secretary of state in charge of the bureau until he resigned this month, told Bloomberg News in December that Israel had provided "great cooperation" in the investigation. "From their perspective, use of the munitions was clearly done within the agreements," he said.

Another administration official said the investigation had caused "head-butting" involving the Bureau of Political-Military Affairs and the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, as well as Pentagon arms sales officials. Some officials "are trying to find a way to not have to call this a substantial violation," the official said.

In particular, the State Department has asked Israel for additional information on reports that commanders and troops violated orders that restricted how cluster bombs could be used, an official said. In November, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, the chief of staff of the Israeli military until his resignation on Jan. 17, ordered an investigation into whether restrictions on use of the weapons were ignored by some units.

That investigation is still under way, and military officials have refused to divulge any details in public.

Israel's Channel 2 television reported in December that the military's judge advocate general was gathering evidence for possible criminal charges against military officers who might have ordered cluster bombs fired into populated areas.

Israel has told the State Department that it originally tried targeted strikes against Hezbollah rocket sites, but those proved ineffective.

Heavy use of cluster bombs was tried instead, to kill or maim Hezbollah fighters manning the launchers. Israeli commanders employed cluster weapons because they suspected that they would flee after firing their rockets. Even those attacks failed to stop the rockets barrages.

The agreements that govern Israel's use of American cluster munitions go back to the 1970s. But the details, which have been revised several times, are classified.

However, officials said that the agreements specified that cluster weapons could not be used in populated areas, in part because of the risk to civilians after a conflict is over if the bomblets fail to self-destruct, as they are designed to do.

The agreements said the munitions be used only against organized armies and clearly defined military targets under conditions similar to the Arab-Israeli wars of 1967 and 1973, when Israel arguably faced threats to its survival, officials said.

Since the end of last summer's war, de-mining team have located 800 cluster-bomb strike areas, and they destroyed 95,000 bomblets, said Christopher Clark, program manager for the United Nations Mine Action Service in Lebanon.

"We found them pretty much everywhere — in villages, at road junctions, in olive groves and on banana plantations," Mr. Clark said.

The casualty rate has come down sharply, he said. Right after the war, there were more than 40 casualties a week; now it is about 3 or 4 a week.

Donatella Rovera, a researcher with Amnesty International in London, said older American cluster weapons used by Israel during the war did not reliably self-destruct, compared with Israel's own cluster munitions, which are newer and are said to have a much lower dud rate.

"We've asked them to release detailed maps on where the cluster bombs were used," Ms. Rovera said of the Israeli military. "That is the one thing that could help speed up the cleanup process."

U.S. State Dept. Report To Address Possible Arms Violations By Israel (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The State Department has completed a preliminary report on whether Israel misused American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas of Lebanon.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said Saturday that the report would be forwarded to Congress on Monday but declined to disclose the findings, emphasizing that they were preliminary.

"We take our obligations under the Arms Control Act seriously," Cooper said. "Our forwarding to Congress of a preliminary assessment is an indication of that.

"The Israeli government is also taking quite seriously their responsibility in providing information. We are not making a final judgment."

The State Department is required to notify Congress of even preliminary findings of possible violations of the arms act.

The New York Times reported online Saturday evening that the report would say Israel might have violated agreements with the United States by its use of American-supplied cluster munitions during last year's conflict.

The paper described disagreement among midlevel officials at the Defense Department and the State Department, with some in both departments arguing that Israel violated U.S. prohibitions on using cluster munitions against population areas. Others in both departments argued that the weapons were used in self-defense to stop Hezbollah rocket attacks and that, at worst, only a technical violation might have occurred.

A congressional investigation found Israel improperly used U.S.-made cluster bombs during its 1982 invasion of Lebanon. The Reagan administration then imposed a six-year ban on further sales of the weapons to Israel.

Such sanctions are largely symbolic, however, since Israel also makes its own cluster munitions.

The United Nations said unexploded cluster bombs — anti-personnel weapons that spray bomblets over a wide area — litter homes, gardens and highways in southern Lebanon.

Relief organizations and the U.N. mine office have reported finding evidence that Israel used three types of U.S.-made cluster bombs during the 34-day battle with Hezbollah militants, during which both sides fired rockets into populated areas.

Saving Lebanon (NYT)

It is good that international donors have pledged $7.6 billion to help rebuild Lebanon after last summer's devastating Israeli air strikes. The democratically elected government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora needs all the help it can get. Clashes between Shiite supporters of Hezbollah and the government's mainly Sunni supporters threaten to overwhelm Mr. Siniora's fragile coalition.

If not contained, they could even reignite Lebanon's catastrophic civil war. Lebanon's fundamental problem is the archaic and unfair political system that divides the country's top offices among rival and distrustful religious communities. Lebanon's large and impoverished Shiite minority, long a major loser in this system, has been increasingly radicalized — straight into the arms of Hezbollah.

Hezbollah has a political party in Parliament, political gangsters on Beirut's streets and a heavily armed militia whose attacks on Israel provoked last summer's destruction. Hezbollah also has close links to Iran, which supplies its weapons and cash, and Syria, which provides safe passage for those weapons and more. Any plan for stabilizing Lebanon has to face up to this dynamic. That's why the Bush administration needs to drop its stubborn resistance to diplomacy with Syria — and try to coax Damascus away from both Iran and Hezbollah.

Washington must make clear that Lebanon's sovereignty is not negotiable. Nor will there be any bargaining over the United Nations investigation into the 2005 assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri — and Syria's all but certain complicity. When treated as an important regional actor, Syria has at times responded constructively. It has always responded destructively to isolation. Engaging Syria may not work. But ignoring it all but guarantees that even $7.6 billion in aid will not be enough to stabilize Lebanon.

Saudi Officials Seek To Temper The Price Of Oil (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

Saudi Arabia, which benefited immensely from record oil prices last year, has sent signals in the past two weeks that it is committed to keeping oil at around $50 a barrel — down $27 a barrel from the summer peak that shook consumers across the developed world.

The indications came in typically cryptic fashion for the oil-rich kingdom. In Tokyo last week, Ali al-Naimi, the Saudi oil minister, said Saudi Arabia's policy was to maintain "moderate prices." The previous week, on a stop in New Delhi, he effectively put his veto on an emergency meeting of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries to prop up prices after oil briefly dropped below $50 a barrel, the lowest level in nearly two years.

The events that propelled oil prices above $77 a barrel last July, then dragged them down again, were beyond the control of any single producer. Still, Saudi Arabia, which is by far the largest oil producer within OPEC and sets the cartel's agenda, is seeking to avoid a repeat of the dramatic rise in prices while trying to put a floor beneath them.

Nowhere was last summer's spike in oil prices felt more profoundly than in the United States. As gasoline rose above $3 a gallon, consumers cut their spending elsewhere, tamping down profits in retail, travel and other industries. United States automakers were devastated as consumers fled from large vehicles to smaller ones, which have historically been the specialty of the Japanese; on Thursday, Ford said that 2006 had been the worst year in its history.

The recent slide back to $50 a barrel for oil — which translates to about $2 for a gallon of gasoline — has eased the pressure on the domestic economy, quieting talk that oil prices and the declining housing market would lead to a recession.

The Saudis appear to be rediscovering that painfully high energy prices take a profound toll on the global economy, which in turn reduces demand for their oil. But other motives seem to be at work, too, including the Saudis' desire to restrain Iran's ambitions in the region.

How much influence the United States has exerted is an open question. Vice President Dick Cheney met with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia in Riyadh in November, but his office would not say if oil was discussed. The White House has been supportive of Saudi energy policy, and President Bush and his father are close with Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi national security minister and former ambassador to Washington.

Although Saudi officials say their oil policy is based on market considerations and not political ones, the meeting in November led to renewed speculation that the kingdom might be tempted to dry out Iran's ambitions by pushing oil prices down. Prices have already been falling because of mild weather and slowing demand.

Prices at $50 to $55 a barrel are just about right for the Saudis, according to Saudi energy officials — not too high to hurt the global economy, not too low to hurt their own economy. Last year's record highs meant that the growth in global oil demand slowed to 1 percent in 2006, compared with a 4 percent increase at its peak in 2004.

But 2006 was not the first reminder for the Saudis that too-high prices can backfire. The oil shocks of the 1970s and 1980s also set off a scramble for gas-sipping cars and a brief push to wean the West from its oil dependency. In recent months, the higher prices have rekindled America's quest for alternatives and propelled energy security to the top of the agenda in the United States and Europe.

Even President Bush, who began his presidency emphasizing the need to increase domestic oil production rather than cutting consumption, called for a reduction in gasoline use over the next decade in last week's State of the Union address.

High prices have also emboldened rivals within OPEC, among them Iran and Venezuela, which have used their oil revenue to prop up their governments and export their more radical agendas. Saudi Arabia has worked cooperatively with Iran since the late 1990s, when oil producers were panicked by the decline of prices to around $10 a barrel. More recently, Iran has favored rising prices over the moderation that Saudi Arabia seeks. Venezuela also tends to favor higher prices but wields less political influence in the cartel.

"High prices are not in the interest of Saudi Arabia," said Sadek Boussena, a former OPEC president from Algeria. "We've all seen what $70 does: it attracts alternatives, it reduces demand. On the other hand, I don't think the Saudis want oil below $50. They need the revenue."

The Bush administration has repeatedly acknowledged Saudi Arabia's efforts in trying to moderate prices. "Buyers and sellers have a common interest in maintaining reasonable prices for oil," Samuel Bodman, the energy secretary, said in October.

There is no set formula for setting oil prices. In the 1980s, the market settled on around $18 a barrel as a fair price. In the 1990s, it was ratcheted up to $22 to $25 a barrel. Recently, oil producers have realized they can charge twice that amount, although consuming nations complain that the price is too high.

Mr. Naimi, the Saudi oil minister, borrowing the manner of a careful central banker, is rarely explicit about his plans. His every word is dissected by legions of analysts for the slightest hint of an inflection in policy.

Sometimes, the uncertainty gives rise to more conspiratorial theories. Oil traders have been buzzing in recent weeks about whether Saudi Arabia was seeking to depress oil markets in hopes of crippling Iran's economy, as a Saudi analyst — albeit not one from the government — suggested late last year in an opinion article in The Washington Post. The Saudis quickly dismissed the claim, but given the tensions in the Middle East, oil and politics remain closely linked.

"It is difficult to work out what the Saudis really want, since they never say things explicitly," said Leo Drollas, the chief economist at the Center for Global Energy Studies, a London-based research group founded by Sheik Ahmed Zaki Yamani, a former Saudi oil minister. Sometimes, he said, "you have to read between the lines."

The Saudi government does not disclose what oil price it uses when it builds its budget, but analysts at Samba Financial Group, a bank in Saudi Arabia, say they believe the price is $42 a barrel for 2007, with oil production at about 9 million barrels a day. With oil averaging $66 a barrel last year, the kingdom recorded a budget surplus of nearly $71 billion, Samba said, five times more than in 2005.

Saudi officials repeatedly point out that they do not set the price of oil on international commodity markets — they point the finger at hedge funds and other speculative traders for the heightened volatility in recent years. Nor, they say, do they run their oil industry with political considerations in mind.

Mr. Naimi has led the ascent of oil prices since 2000 and managed his various partners within OPEC toward better discipline within the cartel. Last fall, under Saudi stewardship, OPEC members twice agreed to cut their output to prevent prices from falling too steeply.

More than any specific target, the Saudis have always sought stability in oil prices. But stability may prove just as elusive this year as it did last year, given how vulnerable global oil supplies remain to the vagaries of the weather as well as political turmoil in the Middle East and Africa.

Although OPEC's 12 members decide by unanimous votes whether to increase oil production — which lowers prices by making supply more plentiful — consumer pressures ultimately hold sway, and an extremely cold winter followed by a very hot summer could override whatever price goals the Saudis have set.

Not everyone is reading the Saudis' recent public signals — scant as they are — in the same way. "The Saudi policy has not changed," said Roger Diwan, an energy analyst at PFC Energy. The Saudis, he said, have "led the way in managing the market. They showed leadership in OPEC."

But Amy Myers Jaffe, the associate director of Rice University's energy program, said she thought that Saudi policy had shifted, backing away from a defense of higher prices.

"The debate in Saudi Arabia is about what is the right strategy, where demand is headed, and what is the right amount of investments," she said. "And that's a very tough question."

Pelosi, U.S. Congressional Delegation Meets President Musharraf In Pakistan (AP)

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — House Speaker Nancy Pelosi arrived in Pakistan Saturday for talks with the country's president expected to touch on cooperation against Taliban and al-Qaeda militants and U.S. aid to the South Asian country, officials said.

Neither the U.S. delegation nor President Gen. Pervez Musharraf was scheduled to make any public comment after the meeting, which coincides with concern in Pakistan about a U.S. bill that would link American aid for Pakistan's military with its commitment to combating resurgent Taliban militants.

The bill, introduced this month after Democrats took control of Congress, would require President Bush to certify that Islamabad is doing its utmost to counter Taliban operations in Pakistan and secure its border with Afghanistan.

Failure to do that would cut off some financial aid to Pakistan's military, though the president could waive the provision in the interests of national security.

The Senate has yet to consider it, and U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State John Gastright said Friday in Islamabad that the Bush administration wanted the provision removed.

Gastright said Pelosi's decision to visit Pakistan with her first congressional delegation showed that she shared the administration's interest in close ties with Pakistan and its military president.

"We'll want to work with her (Pelosi) so that she realizes that that provision is not necessary," Gastright said.

15 Die In Blast Near Pakistani Shiite Mosque (WP/AP)

By Riaz Khan

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Jan. 27 -- A suicide attacker detonated a bomb among police on guard near a Shiite mosque in this northern Pakistani city Saturday, killing at least 15 people and wounding more than 30, police said.

The attack came as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) led a U.S. congressional delegation to Islamabad, the capital about 90 miles east, where they spoke with Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, about the situation in neighboring Afghanistan, a Pakistani official said.

The meeting took place less than three weeks after the House passed legislation that would link U.S. military aid to Pakistan's commitment to combating Taliban guerrillas -- a measure some feared could strain relations between the two nations, allies in the fight against terrorism.

Musharraf condemned the "terrorist attack" in Peshawar and ordered an immediate inquiry, the state-run Associated Press of Pakistan reported.

The explosion came as Pakistan's minority Shiites started to commemorate their most important religious festival, Ashura, often an impetus for sectarian violence. Paramilitary forces in armored vehicles were deployed to patrol Peshawar after the bombing.

The blast went off in a bazaar area about 200 yards from a mosque that was the starting point for a Shiite procession.

Most of the victims were police and municipal officials who were clearing the route for the procession. The city's police chief, Malik Saab, was among the dead, the provincial police chief said.

There was no immediate assertion of responsibility, but suspicion was likely to fall on Sunni extremists.

Most Shiites and Sunnis in Pakistan coexist peacefully, but militant groups on both sides are blamed for sectarian attacks that claim scores of lives every year.

Some fear the relentless sectarian fighting in Iraq risks igniting Sunni-Shiite tensions in other Muslim countries.

Bombing Kills 14 Pakistanis (NYT)

By Ismail Khan

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Jan. 27 — At least 14 people were killed, most of them policemen, and several others were wounded Saturday in what appeared to be a suicide bombing here shortly before a Shiite religious procession was to come through, the police said.

The police said the incident occurred in the old part of Peshawar, the capital of North-West Frontier Province, late in the evening, as police and city workers were clearing a narrow street near a Shiite mosque to make way for the procession. Among the dead were the city police chief, Malik Muhammad Saad, and several government representatives from the neighborhood, the police said.

The police said they believed the attack was by a lone suicide bomber who detonated his explosives after being stopped by a police cordon at the mouth of the street. The remains of a person the police thought was the bomber had been sent for forensic analysis, and the search for more evidence continued, said Ghulam Muhammad, a police official in the city.

The Edhi Foundation, a charity group that runs ambulance services, said it had taken at least 14 bodies to a local hospital, where people had thronged to give blood donations for the wounded.

The explosion also damaged the local power network, plunging the entire area into darkness as police and local volunteers searched for the dead and wounded.

Security in Peshawar was already on alert after a suicide bombing outside a Marriott hotel in Islamabad on Friday and in preparation for Ashura, one of Shiite Islam's holiest days.

But the leader of the province's religious government, Akram Khan Durrani, told reporters that precautions would be further increased.

DOJ_NMG_0123582

Still, the police said there was little any one could do to head off a determined suicide bomber.

“How do you know who is the suicide bomber among a multitude of people?” a policeman said at the scene.

Pakistan Bombing Kills 14 People (BBC)

BBC.com, January 27, 2007

A bomb blast in Pakistan's north-west city of Peshawar has killed at least 14 people - mostly policemen including two senior officers - officials say.

At least 30 others were injured by the explosion just as a Shia religious procession was about to start.

Initial indications point to a suicide bombing, officials say.

This is the second deadly blast in Pakistan in two days. On Friday, a suicide bomber blew himself up at an Islamabad hotel, also killing a guard.

Peshawar chief of police Malik Saad and the city's deputy superintendent were among the dead.

Security forces have been on high alert ahead of the annual Shia festival of Ashoura, commemorating the 7th Century martyrdom of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson.

In recent years Sunni extremists have targeted Shias during this period, says the BBC's Barbara Plett in Islamabad.

There have also been threats of retaliation following government strikes against militants in the nearby tribal areas.

'In a bad way'

Most of the victims were police and municipal officials clearing the route for a Shia procession, officer Aziz Khan - who was on duty nearby - told AP news agency.

"I was shocked by a big explosion. I thought my eardrums had burst. Then there were flames and the people were in panic.

Troops have been on high alert ahead of a Shia religious festival

"I remembered that there was a police contingent, so I went to see what had happened to my colleagues. Many were wounded in a bad way," he said.

Blood and flesh were splattered over the narrow lane where the blast took place, and there was broken glass from shop fronts underfoot as police scoured the site.

It is not clear whether the attack was aimed at the worshippers or the police.

Power was cut in the city centre shortly after the blast, complicating rescue efforts.

Hundreds of people rushed to hospitals, hoping for news of their loved ones.

President Pervez Musharraf strongly condemned the attack and expressed condolences to the victims' families.

Pakistan Mosque Bombing Kills Police Chief, Officers (LAT)

By Zulfiqar Ali, Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

PESHAWAR, PAKISTAN — An apparent suicide bombing killed at least 13 people Saturday in this volatile frontier city, a day after a suicide attack killed a bomber and a hotel security guard in the Pakistani capital.

It was not immediately clear whether the attack in Peshawar, which came at an event marking the year's most important Shiite Muslim holiday, was an act of sectarian violence or was aimed at police and paramilitary forces guarding the event. Nearly all the dead were reported to be police officers, including the city's police chief.

Scores of people were wounded in the powerful blast, which took place near one of the city's largest mosques before the start of an evening Shiite procession to commemorate the holy day of Ashura.

Adding to the chaos, a power failure apparently caused by the explosion plunged the area into darkness. Rescuers groped in the dark, guided by the cries and moans of the injured.

Several of the wounded were reported to be in critical condition.

President Pervez Musharraf issued a statement denouncing the blast as a terrorist attack. Provincial authorities convened an emergency meeting to discuss ways to prevent further violence.

Police said they could not confirm that it had been a suicide attack, but that the dismembered condition of one of the bodies suggested that explosives had been strapped to it.

The explosion came despite extremely tight security in Peshawar's city center in connection with Ashura, which has frequently been a time of violence between Pakistan's majority Sunnis and minority Shiites. Angry Shiites poured into the streets after the attack, calling for revenge.

The attack occurred as a U.S. congressional delegation led by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) was visiting Islamabad, the capital, about 90 miles east of Peshawar. The delegation held discussions with Musharraf centering on Pakistan's role in fighting the insurgency in neighboring Afghanistan.

On Friday, a bomber carried out a rare suicide attack in Islamabad, targeting a luxury hotel frequented by diplomats and foreigners. But the attacker was prevented from entering the Marriott by a security guard, who was killed along with the bomber.

No claim of responsibility was issued for the attack, which took part in a high-security zone of the capital that is the site of many government offices.

Ashura, which is Monday or Tuesday, is the climax of a 10-day mourning period for Shiites that begins the Islamic month of Muharram.

It is a time when devout Shiites engage in fervent and emotional displays of faith, sometimes whipping them- selves with chains or swords, to commemorate the slaying of Imam Hussein, a grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

U.S. Citizens Killed In Kenya (NYT)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 27 — Two Americans, including an elderly woman, were shot to death on Saturday afternoon by carjackers in Nairobi, the capital, according to American and Kenyan officials.

The two victims, relatives of an American Embassy employee, were traveling in an embassy car with three other Americans when a truck cut them off, police officials said. Four men jumped out with Kalashnikov assault rifles and ordered the occupants out of their car.

“Apparently, the driver and an elderly woman sitting in front did not move fast enough,” a police spokesman said. “So the bandits shot them.”

Nairobi has been plagued by violent crime, and American officials said they did not believe the attack was related to terrorism.

Police: Carjackers Fatally Shoot 2 Women In U.S. Embassy Car In Kenya (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — Gunmen carjacked a U.S. Embassy vehicle on the outskirts of the Kenyan capital Saturday afternoon and killed two female relatives of an embassy employee, officials said. Police later killed two people involved in the carjacking.

The victims were the wife and mother-in-law of a U.S. Embassy employee, embassy spokesman Robert Kerr said, without providing further details.

"This a horrible event," he said. "These were people who loved Kenya."

The gunmen "ordered the two women out but they hesitated," said Isaiah Osugo, a criminal investigations officer in Nairobi. "Then they were shot."

Kenyan police later killed two people involved in the carjackings, police spokesman Gideon Kibunja said. He could not immediately provide more details.

Officials withheld the women's names.

Francis Munyambu, Nairobi's deputy provisional police officer, said the carjackers escaped with the embassy vehicle and were armed with Kalashnikov assault rifles.

Earlier in the day, the men had carjacked Michael Madine along the same road, according to police and Madine. Madine spoke to The Associated Press at the scene after being interviewed by police.

"Four men with AK-47s carjacked me," he said in Swahili. He said one of the carjackers stayed in the car with him while the others attacked the embassy vehicle.

"I heard one of the women screaming and then I heard three gunshots," Madine said. The carjackers then fled, he said.

The shooting happened just off a highway in Kinoo, about 20 kilometers (12 miles) outside Nairobi. An Associated Press reporter at the scene saw two pools of blood on the roadside.

Shortly after Munyambu's news conference, two men who identified themselves only as officials from the U.S. Embassy ordered reporters to leave the scene and took journalists' pictures, threatening to ban them from the embassy.

Carjackings are common in and around Nairobi, but Saturday's attack was unusually brazen because it took place during the day. In September, the chief U.S. military attache was shot and seriously wounded in a carjacking in Nairobi. Russia's ambassador was stabbed in a robbery on Aug. 20. A month earlier, a Danish diplomat was attacked and robbed.

Kenya's government spokesman, Alfred Mutua, said officials believe Saturday's violence was "a random attack." He did not provide further details.

Sudan's Peace Deal, Seen As A Bush Success, Is Endangered (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

DOJ_NMG_0123584

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

A peace agreement that two years ago ended Africa's longest-running conflict -- and that the White House considers one of President Bush's signature achievements -- is in danger of unraveling because of inattention by top U.S. officials and growing tensions between Sudan's government and the former rebels who signed the deal, according to experts and congressional officials.

The two-decade civil war, which pitted the Islamic government in the north against rebels based in the mostly animist and Christian south, left 2 million people dead, primarily from famine and disease, and 4 million homeless. Christian evangelical groups -- a key part of Bush's political base -- had pressed hard for a resolution, and the administration made a peace agreement one of its top diplomatic priorities.

Last month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cited the peace deal -- under which the southern part of the country would receive religious and political autonomy and a share of Sudan's oil riches -- when she was asked what Bush would be remembered for besides Iraq. "He should be known for having contributed vitally to stopping the civil war between southern and northern Sudan," Rice said.

But now experts warn that the Khartoum government's unwillingness to abide by the terms of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) could lead to a new outbreak of war. "The CPA is eroding," said Roger Winter, a former State Department official who was involved in the negotiations. "It is not dead by any means, but it is eroding and Khartoum wants it to erode." He said he sees signs that the Sudanese government is no longer interested in the peace deal and has taken steps to prepare for another conflict.

Many experts said the administration, distracted by war in the Middle East and an unrelated conflict in Sudan's Darfur region, has failed to recognize the peril lurking in the south. (Similarly, many now believe that the administration let the Darfur conflict spiral out of control in 2003 because it was so focused on reaching a peace accord in the south.)

Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), a leading force in Congress on Sudan, said, "The bench over at the State Department is very shallow now" -- virtually all the experts on Sudan have left in the past year -- and the administration is "preoccupied with other issues."

Bush in September appointed a special envoy to Sudan, Andrew S. Natsios, but Natsios has mainly focused on Darfur, where as many as 450,000 people have died in what the administration labels a campaign of genocide by the Sudanese government.

"They have Natsios dealing with Darfur, but they have no one dealing with the south," said Rep. Donald M. Payne (D-N.J.), chairman of the Africa subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. He said the administration should appoint a special envoy specifically to make sure the north-south peace deal does not collapse.

A senior administration official involved in Africa affairs, speaking on the condition of anonymity in order to speak freely, said the administration has kept its focus on both Darfur and the situation in south Sudan. But he acknowledged that there are legitimate concerns. "There has been significant movement on the CPA, and you don't want to undersell that," he said. "But we have been disappointed with the pace of progress."

The conflict between the north and the south extends back half a century, since shortly after Sudan's independence in 1956. A 1972 accord helped usher in a decade of peace, but a civil war erupted in 1983 after the Sudanese government abrogated the pact and tried to impose Islamic law, or sharia. The discovery of vast oil reserves, mainly in the south, has exacerbated the struggle.

Under the peace agreement, which was signed in a joyous celebration in a Nairobi stadium two years ago, sharia will apply to the Arab north but not to the African south. The south is to have a six-year interim period of self-rule, after which it will vote in a referendum on whether to remain part of Sudan or secede.

But negotiators hoped that the deal would keep Sudan intact, with the prospect of secession by the south intended to put pressure on the government to uphold its end of the bargain. In a carefully negotiated compromise, an autonomous government is to emerge in the south while new national institutions are created.

But the rebel leader John Garang was killed in a helicopter crash shortly after he became first vice president of Sudan in July 2005. His successor, Salva Kiir Mayardit, lashed out at the Khartoum government this month during a second-anniversary celebration of the accord, accusing it of continuing to bankroll militias in the south, refusing to share oil wealth and stalling on border agreements.

As a visibly angry President Omar Hassan al-Bashir sat on the dais, Kiir pleaded to "give peace a chance." Asking whether the leaders had worked toward making the unity of the government attractive, Kiir declared: "The answer is regrettably no! Problems, serious problems still remain to be resolved."

Bashir then fired back with his own accusations, saying that delays and problems are the fault of the rebels, not the government. The unusually public spat focused renewed attention on the sputtering accord.

Barnaba Benjamin, minister for regional development in the government of south Sudan, told a House Foreign Affairs panel last week that "the country can break up unless the CPA is implemented in spirit and in letter."

Winter said that an area known as Abyei, between the northern and southern parts of Sudan, is a particular source of tension. Under the peace agreement, Abyei, which has a huge oil field, can vote in 2011 on whether to be part of the north or the south. But Bashir has rejected the findings of a boundary commission and has refused to allow the creation of a local government, convincing the local population that war will break out again in the territory. Winter faulted the administration for failing to publicly pressure Khartoum on this critical issue.

Though Garang was long an advocate of Sudanese unity, his death and the Darfur disaster have made it increasingly likely that the south Sudanese will vote overwhelmingly for independence, according to focus group surveys conducted by the National Democratic Institute.

Winter said Khartoum appears ready to break the peace deal before the election takes place, so the administration needs to help the south prepare for independence.

The administration official acknowledged that south Sudan is moving toward independence. "We have to plan for that," he said. "The idea behind the CPA was that there would be a transformation of Sudan, that it would become a responsible player in the international community. Many south Sudanese would say they have not seen that."

A Choice For Darfur (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland

Over the next two days, African leaders will convene in Ethiopia and choose a new head of the African Union. Incredibly, that job may go to Sudan's blood-drenched president, Omar al-Bashir, architect of the genocide in Darfur.

The outcome is still uncertain, with Sudan campaigning furiously for the job, but it's mind-boggling that African countries would even consider selecting as their leader a man who has systematically dispatched militias that pick out babies on the basis of tribe and skin color and throw them into bonfires.

At a time when Africa is enjoying solid economic growth and improved leadership, this self-inflicted wound would sully Africa's image and make it far more difficult for African Union peacekeepers to save lives in Darfur.

Mr. Bashir hasn't confined himself to killing his own people, but has also sent his janjaweed militias to invade Chad and the Central African Republic. The janjaweed have beaten mothers with their own babies, until the infants are dead, and lately they have diversified into gouging out people's eyes with bayonets. For anyone who wants the best for Africa, it is repulsive to think of President Bashir as the duly elected spokesman for the continent.

One reason Mr. Bashir has continued to engage in such behavior is that the world doesn't seriously object. Almost all North African countries are backing his bid to chair the African Union. China, which supplies nearly all the AK-47s that are used to kill children in Darfur, has underwritten the genocide. Lately, it has encouraged Sudan to be more responsible, but President Hu Jintao is visiting Sudan shortly — let's see whether he publicly expresses concern about Chinese-supported atrocities in Africa that far exceed the Rape of Nanjing.

Sudan promised a cease-fire, but instead it has been attacking aid workers. As Newsweek reported, at least four female aid workers have been beaten and sexually abused recently — raped in the case of two French women.

In addition, an aid worker in Sudan tells me that on Jan. 22 the police raided a party in the city of Nyala and arrested 22 employees of aid groups. Several were beaten and one woman was sexually abused but managed to fend off an attempted rape.

Broader security is also collapsing. On a road near Bulbul that used to be safe, gunmen stopped a public bus in the middle of the day and brutally beat the men and gang-raped the women for hours. In the face of all this, aid workers are jittery and some are pulling out.

Yet Europe is oblivious (the Davos conference here has great sessions on Africa but nothing on Darfur). President Bush has been better than most world leaders, but still pathetic: he mustered half a sentence in his State of the Union address. Perhaps this is because Mr. Bush regards the situation as tragic but hopeless, but in fact there is plenty he could do.

He could speak out forcefully about Darfur. He could bring victims to the White House for a photo op. He could help the U.N. send a force to protect Chad and the Central African Republic — while continuing to push for U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur itself. He could visit Darfur or Chad and invite European or Chinese officials to join him. He could invite African leaders to Washington for a summit meeting that would include discussion of Darfur. He could impose a no-fly zone. He could develop targeted sanctions against Sudanese leaders. He could begin forensic accounting to find assets of those leaders in Western countries. He could call on NATO and the Pentagon to prepare contingency plans in case the janjaweed start massacring the hundreds of thousands of Darfuris in camps.

And this weekend he could telephone a few African presidents to tell them what a catastrophe it would be if Africa chose Mr. Bashir as its leader.

Serious negotiations between the government and Darfur's rebels are crucial for a lasting peace deal in Darfur, and new discussions are expected soon (that may be why President Hu dares visit Khartoum). But Mudawi Ibrahim Adam, a Sudanese human rights leader, says the new talks will fail unless the Darfur rebels have a chance to consult first. And when they try to meet, the Sudanese government bombs them.

A Useful Rebuke On Rights (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

When Desmond Tutu speaks out about morality in politics and foreign policy, his nation and the rest of the world should listen. By criticizing the government he helped bring into being, the South African Nobel laureate raises in his own distinctive fashion some of the key issues of our time.

Tutu, along with Nelson Mandela, has been instrumental in guiding South Africa's peaceful and democratic transition from the tyranny of a white minority to black majority rule. Over four decades, Tutu has established a reputation for integrity, wisdom and fairness that has few equals on the world stage.

The retired archbishop of Cape Town also speaks his mind. He did so after his government offered diplomatic comfort to Burma's oppressive military regime on Jan. 12. That was when South Africa cast its first vote as a nonpermanent member of the U.N. Security Council to block a resolution condemning Burma for flagrant human rights abuses. The resolution also drew vetoes from Russia and China, which are determined to avoid scrutiny of their own actions to crush dissent.

"I am deeply disappointed by our vote. It is a betrayal of our own noble past," Tutu said in an e-mail to the Associated Press. "If others had used the arguments we are using today when we asked them for their support against apartheid, we might still have been unfree."

The government claims that it voted on "technical" grounds to give a pass to Burma (also known as Myanmar) because that country does not qualify as "a threat to international peace." In other words: Not our problem, man.

But Tutu rightly suggests that because of its history, post-apartheid South Africa has a special responsibility to pursue a foreign policy that supports international action to help oppressed populations.

South Africa is a rare example where international economic pressure and censure helped to halt gross racial discrimination and human rights violations and to bring positive change. Sanctions and international ostracism of the apartheid government worked in ways they did not on the oil-producing police state of Saddam Hussein's Iraq and in other places. While South Africans deserve primary credit for deciding collectively to transform their country, Tutu is characteristically forthright in pointing to the help they received -- and should now be prepared to extend to others in distant lands.

His plea also underlines the stunning failure of President Thabo Mbeki's government to slow the slide of neighboring Zimbabwe into misery and tyranny under the paranoid rule of Robert Mugabe, or to show compassion to its own citizens suffering with AIDS. Mbeki's African National Congress risks being judged by history as having given back little once in power.

Tutu swings a needed spotlight on the evolving role of moral causes in foreign policy, a subject Americans have been debating episodically since Jimmy Carter ordered his State Department to make human rights a priority, with mixed results. The U.S. debate has taken on new urgency as fresh approaches to Iraq are sought by both President Bush and his critics.

Tutu is obviously not part of that discussion. But his broader point is: Our debate cannot be conducted honestly without reference to the moral responsibility toward Iraqis that past U.S. actions have created for us as a nation. Just as South Africans should be guided by the recent past, Americans must recall their government's history with Iraq.

It is a history of fomenting and then betraying successive uprisings by Kurds and Shiites against the genocidal regime in Baghdad and of offering aid and succor to that regime in its war against Iran. It is a history of more than a decade of limited warfare and economic sanctions that helped grind Iraqi society to dust even before the invasion of 2003.

For better and for worse, President Bush has pursued a values-based foreign policy that is being widely criticized for ignoring U.S. national interests. The disasters of Iraq are driving the pendulum of American opinion back to an interests-based or "realistic" foreign policy that would blank out the heavy responsibilities of history.

But the pursuit of interests to the exclusion of values is no more sustainable in a democratic society than is the pursuit of values to the exclusion of interests. Democratic governments must establish a judicious balance.

Bush has failed to underpin his narrowly American approach to values with a persuasive appeal to international moral standards and conscience. Desmond Tutu's reproach to his own government is a cogent reminder of the perils and ignominy that such failure brings.

Despite Crackdown, Migrants Stream Into South Mexico (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

TAPACHULA, Mexico — Four Salvadoran men in jeans and T-shirts trudged along the railroad tracks under a hot sun, their steps carrying them steadily toward a fuzzy but seductive dream.

They had been in Mexico for only a few hours and already federal police officers had forced them to strip and had taken almost all their cash, they said. They had some 1,500 miles to go to reach the United States border, with no food or water and $9 each.

They intended to walk along the Chiapas coast for the first 250 miles through a dozen towns where migrants are regularly robbed or raped. Then they planned to clamber aboard a freight train with hundreds of other immigrants for the trip north, a dangerous journey that has left hundreds before them maimed after they fell under the wheels.

"It's dangerous, yes, one risks one's life," said one of the men, Noé Hernández. "One risks it if you have a family member in the States to help you. It's not just for fun we go through Mexico."

A month ago, Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, announced measures to slow the flow of illegal immigrants across Mexico's southern border and reduce crime in this lush but impoverished region. He stepped up the presence of soldiers and federal police here, told of plans for a guest worker program and promised joint state and federal operations to catch illegal immigrants.

But much remains to be done to stop or deter the migrants, and for now the measures have had little effect. Social workers and volunteers who aid the migrants say they keep coming.

Every three days, 300 to 500 Central Americans swarm the freight train in Arriaga, strapping themselves with ropes or belts to the tops of cars or riding between the wagons, they say.

The migrants still wade across the Suchiate River between Guatemala and Mexico with little hindrance. Corruption is rampant. Soldiers and police officers on the Mexican side extort money from the migrants but seldom turn them around, aid workers and migrants said.

"It's an open border," said Francisco Aceves Verdugo, a supervisor in the government agency, Grupos Beta, that gives food, water and medicine to illegal migrants. "We are confronting a monster so big in the form of corruption that we aren't doing anything."

The federal authorities do catch and deport illegal immigrants from Central America on their trek north — about 170,000 last year, according to Leticia Rodríguez, a spokeswoman for the National Migration Institute.

On the evening of Jan. 19, as part of Mr. Calderón's new get-tough policy, about 400 federal police officers stopped the freight train just after it left Arriaga and arrested more than 100 immigrants who had climbed aboard.

Still, aid workers say a majority gets through. The biggest deterrent, migrants say, is not federal authorities but armed thugs who waylay them along the railroad tracks or on paths through the countryside used to avoid the immigration posts along the main highway.

This month, Misael Mejía, 27, from Comayagua, Honduras, was awaiting the train in Arriaga with nine other young men from his town. They had walked for 11 days after wading across the Suchiate to get to the railhead in Arriaga.

None of them had a dime after being ambushed a week before by three men in ski masks in daylight near Huehuetán. Two of the men carried machetes, the third a machine gun.

"They told us to lay down and take off our clothes," Mr. Mejía said. "I lost my watch, about 500 Honduran lempiras, and 40 Mexican pesos," about $31.

Mr. Mejía said he would press on. He has a brother in Arizona who has promised to pick him up if he can run the gantlet through the United States border patrol. He left a $200-a-month job as a driver behind, along with his wife. His brother makes $700 a week as a carpenter.

"I felt hopeless in Honduras," he said. "Because I could never afford a house, not even a car. There is nothing I could have."

Down the street from the tracks, at the Hearth of Mercy shelter, where illegal immigrants can get a free hot meal and medicine, Juan Antonio Cruz, 16, hunched over a bowl of rice and told how he had left El Salvador after members of the Mara Salvatrucha street gang had threatened to kill him. "They wanted me to join them," he said.

It was his second attempt to reach Arizona, he said. The first time he had endured eight freezing nights and sweltering days aboard the train by strapping his belt to bar atop a tanker car. The border patrol caught him as he crossed into Nogales, Ariz., and sent him back home to Usulután, where the gang members threatened him again.

"When I think about the train, I feel fear and panic, for the thieves who attack you, and also for falling off," he said softly.

For some, that is how the dream ends, with a fall under the train's heavy, whirring wheels.

At the Shelter of Jesus the Good Pastor in Tapachula, Donar Antonio Ramírez Espinas rubbed the bandaged stumps of his legs, sheared off above the knee, as he recalled the night of March 26, 2004, when he dozed off while riding between cars, lost his grip and fell onto the tracks.

"I fell face down, and at first I didn't think anything had happened," he said. "When I turned over, I saw, I realized, that my feet didn't really exist."

Back in Honduras, he had been working menial jobs in a parking lot and at a medical warehouse, making about $120 a month. Then he and a few buddies decided to try their luck in the States.

"You make the decision to look for a better life, not to continue with the life your father led, and for this you risk your life, without knowing that you could end up like this," he said. "An amputee."

After the accident, he spent two years at the shelter in Tapachula, wrestling with depression and thoughts of suicide. When those black days finally passed, he returned home for five months, only to find his parents, his former wife and even his three children had trouble accepting his disability. "My 9-year-old said, 'Papa, why did you come back like this?' " he remembered. "I didn't dare answer him."

Mr. Ramírez has returned to the shelter here, where he hopes to learn a trade — fashioning prosthetic legs and arms for other victims of the train. Others at the shelter told similar stories. Some doubted they would be able to make a living in their home countries, where even getting a wheelchair is hard.

But some of those with lesser injuries insisted their accident was just a temporary setback. Minor Estuardo Cortez, 33, from Guatemala, lost his left foot under a train wheel while climbing aboard in Oaxaca State. At the shelter, he has healed and learned to walk with a prosthetic foot. He intends to continue his journey. If he reaches Houston, he says, he has relatives who can get him a construction job.

"If something happens to me, I don't scare easy," he said. "I'll do it again to see who wins, the train or me. Only thing is I can't run, so I'll have to wait until it's stopped to get on."

Uzbek Leader Shows No Signs Of Vacating (AP)

By Bagila Bukharbayeva, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 28, 2007

Nearly a week after his term elapsed, the former Communist strongman who has kept a tight grip on Uzbekistan for more than 15 years shows no sign of vacating the presidential office.

The clock ran out on Islam Karimov's second term on Sunday, but there has been no official recognition of the fact — a sign his hold on power remains strong and that he has no intention of leaving, analysts say.

They say Karimov, who has eradicated opposition and silenced dissent in the Central Asian nation, appears to be exploiting a legal ambiguity.

While the Uzbek constitution limits terms to seven years, the country also has a law that says a presidential election must be held in December of the year in which the term expires — in this case December 2007.

"There is no sign that Karimov is preparing to leave and he is apparently going to stand for and get another term in December," said Michael Hall, Central Asia project director of the International Crisis Group think-tank.

Karimov, who will turn 69 on Tuesday, became the top Communist boss in this former Soviet republic in 1989. He has won two presidential elections since the Soviet collapse — in 1991 and 1999 — and had his term extended twice, once through parliament and another time in a referendum.

Both election victories were landslides with more than 90 percent of the votes, but neither was recognized by international observers as free or fair.

Many observers fear that the Karimov government's oppressive control of the country could radicalize Islamic fundamentalists and lead to an explosion of violence in an already troubled part of the world.

Uzbekistan borders Afghanistan and hosted a U.S. air base supporting the Afghan military campaign. But Uzbekistan closed the base in the wake of Western criticism over the government suppression of an uprising in the eastern city of Andijan in 2005.

Human rights activists say some 700 people were killed, including unarmed civilians, but the government says fewer than 200 people died. Karimov rejected criticism and calls for an independent investigation from the United States, the European Union and others.

Experts had predicted that the country — Central Asia's most populous with 27 million people — would become an engine for regional development because of comparatively well-developed industries and energy self-sufficiency.

But Karimov, seeing the economic chaos that swept other ex-Soviet republics when they started market reforms, maintained a centralized economy and imposed restrictive trade rules.

In recent years, after pro-democracy uprisings in Georgia, Ukraine and neighboring Kyrgyzstan, Karimov has shown increasing suspicion of the West. Along with evicting the U.S. base, he has evicted most Western media, aid agencies and non-governmental organizations.

"The atmosphere is stifling. There are no international organizations, no journalists to turn to," said Elena Urlayeva, one of a small number of rights activists who remain in the country despite harassment.

"Karimov is going to stay for an extra year, but he is a former president now. It's totally illegal, it's usurpation of power," Urlayeva said by telephone from Tashkent.

"But there is nothing we can do," she said. "To stage public protests would be the same as facing a firing squad."

U.S. A "Pariah" From Bush Policies, Kerry Says (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland (AP) - Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, slammed the foreign policy of the Bush administration yesterday, saying it has caused the United States to become "a sort of international pariah."

Mr. Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, made the comment as he responded to a question about whether the U.S. government had failed to adequately engage Iran's government before the election of hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in 2005. He said the Bush administration has failed to adequately address a number of foreign-policy issues.

"When we walk away from global warming, Kyoto, when we are irresponsibly slow in moving toward AIDS in Africa, when we don't advance and live up to our own rhetoric and standards, we set a terrible message of duplicity and hypocrisy," he said.

"So we have a crisis of confidence in the Middle East -- in the world, really. I've never seen our country as isolated, as much as a sort of international pariah for a number of reasons, as it is today."

Mr. Kerry said the government needs to use diplomacy to improve national security.

"We need to do a better job of protecting our interests because, after all, that's what diplomacy is about," he said. "But you have to do it in a context of the reality; not your lens, but the reality of those other cultures and histories."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter Seeks Monday Meeting With Gonzales Over Surveillance Suits. On its Web site, The Hill (1/26, Schor) reports, "Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, initiated a fast-paced oversight inquiry late Friday, asking Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a Monday meeting to explain reports of controversial legal maneuvers employed by the Justice Department in civil lawsuits against the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program." Specter "voiced 'deep concern' about what he deemed 'extraordinary procedures' allegedly utilized by Justice."

Rockefeller May Subpoena Documents On Domestic Surveillance. Bloomberg (1/26, Bliss) reports, "Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Jay Rockefeller said he may subpoena Bush administration documents on its controversial domestic surveillance program." Rockefeller "vowed he'll get details on a secret court's approvals of the program that targets suspected al-Qaeda members in the U.S." The Justice Department "indicated Jan. 24 that it was reluctant to share the rulings." Rockefeller "saved some of his harshest criticism for Cheney, who he said tried to block the committee's efforts to get information on intelligence operations."

ACLU Asks Court To Unseal Surveillance Program Documents. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Weinstein) reports, "The American Civil Liberties Union asked a federal court Friday to unseal secret documents filed by the Bush administration in support of its warrantless domestic surveillance program." A hearing "is scheduled for Wednesday at the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati." The Justice Department has requested that the case be dropped.

The AP (1/27) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the secret panel of judges who oversee the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is reviewing and approving applications to spy on people believed to be linked to al-Qaida. … 'There is, therefore, no longer any live genuine controversy to adjudicate,' the Justice Department wrote in its brief filed Thursday. … But the ACLU said that without more information about what the secret court has authorized, it can't determine if current activities are lawful. It said the Bush administration might return to surveillance outside the secret panel without a court order against it." The AP adds, "The ACLU also asked the court Friday to make public or give ACLU lawyers access to secret materials in the case filed by the government as classified. … The National Security Agency program, secretly launched in 2001, monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States when one party is believed to have terrorist links. It became public in December 2005. … The administration says the program has been an important tool in the fight against terrorism and has helped prevent attacks."

NYTimes Criticizes Administration's "Obsession With Secrecy" And "Assault On The Rule Of Law." The New York Times (1/27, A16) writes in an editorial, "We often wonder whether there is a limit to the Bush administration's obsession with secrecy, its assault on the rule of law, its disdain for the powers of Congress, its willingness to con the public and its refusal to heed expert advice or recognize facts on the ground. Events of the past week suggest the answer is no." Cheney is criticized for his appearance on CNN in which he "spoke of 'enormous successes'" in Iraq "and refused to pay even curled-lip service to consulting Congress." Then "in Friday's Times, Adam Liptak gave an account of the way the administration -- after grandly announcing that it was finally going to obey the law on wiretapping -- is trying to quash lawsuits over Mr. Bush's outlaw eavesdropping operations by imposing outrageous secrecy and control over the courts." The Times calls such efforts "Orwellian" and adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales routinely stonewalls legitimate Congressional requests for documents and information on a wide range of issues." In conclusion, "Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney claim that they are protecting the powers of the presidency" but "by abusing the government's legitimate right to claim secrecy in court hearings, they will make it harder for other presidents to do that when it is actually justified. And with that switch, they have done grievous harm to the credibility of the Oval Office and the country."

More Commnetary. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (1/27), syndicated columnist Jacob Sullum writes, "The skeptics who doubt that 21,000 more troops will be the difference between war and peace in Iraq may be underestimating the Bush administration, which recently demonstrated it can do the impossible. This month, after violating the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) by eavesdropping on Americans without warrants for five years because obtaining judicial approval would have endangered national security, the administration somehow found a way to obey the law without sacrificing our safety." Sullum continues, "By exposing the hollowness of President Bush's national security justification, his tardy compliance with FISA demonstrates more contempt for the rule of law than continued defiance would have. Since the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program was publicly revealed in December 2005, the administration has maintained 'it was absolutely necessary to protect the security of our country,' as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee on Jan. 18. Now we know that's not true." Sullum adds, "From now on, Mr. Gonzales said, NSA surveillance of international e-mail and phone calls involving people on U.S. soil 'where there is probable cause to believe that one of the communicants is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an associated terrorist organization' will be 'subject to the approval of the FISA court.' Although the Bush administration publicly insisted for a year that such a concession would compromise national security, Mr. Gonzales promised 'the country will not be any less safe' now that the president has deigned to follow the law. … According to Mr. Gonzales, the Justice Department managed to square this circle by coming up with a 'complicated' and 'innovative' approach that complies with FISA yet allows the 'speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat.' Since the statute explicitly permits retroactive approval of surveillance in emergencies up to 72 hours after the fact, it's not clear what additional leeway the government thought it needed. … Whether you buy that or not, the reason for the delay in complying with FISA is clear: When it comes to fighting terrorism, the president considers obeying the law optional. As Mr. Gonzales emphasized, the administration still maintains the president is not obligated to follow FISA; he is doing so only because he has decided that 'involving all branches of government on such an important program is best for the country.' Given the president's view of his 'inherent' powers, he could go back to evading the courts and flouting the will of Congress any day."

The Honolulu Advertiser (1/27) editorializes, "Americans who are worried about the Bush administration's tight grip on the reins of power can't be happy with the news from Capitol Hill. … First, the president signals that he's now ready to end the practice of conducting warrantless wiretapping, announcing that any such operations will now meet requirements for court orders under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. This administration's turnabout resulted from negotiations with the FISA court." The Advertiser continues, "But just when some critics felt ready to turn handsprings, others — including several U.S. senators — fired off pointed questions. … New York's Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer asked whether these warrants were blanket approvals or broad brushstrokes enabling generic roundups. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales owes us an answer." The Advertiser adds, "In later grillings about federal prosecution of terrorists, Gonzales' message to the Senate was clearer — but even more disturbing. Habeas corpus — the right to go to federal court and challenge one's imprisonment — is not protected by the Constitution. … Even veteran Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter was incredulous, quoting a section in the Constitution barring suspension of habeas. How, he argued, can you ban the suspension of a right that doesn't exist? … Good question. … If the voters tried to communicate a need for some limits to executive power, the president wasn't hearing it."

The Sacramento Bee (1/27, B6) reports, "Yes, the right of habeas corpus does exist. It's been part of the Anglo-American legal tradition since the Magna Carta in 1215. And the U.S. Constitution explicitly says that it cannot be suspended, except in the case of rebellion or invasion. Yet Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee this week that he believes people in the United States have no constitutional right to habeas corpus." The Bee continues, "The writ of habeas corpus -- literally, 'produce the body' -- has been a bulwark of personal liberty for more than 800 years. It requires that any time a person is detained, the government must produce the prisoner in person and state why he or she is being detained. A person taken into custody must either be charged or released. … But there was Gonzales, testifying before the Judiciary Committee that 'there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution; there is a prohibition against taking it away.' … Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., was flabbergasted: 'Now, wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away, except in the case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have a right of habeas corpus, unless there is an invasion or rebellion?' … Gonzales dug in: 'I meant by that comment, the Constitution doesn't say, "Every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas." It doesn't say that.' … Unfortunately, this was not merely a theoretical exchange. The Bush administration already has been detaining people without charge. … The Bush administration forces us to learn anew the hallowed principles of our legal tradition -- and to defend them. Habeas corpus continues to be a basic human right worth fighting for -- to prevent a king or any government from arbitrarily throwing people into prison without charges."

Canada Announces $9.75 Million Compensation For Arar. The New York Times (1/27, A5, Austen) reports, "Maher Arar, the Canadian software engineer who was detained by American officials in 2002 and deported to Syria, where he was jailed and regularly tortured, will receive 11.5 million Canadian dollars ($9.75 million) in compensation from the Canadian government, under a settlement announced Friday." Prime Minister Stephen Harper "offered a formal apology to Mr. Arar and his family for their 'terrible ordeal.'" The Washington Post (1/27, A14, Struck) reports, "Harper and Arar both criticized the United States for its refusal to accept the exhaustive Canadian inquiry that found Arar was an innocent man."

The AP (1/26) reports Harper "again called on the U.S. government to remove the Ottawa telecoms engineer from any of its no-fly or terrorist watchlists and reiterated that Ottawa would keep pressing Washington to clear Arar's name." Arar "thanked the Canadian government at a news conference Friday." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Farley) reports Arar had been deported to Syria "based on incorrect information" and "was imprisoned and tortured for a year." Harper said that "he had asked President Bush to clear him." Arar "tried to sue American officials and agencies over his detention and deportation, but the U.S. District Court of Appeals dismissed his suit last February, ruling that the action was protected on national security grounds. Arar is appealing the decision."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

9/11 Calls To Emergency Operators Show Lack Of Coordination. The New York Times (1/27, B2, Dwyer) reports, "The city yesterday released 19 recordings of telephone calls made to 911 operators from the World Trade Center on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001. While the calls included a rich example of the valor of the day, they also showed that the emergency response agencies worked as separate fiefdoms, with callers having to tell their stories multiple times as they were transferred from police operators to fire dispatchers or to Emergency Medical Service. And no one in the 911 system passed along what could have been a life-saving order that had been issued by fire chiefs on the scene: to evacuate the buildings."

The AP (1/26) reports, "Seven minutes before the World Trade Center's south tower collapsed, Larry Boisseau called a 911 operator from the lobby, asking for help for injured people. He stayed on the line while the phone to paramedics rang about a dozen times." Boisseau, "fire safety director for OCS Security, was one of two victims identified on the calls because he was on the job. The other victim was Melissa Doi, whose call was made public because it was played at the trial of Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. The rest of the calls released Friday only played the operator's side of the conversation, and recalled eerie tableaus presented in earlier released tapes: operators trying to calm down callers trapped on the 84th floor, the 89th floor, the 93rd floor, the 105th floor. Some operators became exasperated, and others weren't sure how to advise trapped callers."

Anti-Fraud Regulations Blamed For Slow Rebuilding Efforts Following Katrina. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A1, Cooper) reports in a front-page story on rebuilding efforts 17 months after Hurricane Katrina that throughout the region, "rebuilding is in a deep stall." The article blames "the size of the disaster…; the crush of competing bureaucracies…; and weak local leadership." It details the lack of spending by responsible agencies and lays chief blame on regulations which are intended to combat fraud and waste. As an example, a Louisiana program, "Road Home…has drawn nearly 100,000 applicants. As of this week, it had disbursed only 258 grants for a total of $14.4 million. Mississippi, which operates a similar but far less restrictive grant program, has distributed $665 million to 11,827 homeowners." "At the federal level, Bush administration officials defend their rules." Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu (D) "has promised to try rejiggering Stafford Act rules to make them more flexible."

Judge Delays State Farm Settlement In Katrina Case. The New York Times (1/27, C1, Treaster) reports Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court in Gulfport, Mississippi "has rejected -- at least temporarily -- a settlement by State Farm Insurance that was expected to provide several hundred million dollars to help policyholders rebuild homes destroyed by Hurricane Katrina 17 months ago." State Farm said that "it now looked forward to addressing the judge's concerns." Lead attorney Richard F. Scruggs, and Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood "said they were optimistic that the agreement would be revived." The settlement "was expected to be a model for other insurers to use in seeking settlements, which would help jump-start the lagging recovery of Mississippi's coast." Judge Senter "raised concerns about a lack of detail on how much money policyholders might receive." He also said that the agreement "failed to provide information on what the lawyers had done to justify an agreed-upon payment of up to $20 million in relation to reopening the 35,000 damage claims."

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A4, Pleven) reports, "The judge's ruling threw into uncertainty a plan that would have required State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., the nation's largest home insurer, to pay a total of at least $50 million to homeowners who suffered damage in the 2005 storm." Senter "raised a number of objections in his ruling about the procedure and other issues related to the case." CNN.com (1/26) reported Senter "said the bargain between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. and the Mississippi attorney general did not establish 'a procedure that is fair, just, balanced or reasonable.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says "I'm The Decision Maker" On Iraq. The Washington Post (1/27, Abramowitz, Weisman, 690K) reports on its front page that, "declaring 'I'm the decision maker,'" President Bush "challenged congressional efforts to formally condemn his Iraq plan." It was "part of a White House campaign to try to keep Republican lawmakers from signing on to any resolution that criticizes the president's new strategy in Iraq. By keeping down the number of Republican defections, the administration hopes to make any vote appear highly partisan and to buy Bush's new plan more time." BBC.com (1/26) reports Bush "has made it clear he will ignore any attempt by the US Congress to question his sending 20,000 extra troops to Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (1/26, lead story, 2:40, Couric) led by reporting that while "he has faced day after day of criticism of his new Iraq strategy, and on this day President Bush said, in effect, it doesn't matter. He's in charge, he's calling the shots. The President said congressional opponents are condemning his troop buildup before it even has a chance to work, and his new defense secretary went even further, accusing them of giving America's enemies a boost." NBC Nightly News (1/26, lead story, 3:05, Williams) led by saying Bush "felt the need to remind some of those in Washington and beyond that he makes the decisions. He was talking about one in particular, however: sending almost 22,000 fresh US troops into Iraq. The President knows congress is probably going to pass resolutions against his policy. He further knows several Republicans have turned against him publicly. He also knows it won't have the force of law and today's pronouncement sounded like that, however unpopular the policy, there can only be one commander and chief at a time."

Gates Says Resolutions Embolden Enemy. The Washington Times (1/27, A1, Dinan, 88K) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said yesterday that Congress' push to oppose President Bush's troop increase in Iraq 'emboldens the enemy' and undercuts the commanders in the field. ... Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, called Mr. Gates' statement 'a desperate attempt' to bolster the president's policy." The Times adds, "Members of Congress are increasingly talking about a vision of victory that is different from Mr. Bush's picture of an Iraq that can 'govern, sustain and defend itself.'" The Washington Post (1/27, A1, Abramowitz, Weisman, 690K) also reports Gates's concern about the effect of Congressional resolutions. But on its Web site, The Hill (1/26, Marre) says if Republicans "stand in the way of an up-or-down vote on such a resolution, the resulting cloture vote would, in effect, be a referendum on the war. 'We're going to get a vote one way or the other,' Kennedy said in the Capitol."

Pelosi Meets With Maliki In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, :10, Couric) reported, "One fierce critic of the President's Iraq policy, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, was in Baghdad today. She met with Prime Minister Maliki and wished his government success." The Washington Post (1/27, A10, Londono, 690K) reports Maliki told Pelosi he would "like to see 50,000 U.S. troops leave by the end of the year, Iraqi officials said." Her "primary concern in meeting Maliki appeared to be to determine how soon he thought the United States could withdraw its soldiers from Iraq, said Ali Dabbagh, the prime minister's spokesman." The Speaker "told the prime minister that she and fellow Democrats are eager to see a prompt transition of authority, Maliki's office said in a statement."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Daragahi) reports Pelosi "reportedly voiced support for Iraq's 'democratic experiment' and vowed to push for the speedy transfer of security duties from U.S. to Iraqi forces long demanded by the Shiite-dominated government." The AP (1/26) reports that she was accompanied on her trip by Rep. John Murtha, "a longtime critic of the war."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/27, A8, Zernike, 1.16M) reports House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer "set out a road map for the House to exercise more control over Iraq strategy, as he and other Democratic leaders continued on Friday to exert pressure against the president's plan to send in an additional 21,500 troops."

On Fox News' The Big Story (1/26, Gibson), Newt Gingrich said of Pelosi's trip, "It's a very good thing for her to go. It's a very good thing for her to ask questions. It will be a very bad thing if she communicates to the Iraqi government anything other than the official policy of the United States. … I hope that Speaker Pelosi will be very cautious and the people with her will be very cautious about what they say when they're in those meetings."

Brownback, Pataki Oppose Surge. An announced and a potential Republican presidential candidate are both speaking out against the surge. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Levey) reports Sen. Sam Brownback "said Friday that he would back the symbolic push to oppose President Bush's plans to increase troop levels in Iraq, further evidence of the growing division within the GOP over the unpopular plan." And the New York Times (1/27, A12, Hernandez, 1.16M) reports ex-Gov. George Pataki, "a Republican who has steadfastly supported President Bush's Iraq policies, said on Friday that he would oppose Mr. Bush's plan for sending more troops to Baghdad unless Iraqi leaders took clearer steps to build a nonsectarian government."

Pataki said on Fox News (1/26, Browne), "Before we commit more American troops to the middle of sectarian violence between the Shia and Sunni, we should demand that the Maliki government take action; that they stop just talking about what they hope to do and actually start implementing tasks that will allow them to take the lead in protecting and making their democracy work."

Gates Works To Accelerate Deployment In Iraq. The Washington Post (1/27, A14, Tyson, 690K) reports Gates said he "was working to accelerate the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, suggesting that the influx of American troops is no longer contingent upon the Iraqi government fulfilling its commitments for Baghdad security operations. ... In congressional testimony and statements earlier this month, Gates had suggested that the flow of additional U.S. troops to Iraq would be dependent upon the Iraqi government meeting specific pledges -- such as sending three more Iraqi army brigades to Baghdad and lifting restrictions on U.S. military operations targeting certain Baghdad districts or individuals." The Post adds, "Yesterday's statements made it clear that any decision on withholding troops would be left to Petraeus, who has said he favors moving the troops to Iraq as quickly as possible."

Gates Displays New Style At First Pentagon News Conference. Coverage of Gates' first Pentagon newsconference was focused his stylistic differences with predecessor Donald Rumsfeld. The New York Times (1/27, A12, Cloud, 1.16M) said the session was "nothing like those of his predecessor," who "invariably stood behind the lectern in the Pentagon briefing room, often on live television, gleefully sparring with reporters, challenging the premises of their questions, and usually frustrating all efforts to elicit hard information. Mr. Gates seemed to go out of his way to do things differently. ... his answers were generally more concise and free of scoffing, teasing or smirking."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Barnes, 850K) also says Gates' "manner and method could not have been more different from those of his controversial predecessor." Gates "met the media in his private dining room, seating reporters and himself around a large conference table. And the answers he offered could not have been more dissimilar to Rumsfeld's. Stylistically, Gates refrained from scoffing at reporters, from restating their questions on more favorable terms and from challenging the premises of inquiries." In addition, "Gates came close to blaming Rumsfeld for many of the problems in Iraq."

Bush, Gates Defend Anti-Iran Effort Within Iraq. ABC World News (1/26, lead story, 2:30, Gibson) reported, "As if US forces don't have enough to worry about in Iraq, officials in Washington, today, were talking about forces from Iran, who are coming into Iraq. Recently, Iranian agents were detained on suspicion they were aiding the insurgency. And today, the President made it clear, American forces can respond with deadly force, if agents from Iran threaten their lives. We turn to our chief White House correspondent, Martha Raddatz. Martha?" ABC (Raddatz): "Charlie, the focus has been on Iraq. But today, it definitely switched to Iran. From the President to the Secretary of Defense and to the battlefields of Iraq -- today it was clear that pressure is being ratcheted up against Iran." The Bush Administration "is now aggressively pursuing a 'capture or kill' policy towards Iranians aiding the Iraqi insurgency." President Bush: "It makes sense that if somebody is trying to harm our troops or stop us from achieving our goal or killing innocent citizens in Iraq that we will stop them." Raddatz: "US officials say that the Pentagon will soon present evidence that Iran is providing deadly weapons to the insurgents, such as the explosively formed Penetrators that can cut through the strongest armor."

The Washington Post (1/27, A12, Linzer, Tyson, 690K) reports Bush "yesterday defended a Pentagon program to kill or capture Iranian operatives inside Iraq, saying that U.S. troops would use all necessary measures to protect themselves and Iraqi civilians from harm." However, Bush and Gates "said U.S. troops would not cross Iraq's border with Iran under the program, and the president said he is still committed to resolving the dispute over Iran's nuclear program diplomatically." Gates "id not discuss the program's rules of engagement but said that U.S. military targeting of Iranians or any foreign fighters is limited to those who pose a threat to U.S. troops, adding that such practice is not new." Bush "said his administration is already making good progress on the diplomatic front, citing a U.N. Security Council resolution that calls on Iran to halt much of its nuclear program and return to negotiations. Iran has rejected that."

The New York Times (1/27, Mazzetti, Cloud, 1.16M) says Bush "and his senior aides on Friday justified American actions against Iranian operatives inside Iraq as necessary to protect American troops and Iraqis, and said they would continue as long as Tehran kept up what they called its support for Shiites involved in sectarian attacks." Bush "decided several months ago to allow American troops to make targets of select Iranian operatives inside Iraq whom military officials have accused of helping militants build sophisticated and powerful roadside bombs." Leaders including Gates "said that President Bush had given the military no new authorities to carry out the offensive, and that the Pentagon had long had permission to capture or kill foreign operatives thought to be aiding attacks against American troops."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, A1, Richter) reports, "President Bush staunchly defended a tough new administration policy on Iran that is drawing criticism at home and causing anxiety abroad, arguing Friday that it was only sensible for U.S. troops to move aggressively against Iranians who endangered them in Iraq. ... The new push has been welcomed by some Sunni Arab countries that are worried about the rising influence of predominantly Shiite Iran, as well as by members of U.S. Congress from both parties who are nervous about the prospect that Tehran may acquire a nuclear weapon and possibly use it to threaten Israel. But the aggressive approach has been unsettling to Shiite Arabs and Kurdish leaders in Iraq, as well as to others in the United States and Europe."

Bush Downplays Plan For Offensive Strike Against Iran. Under the headline "Bush Denies Preparing Attack Against Iran," the Financial Times (1/27, Luce) notes President Bush yesterday "sought to deny widespread rumours his administration was preparing some kind of military action against Iran. Mr Bush confirmed a report in Friday's Washington Post that he had authorised US troops to shoot and kill Iranian operatives in Iraq, but denied this was a prelude to stronger action." However, his "relatively emollient comments are unlikely to quell speculation about the reasons behind the recent escalation of White House rhetoric towards Iran." The Times says Secretaries Rice and Gates "are thought to be pushing the White House to open talks with Iranian," while "others in the Bush administration, notably Dick Cheney, who last year warned Iran that it would face 'meaningful consequences' if it continued to foment violence in Iraq, are thought to be arguing for the military option."

Domenici Would Oppose Strike On Iran "At This Point." Sen. Pete Domenici was asked on the Imus In The Morning (1/26) radio program, simulcast on MSNBC, "If the President wanted to bomb Iran, would you support that?" Domenici replied, "At this point, I would not. I think we're back in the same muddle that we're in in this one if we do that. … They don't have a nuclear bomb yet. … We have some time. They're making it harder to find it, because they're moving it all over the place in very prolonged tunnels. But we have to decide later on what we do about that. Right now, we have better stay focused" on Iraq.

Dowd Denounces Cheney For Defense Of Iraq Policy. Maureen Dowd writes in her column for the New York Times (1/27, A17), "Dick Durbin went to the floor of the Senate on Thursday night to denounce the vice president as 'delusional.'" But "delusional is far too mild a word to describe Dick Cheney." She adds, "W. and Vice…learned no lessons from Vietnam, probably because they worked so hard to avoid going. They rush into a war halfway around the world for no reason and with no foresight about the culture or the inevitable insurgency, and then assert that any criticism of their fumbling management of Iraq and Afghanistan is tantamount to criticizing the troops." Cheney "has turned his perversity into foreign policy. He assumes that the more people think he's crazy, the saner he must be."

Senate Confirms Petraeus 81-0. ABC World News (1/26, story 3, :10, Gibson) reported the Senate "confirmed the President's choice to command US troops in Iraq, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus. The Senate confirmed Petraeus unanimously." The Washington Times/AP (1/27) says the "81-0 approval was in contrast to the widespread public and congressional opposition to Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq."

Domenici Says "We Don't Produce Smarter Men Than Him Anywhere." Sen. Pete Domenici appeared on the Imus In The Morning (1/26) radio program, simulcast on MSNBC, where he said of Petraeus, "We don't produce smarter men than him anywhere, and we're just lucky that, as smart as he is and as intelligent, well-versed, he happens to be in the military and he's going to take this job on. So we're very lucky as Americans to find these kind of people every now and then."

Petraeus Might Use Iraqi Facilities Protection Service. The Washington Post (1/27, A12, Pincus, 690K) reports Petraeus "told Congress that he might supplement efforts to secure Baghdad using the Iraqi Facilities Protection Service, a 150,000-man force that guards Iraqi government agencies. But that service is widely considered unreliable, and elements were described in July by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as 'more dangerous than the militias,' according to Sen. Jack Reed."

Military Confirms Abduction Of Troops In Karbala Slayings. Coverage of the raid against Americans in Karbala pointedly noted the military's earlier denials that an abduction had occurred. ABC World News (1/26, story 2, 2:10, Gibson) reported, "The military, at first, said five US soldiers had died repelling that attack. However, today the story is quite different. And it turns out the attack represents almost a total breakdown in security." ABC (Marquez): "In the immediate aftermath, it looked like the scene of so many deadly attacks on US forces. But this assault was far more brazen and brutal. US officials say the attack began when a convoy of GMC sport utility vehicles, the kind used by US government officials, entered the governor's compound in Karbala."

The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 3, 1:45, Couric) reported, "Meanwhile, the Pentagon has changed its account of what happened when US troops were ambushed in Karbala last week." CBS (Orr): "The US military now concedes the assault on this compound in Karbala was a sophisticated and brazen attack." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "was pressed today about the new details of the Karbala attack." Gates: "I've just been made aware of the discrepancy in the account and I've asked for the specifics about it." NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 3:20, Miklaszewski) reported, "The level of security provided by the Iraqis is dismally low. The Iraqi guards are not properly trained and certainly not reliable. ... The tragic incident raises questions about the new US strategy for Baghdad and the increased risk to American troops."

The AP (1/26) reports, "Four American soldiers were abducted during a sophisticated sneak attack last week in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, the U.S. military confirmed Friday. It said three were shot to death and a fourth was mortally wounded with a gunshot to the head when they were found in a neighboring province, far from the compound where they were captured. ... The brazen assault, 50 miles south of Baghdad, was conducted by nine to 12 militants posing as an American security team, according to two senior U.S. military officials as well as Iraqi officials." The AP adds, "The confirmation has emerged after nearly a week of inquiries. The U.S. military in Baghdad initially did not respond to repeated requests for comment on reports that began emerging from Iraqi government and military officials on the abduction and a major breakdown in security at Karbala site."

The Washington Post (1/27, A10, Londono, 690K) reports, "The U.S. military, reversing earlier statements, acknowledged Friday that four of five soldiers killed last Saturday had been abducted before being executed." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "The account of the attack provided by the military suggests both a breakdown of security in the relatively safe southern province as well as increased skill on the part of armed groups."

Suicide Bombing Kills At Least 15 At Baghdad Pet Market. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 4, 2:00, Couric) reported, "Today in Baghdad, a busy pet market was attacked. A bomb hidden in a crate of pigeons exploded. At least 15 people were killed as were dozens of animals. Sunni insurgents are suspected." NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 3:20, Williams) reported, "Yet another bombing at a Baghdad market, this time at a popular fair where animals are bought and sold routinely."

The New York Times (1/27, A8, Santora, 1.16M) reports, "There used to be two great joys on Fridays for Iraqis in Baghdad: browsing the ancient bookshops, and exploring the Ghazil animal market, home to an extraordinary array of creatures. ... The animal market, too, has suffered, having been reduced to a shell of its lively former self. When a bomb exploded there on Friday, killing 15 people and wounding 50, it was the third such attack since June." The Washington Times/AP (1/27, Gamel) reports, "Suspicion fell on Sunni insurgents because the market sits near a predominantly Shi'ite neighborhood on the east bank of the Tigris River that divides Baghdad. It was the latest in a series of attacks on busy commercial targets in the capital as insurgents apparently sought to maximize bloodshed ahead of a U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Daragahi, Kareem, 850K) reports, "As usual, the attack carried sectarian overtones."

Soldiers Caught In Baghdad Crossfire. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 4, 2:00, Couric) reported, "Chief foreign correspondent Lara Logan is on patrol with US forces in Baghdad's Dura district. Today they found themselves caught in the crossfire." CBS (Logan): "Crazyhorse troops are right in the middle of Iraq's sectarian war. Here, rushing to the scene of a shooting; only the gunmen are gone, leaving US troops to deal with the anger that follows."

Soldiers Serving In Iraq Are Profiled. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 3, 2:20, Williams) reported, "Tonight we get to see American soldiers on the job in Iraq and more important really we get to hear from them about all of the talk about the war here at home." NBC (Engel): "When the Stryker Brigade Apache company headed out this morning, they had one mission, to find bases for the new US troops coming in. There aren't a lot of safe options in this city."

Western Iraq Sees More Cooperation With US Forces. The Washington Post (1/27, A13, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Before tribal sheiks aligned themselves with U.S. forces in the violent deserts of western Iraq, the number of people willing to become police officers in the city of Ramadi -- the epicenter of the fight against the insurgent group known as al-Qaeda in Iraq -- might not have filled a single police pickup. ... With the help of a confederation of about 50 Sunni Muslim tribal sheiks, the U.S. military recruited more than 800 police officers in December and is on track to do the same this month. Officers credit the sheiks' cooperation for the diminishing violence in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province." However, "some Iraqi politicians and Anbar residents who oppose the U.S. presence describe the confederation, known as the Awakening, as a divisive group that pits tribes against each other, uses police officers as armed guards to protect tribal territory, and harnesses American support to consolidate its power."

Officer Faces Court Martial For Abu Ghraib Role. The Washington Post/AP (1/27, A3) reports Lt. Col. Steven Jordan, the "only U.S. military officer charged with a crime in the Abu Ghraib scandal," will be "court-martialed on eight charges, including cruelty and maltreatment of prisoners, the Army said Friday." Jordan, "a 50-year-old reservist from Virginia who ran the interrogation center at the Iraqi prison, was accused of failing to exert his authority as the place descended into chaos, with prisoners stripped naked, photographed in humiliating poses and intimidated by snarling dogs."

Antiwar Demonstrators To March In Washington Today. The Washington Post (1/27, B1, Ruane, 690K) reports, "Tens of thousands of demonstrators from across the country are expected to converge in Washington today to urge the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq as President Bush is proposing to send more troops in an effort to stabilize the country." The event "is expected to draw groups of many stripes. The chart for the assembly site shows sections reserved for veterans and labor, gay and peace organizations, in addition to others dedicated to opposing global warming, nuclear arms and torture and a group called End Israeli Occupation of Palestine. In addition, at least one group is protesting the protest." The AP (1/26, Margasak) says a "small number of active military troops will take part in today's rally in Washington against the Iraq war." The Washington Times (1/27, Cella, Taylor, 88K) also reports on the planned march.

Coleman Among Activists' Targets. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/27, Hotakainen, 395K) says "groups opposed to the war in Iraq announced that they're targeting Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., as part of a national campaign to stop the troop increase proposed by President Bush. ... Coleman has been in the national spotlight since Jan. 10, when he announced his opposition to Bush's request. But Coleman has made a distinction between sending more troops to Baghdad and sending them to Anbar Province."

Older Generation Is Majority In Iraq War Protests. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/27, Gammage) reports that many have found that "at protests, the people carrying signs are often middle-age or retired" an "inverse of the 1960s, when U.S. campuses erupted in protest, sometimes in flames, over the war in Southeast Asia. … To the iPod generation, standing on street corners and holding banners can seem anachronistic" because "its members are more likely to voice political objections on blogs and other Internet venues."

Fonda Faces Heat Again In Antiwar Protest. The Boston Globe (1/27, Bender) reports that "actress and long time peace activist Jane Fonda…will rejoin the ranks of the antiwar movement today at a major rally in Washington." Her "return to the spotlight…was seen by some activists and chroniclers of the antiwar movement as politically risky. They said her presence could be distracting in a rally that organizers hope can capitalize on congressional opposition" to President Bush's surge plan.

Tree Memorial To Fallen Soldiers Grows Larger. The AP (1/26) reports from Fort Stewart, Georgia, on the "318th soldier memorialized at Warriors Walk, a grove of eastern redbuds started with 34 trees in April 2003. Fort Stewart has planted a tree here for every member of the 3rd Infantry Division to die in the war, as well as for soldiers from other Army posts killed while serving with the division. Jeff Fornshell, the post's ceremonies coordinator, said he wonders how many trees he'll have to plant this year. Expanded twice since its inception, Warriors Walk has room for only 72 more trees." The monument "exhibits the war's cost in a way that's staggering in scale yet also intensely personal."

Rice's Appeal For Bolstered Afghanistan Mission Said To Meet Skepticism. Under the headline, "Rice Presses Allies To Boost Afghan Aid," the Washington Post (1/27, A16, Moore, 690K) notes Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "citing the $10.6 billion in new aid that the Bush administration proposes to give Afghanistan, pressed NATO and European allies Friday to increase their contributions of money and manpower." Her "push came as concern grows over the resurgence of the Taliban in southern Afghanistan, massive increases in opium production and rising tension between Afghanistan and neighboring Pakistan, where Taliban leaders and fighters have been allowed refuge." Rice "defended U.S. and NATO operations in Afghanistan, saying, 'The violence we are seeing is not evidence that our strategy has failed, nor that the situation will improve in our absence.' She added, 'It is evidence of how much we are needed.'"

The AP (1/27, Gearan) adds Rice "asked allies Friday to intensify their efforts to keep the Taliban from retaking parts of Afghanistan, and asserted a resurgence in Taliban attacks does not mean the U.S. war strategy has failed." The Administration "wants NATO allies to increase money, troops and other support for the unsteady democracy in Afghanistan. It is also working to dispel European suspicion that the United States is too busy in Iraq to pay attention to the older Afghan fight."

The New York Times (1/27, Cooper, 1.16M) titles its coverage, "NATO Allies Wary Of Sending More Troops To Afghanistan." European powers "remained noncommittal about sending additional troops to Afghanistan, even as the Bush administration sought to inject new energy into the NATO mission against the Taliban by offering more American soldiers and money." The Times reports, "Officially, the language at a NATO meeting here on Friday reflected resolve and commitment toward Afghanistan. … But beyond the sound bites, the realities that have troubled the NATO mission in Afghanistan since the 26-member trans-Atlantic alliance took command last year remained on display."

Army Reprimands Special Forces Soldiers For Beating Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Sack) reports, "The Army announced Friday night that it had given administrative reprimands to two Special Forces soldiers for assaulting detainees held at a base in eastern Afghanistan in 2003 and for failing to report the death of one detainee. However, the U.S. Army Special Forces Command absolved the soldiers of any wrongdoing in the deaths of two [other] detainees." The Special Forces' statement "did not name the soldiers who had been disciplined, nor did it provide details about which death led to the disciplinary action for failure to report."

Ex-Taliban Governor Gunned Down In Afghanistan. The Los Angeles Times/AP (1/27) reports, "An Afghan lawmaker who oversaw the destruction of two massive 1,500-year-old Buddha statues in March 2001 was gunned down here on his way to Friday prayers, police said." Mawlawi Mohammed Islam Mohammedi "was the former Taliban regime's governor of Bamian province when the 5th century Buddha statues carved from the living rock were blasted with dynamite and artillery." The gunman's motive was unknown.

Halliburton, KBR Report Income Declines. The AP (1/26, Porretto) reports Halliburton "was upbeat Friday despite a 40 percent decline in fourth-quarter profit, citing heavy demand for its oilfield equipment and personnel and predicting more of the same for 2007." The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B14, Vuocolo) reports KBR, "which was partially spun off from Halliburton in November, saw net income decline 23%."

War College Scholar Argues More NATO-Like Alliances Needed. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/27, A17, 1.16M), Joseph R. Núñez, an Army colonel and the chairman of the art of war department at the Strategic Studies Institute, United States Army War College, argues, "Like the one strong horse that carries load after load, NATO is getting tired of having to serve as the proxy both for the United Nations and feeble regional organizations. ... What we need are more permanent regional security and defense organizations, supported by major powers." The US and its allies "should work to create a minimum of six additional security and defense organizations patterned on NATO -- one each for North America, South America, Africa, the Asia-Pacific region, South Asia and the Middle East. Headquarters for these organizations might be, respectively, in Colorado Springs, Brasília, Johannesburg, Beijing, New Delhi and Amman, Jordan."

Wills Complains Of Creeping Militarization Of Presidency. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/27, A17, 1.16M), author Garry Wills writes, "The president is not the commander in chief of civilians. He is not even commander in chief of National Guard troops unless and until they are federalized. … We have not seen normal life in 66 years. The wartime discipline imposed in 1941 has never been lifted." In addition, "There has never been an executive branch more fetishistic about secrecy than the Bush-Cheney one. ... We used to take pride in civilian leadership of the military under the Constitution, a principle that George Washington embraced when he avoided military symbols at Mount Vernon. We are not led -- or were not in the past -- by caudillos."

President Satirized As Weapons Visionary. In a satirical op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/27), author Larry Doyle and his son Ben present an imaginary memo from the White House in which President Bush muses about useful high-tech weapons: "POTUS was curious about where we are on the invisibility cloak. ... We have smart bombs; why not smart bullets? They could be trained to tell the difference between Shiites or Sunnis and only shoot the right one, depending on the day. ... We need a time machine, either based on the POTUS La-Z-Boy design or something more scientific, as long as it's done by Friday."

DOJ:

DOJ's IG Says Department Is Not Prepared For Emergencies. The Washington Times (1/27, Seper) reports, "The Justice Department, hampered by budget shortfalls and high staff turnover, is not prepared to respond quickly to terrorist attacks, hostage incidents, hurricanes and other natural disasters, said a report yesterday by" Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. He "also said that while U.S. attorneys nationwide stepped up training in response to the September 11 attacks, their efforts have fallen off, noting that fewer than half complied with requirements to conduct annual training exercises in 2005 and 2006."

Bloomberg (1/27, Roland) reports, "The U. S. attorneys are responsible for making on-site legal decisions and coordinating for the department with other federal, state and local officials. Justice Department officials have been lax in supervising the preparations, and some plans have been deficient for years, the 70-page report said. … The Justice Department's efforts 'have regressed since June 2005,' said the audit, posted Friday on the department's Web site. Agency officials 'have not provided the direction and support needed to ensure' proper preparations, it said." Bloomberg adds, "The Justice Department, which oversees the FBI as well as the U. S. attorneys' office, has been criticized by Congress for its responses to the 1993 Branch Davidian standoff in Texas, the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing and various hurricanes.

Department officials made "serious mistakes" in the use of deadly force, coordinating between negotiators and attack planners and in collecting evidence, the report said. … Department officials plan 'to resolve and implement solutions to the' audit findings, said Michael Battle, head of the office that oversees the U. S. attorneys, in a Jan. 8 letter appended to the inspector general's report."

Recent US Attorney Appointments Are Called Political. McClatchy Newspapers (1/27, Taylor, Gordon) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is transforming the ranks of the nation's top federal prosecutors by firing some and appointing conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle who critics say are unlikely to buck Washington." McClatchy continues, "The newly appointed U.S. attorneys all have impressive legal credentials, but most have few, if any, ties to the communities they've been appointed to serve, and some have had little experience as prosecutors. … The nine recent appointees identified by McClatchy Newspapers held high-level White House or Justice Department jobs, and most were handpicked by Gonzales under a little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act that became law in March." McClatchy adds, "With Congress now controlled by the Democrats, critics fear that in some cases Gonzales is trying to skirt the need for Senate confirmation by giving new U.S. attorneys interim appointments for indefinite terms. … Some legal scholars contend that the administration pushed for the change in the Patriot Act as part of an ongoing attempt to expand the power of the executive branch, a charge administration officials deny. … Being named a U.S. attorney 'has become a prize for doing the bidding of the White House or administration,' said Laurie Levenson, a former federal prosecutor. … A Justice Department spokesman called such assessments 'reckless.' … The selection of U.S. attorneys has always been a political process. … Traditionally, the top assistant U.S. attorney in each local office temporarily fills any vacancy while home-state senators search for preferred candidates to present to the White House for consideration. … Gonzales gained the authority to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms as a result of a change to the Patriot Act that stripped federal judges of their appointment power. … A Justice Department spokesman denied that Gonzales has sought to compromise the independence of U.S. attorneys' offices by appointing political loyalists. In some recent cases Gonzales has followed the traditional process. … 'Allegations that politics inappropriately interfere with personnel decisions made about U.S. attorneys are reckless and plainly wrong,' said department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former CA Official Sentenced For Fraud. The New York Times/AP (1/27) reports, "A former executive with Computer Associates who pleaded guilty to securities fraud and who prosecutors said was instrumental in the prosecution of the company's former chief executive, Sanjay Kumar, was sentenced to seven months in prison and seven months of home detention." The AP continues, "The executive, Ira Zar, the former chief financial officer, pleaded guilty in 2004 and has cooperated with authorities in the prosecution of Mr. Kumar and the company's former sales chief, Stephen Richards. … Mr. Zar, 45, also pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy and was sentenced by Judge I. Leo Glasser of United States District Court in Brooklyn. He was also ordered to serve two years of supervised release after the completion of his sentence. No fine was imposed and restitution will be determined at a later date."

SEC Launches Options Probe Of KB Home. The Financial Times (1/27, Cameron) reports, "KB Home, the fourth-largest US housebuilder, on Friday revealed that US regulators had opend a formal investigation into the stock-options backdating practices that led to the departure of its chief executive last November." The Times continues, "The Los Angeles-based group is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the unfolding options scandal, and the launch of a formal probe by the Securities and Exchange Commission comes as management wrestles with the impact of the slowing housing market." The Times adds, "The SEC launched an informal investigation into KB Home last August, and intensified the probe on January 19, according to the company, which said it was co-operating with regulators. .. An internal probe by the company revealed KB Home used "incorrect measurement dates for financial reporting purposes for annual stock option grants during the period 1998-2005". The report led to the departure of Bruce Karatz, who had led the company since its initial public offering, and the dismissal of its chief legal officer, who had helped to set dates for the stock options."

Hewlett-Packard In Legal Dispute With Former Official Over Spying Allegations. The San Jose Mercury News (1/27, Wong) reports, "A run-of-the-mill divorce proceeding has led to allegations of corporate espionage involving Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer giant whose reputation was recently tarnished by a board-spying scandal." The News continues, "The Palo Alto computer giant is in an ugly fight against a former executive, Karl Kamb Jr., who has accused HP of having him spy on rival Dell. HP has accused Kamb of stealing HP's trade secrets. The story is complete with allegations of a hired informant, bribery and adultery. Key documents in the case, in federal court in Tyler, Texas, have been sealed and the parties were ordered Thursday by a judge not to speak to the media. … But the saga can be pieced together from documents obtained before Kamb's lawsuit was sealed." The News adds, "In August 2005, Kamb's wife, as part of divorce proceedings, subpoenaed HP for information about a business Kamb had established on the side while he was employed by the Palo Alto company in Tokyo, HP said in court filings. After investigating, HP sued Kamb in November 2005 for allegedly stealing its trade secrets to start a multimillion-dollar flat-panel television business while he helped launch HP's TV line. … Last week, Kamb countersued HP for allegedly spying on him, alleging that HP had impersonated him to retrieve his personal phone records. He claimed that HP instructed him to obtain trade secrets on rival Dell's entry into the printer market."

Judge Scolds Nacchio Prosecutors Over Evidence Exchange. The AP (1/27, Shore) reports, "With a stern reminder that Joe Nacchio's trial is just weeks away, a federal judge ordered prosecutors Friday to step up efforts to provide some key evidence to the former Qwest chief executive's attorneys." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham set deadlines for evidence to be turned over and told attorneys to file status reports by Feb. 6. … 'This case is going to be tried on March 19, folks,' Nottingham said." The AP adds, "Nacchio, who is free on bail, is accused of selling $101 million worth of stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets. … Nacchio is charged with 42 counts, each carrying a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine, and has pleaded not guilty." The AP notes, "At issue in Friday's hearing was evidence that could be deemed favorable to Nacchio, which prosecutors are required by law to provide the defense. … Nacchio's attorneys have contended government attorneys have been slow to deliver some evidence, citing a report on a witness delivered two months after the interview was conducted. … Prosecutor Cliff Stricklin said government attorneys are still interviewing witnesses. 'We're doing the best we can,' he said. … Another problem stems from classified documents that defense attorneys say they need. Prosecutors said the evidence-exchange process had been slowed because some of the documents fall under the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets guidelines for viewing secret government documents. … Prosecutors said they must coordinate the documents with federal agencies that are involved. … Defense lawyers have said Nacchio believed Qwest would get hundreds of millions of dollars worth of classified government contracts that gave him hope for the company's financial future."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Testimony Said To Cause Anxiety At White House. Newsweek (1/26, Isikoff) reports on its Web site, "White House anxiety is mounting over the prospect that top officials -- including deputy chief of staff Karl Rove and counselor Dan Bartlett-may be forced to provide potentially awkward testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis (Scooter) Libby." And "the possibility that Rove could be called to testify would bring his own role into sharper focus." An account of reported testimony by former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer "potentially puts Bartlett…on the hot seat." And "it's not a scenario that anybody at the White House can be looking forward to."

CNN.com (1/27) reports, "Two of President Bush's top advisers have been subpoenaed as possible witnesses in the trial of former White House aide Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, a legal source familiar with the case told CNN on Friday. It remains unclear whether either of the aides -- Karl Rove and Dan Bartlett -- will actually be called to the stand."

Martin Testifies She Told Cheney, Libby That Wilson's Wife Worked For CIA. AFP (1/27) reports Deputy White House communications director Cathie Martin "testified in court Thursday that Vice President Dick Cheney personally led the 2003 effort to discredit Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson." Martin "testified that the vice president ordered her to monitor all print and television news reports on Wilson after the former ambassador went public with his criticism." Martin "also testified that she clearly remembered telling both Cheney and Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA days before Libby said he first learned of it."

Libby Lawyers Skeptical Of Fleischer Deal. The Washington Times/AP (1/27, Press) reports, "Attorneys for former vice presidential aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby Jr. want more information about an unusual immunity-from-prosecution deal that government lawyers gave former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer in the CIA leak case. Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald says that in early 2004, as his investigation was heating up into who revealed CIA operative Valerie Plame's name to reporters, Mr. Fleischer stepped forward with an offer to prosecutors: Promise no prosecution and he would help their case." Attorneys for Libby "want details about Mr. Fleischer's agreement to cast the defendant as someone who's pointing fingers to protect himself."

New Prosecutors In Duke Lacrosse Case Under Pressure. The Washington Post (1/27, A3, Adcock) reports from Raleigh, NC, "Six boxes and two file folders were transferred to the state attorney general's office near Capital Square here last week, and with them comes a shift in a case that has transfixed the nation. … The boxes and files contain the sum total of evidence against three former Duke University lacrosse players charged with sexually assaulting an escort service dancer at an off-campus team party last spring. In the recent months, the actions of the previous prosecutor, Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong, have taken center stage. But now that Nifong has asked to be relieved while he faced charges from the North Carolina Bar Association, including withholding evidence from defense lawyers, the focus of the case shifts to state Attorney General Roy Cooper and the two prosecutors he has chosen to evaluate the evidence." The Post continues, "Pressure on them will be enormous. An intense publicity campaign this month painted a sympathetic picture of the players, in Newsweek and on '60 Minutes.' And the NAACP held a news conference here last week to call on prosecutors to take into account the accuser's version of events, saying it was aware of 'the impact that this case can have on chilling the rights of women, particularly African Americans, to file criminal complaints of sexual violence and exploitation.' The three players are white and the accuser is black, and witnesses have reportedly said they heard racist comments when the woman was leaving the house last March 13."

Judge Proposes Keeping Columbine Depositions Secret. The AP (1/27) reports from Denver, "A federal judge has proposed keeping secret for 25 years the sworn statements made by the parents of the Columbine High School gunmen for a civil lawsuit settled more than three years ago." The AP continues, "The judge, Lewis T. Babcock of Federal District Court, suggested the plan on Friday to settle a dispute over whether the depositions should be destroyed. Chief Judge Babcock's proposal calls for them to be turned over to the National Archives and Records Administration. It was not immediately clear what would happen to them after 25 years. … The judge asked the parties in the dispute to respond to his proposal within two weeks." The AP adds, "The parents of the Columbine gunmen, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, gave the statements in 2003 for a civil lawsuit filed by families of victims of the April 1999 shooting near Littleton. Mr. Harris, 18, and Mr. Klebold, 17, killed 12 fellow students and a teacher before taking their own lives. … After the suit was settled, a magistrate ordered the depositions destroyed, but victims' families and others argued that the material had historical value and could contain lessons to prevent school shootings. … Brian Rohrbough, whose son, Daniel, 15, was among those killed, objected to the judge's plan. Mr. Rohrbough said that the public had a right to know, but that the government seemed to think the release of such information was 'somehow going to unravel American society.'"

The Denver Post (1/27, Pankratz) reports, "Babcock said he wouldn't make a final decision until all sides had an opportunity to file written responses with him. He gave the parties a two-week deadline to file motions. … The Colorado attorney General's Office has suggested that the depositions be sent to the Colorado State Archives where a youth-violence expert could review them and issue a public report."

Corrigan's claim about an investigation. But U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn said his staff reached out to the Office of Public Integrity in Washington to determine if a party official - as opposed to a public official - could be criminally charged for taking money in exchange for an endorsement. … 'We were told that, since the 1970s, it's been Department of Justice policy that we do not prosecute cases where a candidate pays money to be put on a slate,' Flynn said." The News adds, "Corrigan, however, said he played undercover agent for much of 2006, cooperating in a probe he hoped would weed out corruption from at least a part of local politics. … 'I carried a wire for the FBI all last year,' Corrigan said, adding that federal agents also tapped his phone to determine whom they would target in a probe they expected to be wide-ranging. … He said federal investigators became especially interested after he talked to two potential candidates while wearing a small transmitter in his shirt pocket. … Corrigan would not reveal the names of either of the people he recorded. But after The Buffalo News independently determined that one of them was Jeffrey A. Bono, a longtime Democratic operative who unsuccessfully ran for the Assembly last May, Corrigan acknowledged that he taped Bono's conversation in the Olympic Restaurant near Buffalo Niagara International Airport last April."

Prosecutors In Utah, North Carolina Find No Crimes In "Hounddog." The AP (1/27, Robertson) reports, "Prosecutors in two states said Friday they found nothing illegal about a movie shot in North Carolina and screened this week at Utah's Sundance Film Festival that depicts a child rape, and instead said 'Hounddog' offered viewers a 'good message' about child sexual abuse." The AP continues, "The movie has troubled some Christians, who have called for a federal investigation into whether the movie breaks federal anti-pornography laws. A state lawmaker in North Carolina also said he is drafting legislation that would require the state approve the script of any television or movie production seeking a state tax break. … But Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff, who watched the movie this week with his state's child sexual exploitation law in hand, said his concerns didn't materialize on the screen. … 'None of the things on the Internet that people were saying about it were true,' Shurtleff said. 'Not only does it not violate the statute, I think it's a good message for people on the subject.'" The AP adds, "The opinion is shared by the district attorneys in the two North Carolina counties where 'Hounddog' was filmed last summer. … Rex Gore, the Brunswick County district attorney, said prosecutors reviewed the movie in November and interviewed crew members, producers and star Dakota Fanning. The movie includes a scene depicting the rape of a 9-year-old child played the 12-year-old actress. … The Christian Film and Television Commission and its chairman, movieguide.org publisher Ted Baehr, had claimed "Hounddog" breaks federal child-pornography law because it 'appears' to show minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct. The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights also asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate."

New Orleans Officials Say City Is Making Progress Against Violent Crime. The AP (1/26, Foster) reports, "Two weeks after thousands marched on City Hall to protest violent crime, city officials gathered there again Friday to provide an update on their latest crime fighting efforts, including increased use of remote cameras, beefed up patrols and traffic checkpoints." The AP continues, "The city has identified 20 crime 'hot spots' were cameras will be placed, adding to 50 already operating, Mayor Ray Nagin said. There will also be cameras providing coverage along St. Charles Avenue for next month's Mardi Gras parades, Nagin said. … The cameras are not monitored, they can, however, provide evidence for investigations since the images they record are kept in a computer." The AP adds, "Police have begun regular patrols in three districts, superintendent Warren Riley said. And at least one officer is walking for 1 1/2 hours a day in every district, he said. … The police have put another 60 officers on the streets three days a week, Riley said, by pulling them from administrative jobs. He's going to use federal grants to pay overtime for another 40 to 50 patrol officers. Riley is also using undercover officers to converge on scenes of violent crime. … The city's initiatives are in addition to plans announced Thursday by the U.S. Justice Department. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Attorney Jim Letten announced additional federal manpower and equipment being sent to the city to help police fight violent crime that increased as the city repopulates following Hurricane Katrina in August 2005."

Alabama Woman, Daughter Sentenced For FEMA Fraud. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (1/27) reports, "A Jackson woman who admitted submitting 28 phony applications for assistance following Hurricane Katrina will spend more than six years in prison, while her mother will serve probation for similar offenses, a federal judge in Mobile decided this week." The Press-Register continues, "U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose on Wednesday sentenced Lawanda Williams to six years and three months in prison and ordered her to pay back the $267,377 she received in fraudulent aid from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The judge also ordered her to surrender four automobiles, real estate, televisions, electronics equipment and other items she purchased with the money. .. .At a separate hearing Friday, DuBose sentenced the woman's mother, Hannah Williams, to three months probation." The Press-Register adds, "The pair are among more than a dozen people who have pleaded guilty to FEMA fraud associated with Katrina, but the younger Williams is responsible for more money than any of the others, according to authorities. … 'Ms. Williams used Hurricane Katrina and the relief efforts as an opportunity to make hundreds of thousands of dollars by lying and by stealing other people's identities,' U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes said in a prepared statement. 'The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force is actively working to bring to justice those who took advantage of the recovery efforts to enrich themselves.' … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales created the national task force in September 2005, weeks after Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast. Chaired by the assistant attorney general for the criminal division, the task force includes representatives from the FBI, the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General and other agencies."

Judge Dismisses Two Jurors From New York Death Penalty Case. The New York Post (1/27, Cohen) reports, "An irreverent Brooklyn federal judge had to dismiss two jurors from a capital murder case yesterday after his mocking statements about the defendant's possible death sentence wound up splashed across city newspapers." The Post continues, "Judge Frederic Block told lawyers earlier this week that the feds' bid to have drug lord Kenneth 'Supreme' McGriff - who is charged in two murder-for-hire schemes - put to death was 'absurd.' … The jury and the press were not in the courtroom when the judge made the unusual comments, but a copy of the public court transcript wound up in reporters' hands - and then became fodder for the following day's news cycle." The Post adds, "Morning talk-radio shows then picked up the story. And Assistant U.S. Attorney Caroline Pokorny complained to Block yesterday morning, as he launched a bid to discover whether the jury has been tainted. … McGriff, a legendary Queens drug kingpin, is on trial for plotting the deaths of two rivals in 2001. The judge said that, based on the jury's demeanor and the evidence presented during the initial phase of the trial, which ended yesterday, 'there's no chance in the world there would be a death-penalty verdict in this case . . . This is an absurd prosecution, based upon what I have heard.' … He asked Pokorny to send a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, telling him that he didn't support proceeding with the penalty phase of the trial. Federal death-penalty cases require two trials - one in which jurors decide the defendant's guilt and, if there's a conviction, a separate trial in which they say whether he should face life in prison or death. … It's unclear what impact the judge's suggestion will have on the case. … Yesterday, he admitted he'd made a mistake by allowing the comments to become public - but didn't seem to regret making them."

Virginia Legislature Approves Expansion Of Death Penalty To Accomplices. The Washington Post (1/27, B1, Craig) reports the Virginia House of Delegates "voted Friday to expand the use of the death penalty" by "making accomplices and judge killers eligible for execution." The Senate "passed nearly identical versions of the bills earlier in the week." Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) "personally opposes capital punishment" but a spokesman said that he "has not taken a position on the bill" which "allows for the death penalty to be imposed if the accomplice has the same intent as the killer."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Seale Seeks Dismissal Of Charges In 1964 Civil Rights Slayings. The AP (1/27, Elliott) reports from Jackson, MS, "A reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men has asked a federal judge to dismiss the charges, saying the statute of limitations has expired." The AP continues, "Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester filed the motion Friday in U.S. District Court on behalf of James Ford Seale, who pleaded not guilty Thursday to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy. … U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said yesterday he had not seen the motion and could not comment." The AP adds, "Seale, 71, could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee. … Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

… A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities. … Seale and Edwards were arrested in the case in 1964. But the FBI — consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that summer — turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges. … The Justice Department reopened the case in 2000."

Two Men Shot By Maryland Official Released From Custody. The Washington Post (1/27, B1, Castaneda, Rich) reports, "Two critically wounded men who were shot by the No. 2 homeland security official in Prince George's County were released from police custody yesterday as the department backed off earlier statements that the men would probably face assault charges." The Post continues, "Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey determined yesterday that Robert White, 36, and Brandon D. Clark, 22, should no longer be in custody. 'The state's attorney's office did not want to rush to judgment. We believe that further inspection of the evidence and further interviews with all concerned parties is necessary before any charges are brought forward,' said Ramon Korionoff, Ivey's spokesman." The Post adds, "Michael J. Winkelman, an attorney for the men's families, said the decision means that their relatives will have free access to them in the hospital. … On Thursday, county police said assault charges were pending against the men, both furniture movers, for allegedly assaulting Cpl. Keith Washington, who is also a county police officer, in his Accokeek home Wednesday. They said then that Washington apparently acted in self-defense, based on statements from Washington and a family member whom they did not identify. The movers were unarmed, police said. … Yesterday, Sharon Taylor, the police department's top spokeswoman, said the statement that assault charges were pending 'was obviously based on preliminary information.'"

More Commentary. The Washington Post (1/27, A18) editorializes, "We don't presume to know what happened Wednesday night when Cpl. Keith Washington shot the two men making a delivery for Marlo Furniture at his home in Accokeek. We don't assume that the two men he shot, Brandon D. Clark and Robert White, were angels; Mr. White evidently has an arrest record, and Mr. Clark also has had a brush or two with the law. … But we do know that Cpl. Washington has been the subject of repeated complaints about his on- and off-duty behavior. The common thread is that he turns routine encounters into highly charged, violent incidents. In separate meetings of a homeowners association on whose board he served three years ago, Cpl. Washington assaulted a property manager, shoved the association's treasurer and berated the association's president, it was alleged. Earlier, Cpl. Washington was sued for wrongfully arresting and abusing a man who protested Cpl. Washington's allegedly rough treatment of a motorist involved in a fender bender; an initial $260,000 judgment against him was overturned on appeal." The Post concludes, "Cpl. Washington is a friend and political ally of County Executive Jack B. Johnson. In 2004, Mr. Johnson named Cpl. Washington to the newly created job of deputy director of homeland security for the county. At the time, we were among those questioning Mr. Johnson's judgment in appointing someone of Cpl. Washington's evidently deficient interpersonal skills. … Cpl. Washington, Mr. Clark and Mr. White all deserve a thorough, evenhanded investigation. What's on the line here is not only the reputation of a county police officer and the lives of two working men but the impartiality and judgment of police and prosecutors in Prince George's County."

Judge Orders Court Monitoring Of Philadelphia Jails. The AP (1/27) reports from Philadelphia, "A federal judge ordered city jails to go back under court monitoring, describing conditions there as overcrowded and squalid and saying that inmates lacked access to clean cells and adequate medical attention." The AP continues, "The judge, R. Barclay Surrick of Federal District Court, issued a scathing ruling on Thursday, saying that holding facilities were overflowing and that lockups at police stations were firetraps that violated detainees' constitutional rights. … The ruling came in a lawsuit filed last year on behalf of 11 inmates with the help of David Rudovsky, a University of Pennsylvania law professor who filed a similar suit 35 years ago. That case led to court oversight of the jails from 1971 to 2001." The AP adds, "Judge Surrick had toured the system, which holds roughly 8,800 inmates. … While waiting to be assigned to regular cells, detainees at one jail 'were forced to sleep overlapping one another and on every inch of concrete floor,' Judge Surrick wrote. 'Prisoners slept with their heads next to the toilet.' … Inmates would spend days 'without bedding provisions, sleeping, if they could, on metal benches or directly on the concrete floor,' he wrote. … The city solicitor, Romulo L. Diaz Jr., said Friday that officials were evaluating the decision. Mr. Diaz said the city remained committed to improving conditions and to developing a fire safety plan that would satisfy the court."

Professor Claims Baptist Seminary Dismissed Her Over Gender. The AP (1/27) reports from Fort Worth, TX, "A former theology professor at a prominent Southern Baptist seminary here said officials had told her to leave because women are biblically forbidden to teach men." The AP continues, "The professor, Sheri Klouda, said she was hired in 2002 to a tenure-track position as an assistant professor at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, where she taught Hebrew and had earned her doctorate. But in 2004, Dr. Klouda said, an administrator, whom she would not name, told her that the seminary's president, Paige Patterson, would not be recommending her for tenure because she was a woman, and that she should plan to move on." The AP adds, "Dr. Klouda said she continued teaching for two more years, receiving good evaluations and usually filling her classrooms. In January 2006, the same administrator told her she would no longer be able to teach but would be paid through the 2006-7 academic year. A couple of weeks later, she said, she was told she would be terminated at the end of 2006 instead. She appealed to Dr. Patterson in April, she said, to no avail."

New York Voting Machine Delays Continue. The AP (1/26, Humbert) reports, "It is highly unlikely new voting machines will be in place for this year's fall elections in New York and fully implementing them may have to wait until 2009, state election officials said Friday. … That could leave New Yorkers using the state's aging lever-action voting machines for yet another presidential election." The AP continues, "The prediction, from state Board of Election officials, came after state and county officials participated in two days of meetings about the situation this week with officials of the U.S. Justice Department. … 'Clearly, 2007 is going to be very difficult for us and they understand that,' said Peter Kosinski, the board's co-executive director. 'We are in discussions about what is doable.'" The AP adds, "Federal officials sued New York last year over its slowest-in-the-nation moves to comply with provisions of the federal Help America Vote Act, which was adopted after the disputed 2000 presidential election. HAVA was designed to get states to replace their aging voting systems with modern machinery. The plan was to have everything in place for the 2006 elections at the latest. … Under a court-approved settlement of the lawsuit, New York agreed to have new machinery in place that could be used by handicapped voters for the 2006 elections. Other voters continued to use lever-action machinery. … While the state Legislature and former Gov. George Pataki had adopted legislation last year that required new voting machines for all voters to be in place for the 2007 elections, testing of possible new machines for certification by the state has been repeatedly delayed. The deadline for certification was originally set for late last year, then moved to this March and further pushed back to May by the state board earlier this month."

Ohio Secretary Of State Proposes Conscripting Election Workers. The New York Times (1/27, A11, Driehaus) reports Ohio Secretary of State Jennifer L. Brunner (D) said that "the chronic shortage of election workers in Ohio could be solved by requiring residents to work at the polls the way they fulfill jury duty." She is "asking lawmakers to require conscripted workers to have two days of training and then work eight-hours on Election Day."

New York Delays Replacing Voting Systems. The New York Times (1/27, B2, Drew) reports, "New York officials have given up on replacing the state's aging voting machines by the fall elections, and some would like to put off buying new electronic voting systems until after the 2008 presidential election, state officials said yesterday. New York is the last state to update its machines, and the latest delay comes amid growing questions about the work of a laboratory that was hired to help test the machines being offered by five bidders." It "might be possible to have the new system ready for the presidential primary in March 2008."

Indiana Businessman Sentenced In Concrete Price-Fixing Scheme. The Indianapolis Star (1/27, Corcoran) reports, "The second of two ringleaders in a conspiracy to fix ready-mix concrete prices in the Indianapolis area was sentenced Friday to 14 months in federal prison." The Star continues, "Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney gave Gus 'Butch' Nuckols III, 46, Fishers, a sentence seven months shorter than the one the government had recommended. … Nuckols' sentence matched that of price-fixing conspirator Scott D. Hughey, 52, president of Hughey Inc., a company doing business as Carmel Concrete Products. Hughey was sentenced Dec. 14." The Star adds, "Nuckols held two secret meetings to fix prices from July 2000 through May 2004 at a horse barn on his property. … Antitrust officials estimate $37.5 million to $100 million in concrete sales by Nuckols' firm, Builder's Materials & Supply Co., were affected by the conspiracy to increase prices and limit discounts to major purchasers. In June, McKinney fined Nuckols' company $4 million. The company also had pleaded guilty to an antitrust violation. … During sentencing, McKinney said he was concerned about an interview Nuckols gave WISH (Channel 8) in December. In the interview, the president and owner of the Fishers-based company said market 'prices were eroding, and we probably did what any businessman would do.' Nuckols also referred to fallout from the FBI and Justice Department investigation as 'a hassle.' … 'Tell me why I shouldn't be concerned about that,' McKinney said to Nuckols in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis. 'I want to be sure you really understand what you did was against the law.' … Nuckols was contrite during his sentencing, saying he had brought shame upon himself, his family and his company and employees through his leadership of the conspiracy, which potentially affected hundreds of millions of dollars in spending on public and private projects. … Jonathan A. Epstein, an attorney for the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, asserted Nuckols was 'saying all the right things' at his sentencing but had minimized his role in the conspiracy during trial testimony in December and in the TV interview."

Delta Creditors May Seek To Extend US Airways Bid Deadline. Bloomberg (1/27, Schlangenstein, Onge) reports, "Delta Air Lines Inc.'s creditors may ask US Airways Group Inc. to extend the Feb. 1 deadline on its hostile takeover bid as they study competing plans for the bankrupt carrier's future, people familiar with the matter said." Bloomberg continues, "The nine-member committee of unsecured creditors is split between those favoring a quicker payback of their claims through a US Airways merger and those who would benefit under a Delta plan to emerge from court protection as an independent company, said the people, who didn't want to be identified because the discussions are private." Bloomberg adds, "US Airways wants the panel to urge Atlanta-based Delta, which operates a hub at Salt Lake City International Airport, to open its financial records and trigger a U.S. antitrust review. If the committee doesn't act by Feb. 1, the $9.67 billion offer expires, Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker has said. … US Airways probably would extend its deadline if the creditors 'said one single positive thing about the deal,' said Jim Corridore, a New York-based analyst for Standard & Poor's. 'All they need to do is allow the process to continue. This is not a selection of one plan over the other.' … An extension would give the creditors' panel more time to debate US Airways' merger plan and Delta's bid to leave bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline by mid-2007, the people said."

Hynbix Denied Bid For New Antitrust Trial In Rambus Dispute. Bloomberg (1/27, News) reports, "Hynix Semiconductor Inc. lost a bid to revisit a $133.4 million damage award to Rambus Inc. in a patent lawsuit over computer memory-chip technology, as a federal judge said he may decide next month whether to allow the case to move into its final phase." Bloomberg continues, "Rambus shares surged as much as 11 percent. U.S. District Judge Ronald Whyte in San Jose, Calif., said a new trial on damages can't happen until the final phase of the lawsuit, which will address antitrust, unfair competition and fraud claims." Bloomberg adds, "The judge Friday set a hearing for Feb. 16 to decide whether he should delay that phase until the U.S. Federal Trade Commission issues its penalty in an antitrust suit against Rambus, a designer of computer memory chip interfaces. … A federal jury in April awarded Rambus $307 million in its dispute with Ichon, South Korea-based Hynix, the world's second- largest memory chipmaker."

Rivals Renew Complaints About Microsoft's Vista. The AP (1/27) reports, "Rivals of Microsoft renewed their call Friday for European regulators to act against what they say are 'illegal practices,' charging that the new Vista operating system is the company's effort to extend its monopoly to the Internet." The AP continues, "They asked the European Commission to make a decision 'as fast as possible' on a complaint they filed last February. It had accused Microsoft of working to keep its existing monopolies and trying to extend its market dominance into other areas, including Web-based computing." The AP adds, 'Microsoft had no immediate comment beyond saying that the rivals — represented by the European Committee for Interoperable Systems — were not saying anything new. The company has described the group as a front for I.B.M. and other competitors that have tried to use regulatory complaints to their business advantage. .. .The group said Microsoft's XAML markup language — which it said was positioned to replace the current Web page language HTML — was designed 'from the ground up to be dependent on Windows.' … 'The very same practices the European Commission found to be illegal almost three years ago have now been implemented in Vista,' the group of rivals said. .. A spokesman for the group, Thomas Vinje, said Microsoft was seeking to impose its own Windows-dependent standards and displace existing ones."

Jury Clears Broadcom Of Patent Infringement Allegations. The AP (1/27, Spagat) reports, "A federal jury ruled Friday that Broadcom Corp. did not infringe on two of rival semiconductor maker Qualcomm Inc.'s patents for video compression technology, Broadcom said." The AP continues, "The nine-day trial, the latest turn in a long-running legal battle between the two companies included testimony from both chairmen, Broadcom's Henry Samueli and Qualcomm's Irwin Jacobs." The AP adds, "Lou Lipin, Qualcomm's general counsel, told the San Diego Union-Tribune the company was disappointed with the verdict and had not decided whether to appeal. The verdict comes amid a fierce attack against Qualcomm's business model by Broadcom, Nokia Corp. and other wireless equipment makers who say Qualcomm charges excessive royalties for rights to its patented inventions." The AP notes, "Qualcomm accused Broadcom of violating two patents for the compressing of video signals - technology that is used in DVD players, digital televisions and iPod music players. … Qualcomm has filed numerous lawsuits that accuse Broadcom of infringing on a combined 10 patents and misappropriating trade secrets. Broadcom has filed lawsuits that accuse Qualcomm of violating a total of 18 patents, and is one of six companies that has asked the European Commission to investigate Qualcomm's business practices."

Bank Of America In Alliance Talks With Countrywide. The Financial Times (1/27, Ben White, Politi) reports, "Bank of America and Countrywide Financial have held discussions about an alliance that would create the biggest mortgage lending group in the US, people close to the matter said." The Times continues, The talks are said to be at an early stage and may not lead to a deal. But if they proceed, the negotiations could lead to a joint venture between the two companies, under which BofA would use its big branch network to help sell home mortgages originated by Countrywide. Countrywide would have the support of BofA's far bigger balance sheet to fund its lending." The Times adds, "The talks could also lead to an acquisition of Countrywide by BofA, which is eager to expand its mortgage lending business to match its breadth in credit cards. Such an acquisition would probably cost BofA, the second-biggest US bank, about $30bn, analysts said. … The talks indicate that BofA continues to focus on expansion in the US in spite of recent reports that it might be interested in buying UK bank Barclays. Ken Lewis, chief executive, has said a major foreign acquisition would be difficult for BofA to execute."

Nasdaq Declines To Boost Bid For London Stock Exchange. The New York Times (1/27, Timmons) reports, "Nasdaq said on Friday that it did not plan to raise its offer for the London Stock Exchange, just before a deadline to do so, damping investors' expectations. Investors have until Feb. 10 to tender their shares for a deal, but any changes in the bid would have to happen this weekend unless a rival bidder emerges. … That is generally seen as unlikely, though any such deal would not happen quickly, because the N.Y.S.E. is just starting to absorb pan-European exchange Euronext." The Times continues, "The exchange's shares have fallen over the last week as investors who were hoping for a higher price than Nasdaq's initial $5.3 billion bid head for the door. … If the deal does not go through, Nasdaq has to walk away for a year, possibly leaving the door open to other bidders. Shares of the London Stock Exchange rose 12 pence on Friday, to £12.95, above Nasdaq's 1,243 pence-a-share offer." The Times adds, "Nasdaq already owns 28.8 percent of the London exchange and needs an additional 21 percent to take control. Nasdaq has hinted that it could reduce its position, but many other investors think that is a bluff designed to persuade them to tender their shares of stock for the hostile offer."

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B3, Macdonald, Teitelbaum) reports, "Nasdaq could have raised its offer until a deadline at midnight Saturday if the LSE's board had agreed to a new bid. Under United Kingdom takeover rules, Nasdaq will no longer be able to increase its offer for the LSE unless a rival bidder appears, which most analysts see as being unlikely. … If Nasdaq aimed to spook the LSE's investors into selling -- something the London exchange has accused it of trying to do in the past -- the ploy has failed for the moment. The LSE's shares closed 4.2% higher than Nasdaq's offer at £12.95 Friday, on heavy volume."

Bush Seen As Shifting Views On Climate Change, Emission Caps. The Washington Post (1/27, A1, Baker, Mufson) reports in a front-page story, "President Bush's commitment to fight global warming in his State of the Union address this week has echoed around the world and provoked debate about whether he is shifting his view of climate change." While, "leaders in Europe and Asia took notice…, hailing what they saw as a turning point while renewing pressure on Bush to accompany words with more meaningful action," environmentalists "were skeptical but said Bush may be starting to respond to the growing political momentum for grappling with climate change." The plan is credited to the president's concern with "energy security" and to efforts by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman and FedEx Chairman Frederick W. Smith. Former EPA administrator Christine Todd Whitman called it "a step forward" and said that "Bush may be willing to sign carbon emission caps into law."

Alternative Fuels Plan Examined. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A7, Timiraos) reports that under the president's plan, "ethanol demand could pressure the corn supply" and "almost half of the country's corn harvest could go toward the fuel." In addition, "ethanol costs between $1.45 and $1.65 a gallon to produce and is less efficient than gasoline." The plan is also said to have "an apparent contradiction" because "ethanol gets less gas mileage than gasoline" and so "could undermine efforts to achieve increased fuel economy."

WSJournal Criticizes Alternative Fuels Plan. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A8) writes in an editorial criticizing the President's "big push for alternative fuels" calling it "a classic political stampede rooted more in hope and self-interest than science or logic." The plans "would, at present corn yields, require the entire U.S. corn harvest" and that "isn't such good news." Ethanol "increases the level of nitrous oxides in the atmosphere and thus causes smog." It is "less efficient than ordinary gasoline" and it "cannot be shipped using existing pipelines." It also "barely makes a dent" in reducing "greenhouse gas emissions by no more than 5%." So "here comes Big Corn. Make that Very, Very Big Corn. Sooner or later, our experience with this huge public gamble may make us yearn for the efficiency, capacity, lower cost and -- yes -- superior environmental record of 'Big Oil.'"

NYTimes Questions Cost Of Expanding Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The New York Times (1/27, A16) writes in an editorial, "One of the stranger and so far unexplained items in President Bush's energy program is his proposal to double the capacity of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve." While, "a larger reserve would seem to make sense in the post-9/11 world … is there nothing better to do with the money? Might it not be more usefully deployed developing alternative fuels or more efficient vehicles."

Bush Proposes Increase In Coastal, Marine Conservation Programs. The AP (1/26) reports, "President Bush on Friday proposed an 8% increase in the $1.75 billion federal budget for coastal and marine conservation programs." Under the proposal, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration "would receive $123 million" for "research and…ocean protections" while "Another $20 million would go to the National Science Foundation and the U.S. Geological Survey, helping increase research, sea floor mapping, forecast models, and water quality monitoring in the Gulf of Mexico, Chesapeake Bay and other coastal areas."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Coca Heritage Under Siege. The AP (1/27, Goodman) reports from Bogata, Colombia, "You're unlikely to see Milena Bonilla's artwork on display in a New York gallery. Just mounting one of her installations inside the United States could land the 30-year-old artist in jail. … That's because, instead of oil on canvas, Bonilla's preferred medium is coca leaf, the base ingredient for cocaine. Classified as a dangerous substance, importing the plant is a felony without U.S. Justice Department permission." The AP continues, "The stalky shrub, which Bonilla planted in 12 two-liter plastic Coca-Cola bottles sheared off at the spout, is getting a makeover by a cadre of artists who want to wrest coca's millennial heritage and aesthetic appeal from the teeth of the war on drugs. … But the main target of so-called coca art may be Colombia President Alvaro Uribe, who has become the plant's chief eradicator as caretaker of the United States' $4 billion war on drugs." The AP adds, "Amid an upsurge in anti-American sentiment, several leftist leaders in the Andes have embraced the virtues of the much-maligned leaf even as the conservative Uribe - Washington's staunchest regional ally - has committed himself to its annihilation. … When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice first met with President Evo Morales of Bolivia in Chile, the former coca grower presented her with a charango - a Bolivian ukulele - decorated with lacquered coca leaves. To avoid a run-in with U.S. customs authorities, the diplomat left the present behind. President Alan Garcia of Peru, who is a relative moderate in the region, suggested to foreign journalists that the calcium-rich leaf tastes great in a salad. … Bonilla's installation, 'Legal Consumption,' was one of a handful invited last year to partake in the 40th National Salon of Artists, a showcase of Colombia's most innovative artists. She calls it a meditation on the hypocrisies of a marketplace that commercially exploits a plant most countries ban in its natural form. … But under Uribe, the plant's namesake habitat has been under constant assault by U.S.-supplied crop duster planes that chemically eradicated a record 445,000 acres of the plant last year - 31 percent more than in 2005, also a record year."

FBI To Join LAPD In Targeting Cross-Border Gangs. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Helfand, McGreevy) reports, "Seeking to combat the spread of street gangs across international borders, the FBI will join forces with Los Angeles police and prosecutors next month to teach authorities from Mexico, El Salvador and other Latin American countries how to better track and investigate gang crime." The Times continues, "The three-day training in Los Angeles comes amid an alarming increase in 'transnational' gangs that move between countries despite repeated efforts to dismantle their organizations and finances, authorities said. … The U.S. law enforcement officials will focus much of their attention on how they have dealt with local gangs that have gained footholds in Mexico and Central America." The Times adds, "Special attention will be given, for example, to the MS13 and 18th Street gangs, both of which began in Los Angeles but have branched out to Central America, federal officials said. About 12 of 17 members of the 18th Street gang arrested in Los Angeles in September were foreign nationals, the officials said. .. .The training will include discussions about which laws countries use — or do not use — to attack gang problems. El Salvador, for example, does not allow wiretapping, a strategy employed by U.S. authorities to monitor gang activity. … The interagency training Feb. 7-9 will occur as Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton unveil their strategies for dealing with the city's own 39,000 gang members. They are expected to call for a multi-agency effort using court orders, injunctions and stepped-up enforcement to target Los Angeles' most dangerous gangs. Among those expected to attend the FBI summit are Bratton, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca and representatives of the city attorney and district attorney."

Suspected Drug Cartel Boss Hires Texas Attorney. The McAllen (TX) Monitor (1/27, Martinez) reports, "Suspected Gulf Cartel leader Osiel Cardenas-Guillen has hired prominent McAllen lawyer Roberto Yzaguirre as part of his defense team in a federal drug case that prompted Cardenas' extradition from Mexico a week ago." The Monitor continues, "Cardenas-Guillen, who faces a 17-count indictment out of Brownsville, was flown to the United States on Jan. 19 with 14 other fugitives. … He appeared in court once this week, but the judge closed the proceedings to the public. His arraignment is set for Feb. 1 in Houston. It's unclear whether the trial will be in Brownsville or Houston." The Monitor adds, "Yzaguirre defended the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel's former head, Juan Garcia Abrego, in another federal drug case in 1996. Unlike Cardenas, who was first tried in Mexico before being extradited, Mexican authorities whisked Garcia out of the country without a trial the day after he was arrested. .. .U.S. Justice Department officials told reporters Monday that Cardenas-Guillen was responsible for smuggling 4 to 6 tons of cocaine a month into the United States from 1999 to 2003. They also claimed he is responsible for a majority of the violence associated with drug cartels during the last few years, including the attempted murder of FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Matamoros. .. Cardenas-Guillen had been running the cartel from his prison cell in Mexico since 2003, according to Mexican authorities. … Yzaguirre was also the lawyer for Guillermo Gonzalez Calderoni, Mexico's former drug czar. Calderoni led Mexico's effort against drug cartels in the early 1990s, but later fled the country after rumors spread that he protected some cartels."

Video Of Marshals Shooting In DC Recovered. WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC (1/27, Statter) reports, "The shooting of a 16 year old by US Marshals is caught on camera. An attorney for the teen wounded on January 3 on 4th Street Southeast, says he recovered video from 4 different cameras. … David Shurtz says the images paint a different picture than the story given by a US Marshals Service spokesman." WUSA-TV continues, "On the day of the shooting the spokesman said deputy marshals working an eviction fired on a teenager who tried to run them over with a car. Shurtz says the video doesn't show any deputy marshal in danger of being hit by the vehicle. Shurtz and the teen's mother believe their is a cover-up by the Marshals Service." WUSA notes, "Spokesman Dave Turner denies there is a cover up. Here is Turner's complete statement sent by email Thursday to 9NEWS NOW: … 'The U.S. Marshals Service takes this shooting incident very seriously. We are processing the case according to our standard procedures, which call for the initial investigation to be conducted by the Metropolitan Police Department. That's underway right now, and we're cooperating with them to the fullest extent. There isn't 'a cover up' because we're responding appropriately to the investigation. After the completion of MPD's independent investigation, this agency will receive the matter for internal review to see if there were any violations of our own policies, or Justice Department's.'"

Former ATF Agent Cross-Examined In Chicago Suit. The Chicago Tribune (1/27) reports, "Lawyers for the city of Chicago and former Police Officer Joseph Miedzianowski on Friday cross-examined a one-time ATF agent who contends she lost her job after confronting the officer about corruption." The Tribune continues, "Diane Klipfel and her husband are suing the city, alleging that Miedzianowski was protected and turned internal investigations against them after they tried to bring his activities to light in 1992. … Miedzianowski was arrested six years later and was convicted of running a Chicago-to-Miami drug ring." The Tribune adds, "The attorneys attempted to show that Klipfel had significant issues with her ATF employers that had nothing to do with a detail she worked with Miedzianowski. They went through Klipfel's history of filing complaints against her bosses and asked about some of the reasons she may have been dismissed from ATF."

Judge Declares Mistrial In Alabama Bomb Trial. The Mobile (AL) Press-Register (1/26, Kirby) reports, "Jurors weighing criminal charges against accused bomb maker Gregory Wendell Nichols reported Thursday that they were hopelessly deadlocked, prompting the judge to declare a mistrial." The Press-Register continues, "The charges remain pending, unless federal prosecutors in Mobile move to dismiss them. They said they will confer among themselves before deciding whether to try the case again." The Press-Register adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Anderson asked Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Emmett "Rip" Cox to set the case for March, which would give prosecutors an extra month to decide if they want to proceed. He stated in a written motion that a February setting would not give enough time to either side to coordinate with their expert witnesses from out of town. He also indicated that both sides would like to explore the possibility of a plea bargain. … Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden said he does not know whether the U.S. attorney's office ultimately plans to take another shot at the 46-year-old car salesman from Flomaton. … Acting on a tip, agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5. Getting permission to search his pickup truck, they found five explosive devices and charged him with violations of federal firearms laws."

IMMIGRATION:

Unions Divided Over Immigration Reform. The Washington Post (1/27, D1, Williams) reports, "Union leaders are fundamentally divided over how to best tackle immigration reform." The Service Employees International Union "backs the guest-worker idea" while the AFL-CIO, "calls guest-worker programs exploitative and wants immigrants who enter the country to do so as permanent residents, not temporary workers." The SEIU "advocates a guest-worker program with visas that would let workers change jobs, join unions and petition for permanent residency." That "reflects a desire to create politically tenable immigration reform." But, it is "nothing like the president's plan" or "the guest-worker provisions floated in Congress." So "finding middle ground could be tough."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Iraq Policy Is Focus Of Bush Meeting With House Republicans. RollCall.com (1/26, Davis) reports, "President Bush spent nearly two hours at the House Republican retreat today in further efforts to build support for his Iraq War strategy and to allay concerns that Congressional Republicans could be sidelined in the legislative process under Democratic control." House Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor of Virginia said that "recent Whip meetings have shown encouraging signs that the GOP may be more unified than Democrats anticipate" on Iraq. House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam of Florida described the meeting as "a full discussion."

The New York Times (1/27, A12, Hulse) describes House Republicans as "hunkered down on the Eastern Shore" as they "struggled to come to grips with their new minority status and the challenge of the continuing war in Iraq." Bush "exhorted" them "to work with him on education, health care, immigration and retirement issues and to give his troop buildup in Iraq a chance to work." The president also "took more than a dozen questions from lawmakers in a closed session." Republican leaders said that the appearance "bolstered the Republican rank and file, which will face a fight over a Democratic resolution opposing the president's new strategy." Still, "there is deep skepticism among even these loyalists about whether his new Iraq plan will work." The meeting was also addressed by former speaker Newt Gingrich "who urged them to think big" and former Notre Dame football coach Lou Holtz, who "delivered what was described as a rousing motivational speech."

The Washington Times (1/27, Bellantoni) reports, "President Bush yesterday rallied House Republicans" telling them "the party can unite around his domestic agenda" and "explained the importance of success in Iraq without explicitly asking them to support his plan." A "private session" was described as "a 'frank,' 'unabashed,' 'good family discussion.'" Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said that "most members support a Republican resolution calling for the creation of a bipartisan panel to oversee the implementation of the troop surge and setting benchmarks for the plan's progress."

Upcoming Bush Meeting With House Democrats Seen As Helpful On Energy, Immigration. The Wall Street Journal's Gerald Seib (1/27, A2) writes, "President Bush travels to Williamsburg, Va., next Saturday to meet with the entire House Democratic delegation" in "a real 'Kumbaya' moment for the nation's leaders … While it lasts." The meeting "was the brainchild of Rep. Rahm Emanuel" and "a senior White House aide characterizes" it "as a way to open some lines of communication, which in turn might help build some trust." Seib argues that while "it's increasingly obvious there simply won't be any bipartisan understanding on the biggest issue of the year, Iraq," there is "limited time, and a limited set of issues, energy and immigration the most interesting among them, for which something bipartisan can actually happen." Seib concludes that, in Texas "Bush developed a reputation for working the Democratic side pretty well, and he got meaningful results to show for it."

Bush Health Care Proposal Said To Favor Policies That Benefit Wealthy. The Washington Post (1/27, A8, Lee) reports, "President Bush likes to say that his health-care proposal would 'level the playing field' between people who get health coverage through their job and those who buy it on their own. But experts said yesterday that it would tilt that field toward…a high-deductible plan paired with a special tax-exempt health savings account." That is said to "benefit the wealthy and undercut Bush's goal of bringing fairness to the private health insurance system." The president's plan also "faces opposition from Democrats in Congress." Experts are said to expect that "more people would sign up for" high-deductible policies and HSAs if the plan were adopted, "because they tend to have lower premiums and to allow consumers to accumulate money tax-free."

No Child Left Behind Act Reauthorization Expected To Include High School Reform. The Washington Times (1/27, Fagan) reports in a front-page story, "Educators, lawmakers and the White House are indicating that high school reform should be included in this year's renewal of the No Child Left Behind law, and the discussion about what it will include is already under way." The administration "included several new high school requirements in its NCLB proposal" and U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings has said, "I think something can and will happen this year on high school reform." Bob Wise, president of the Alliance for Excellent Education (AEE), speaking at a Capitol Hill conference yesterday said, "If we're going to do significant high school reform, this is the vehicle, this is the year." Democratic leaders of the House and Senate education committees "already have indicated an openness to tackling high school reform."

Bush Approval Up To 32% In Zogby Poll. A Zogby poll of 1,000 likely voters taken January 24-26 (+/- 3.2%) finds a slight increase in President Bush's approval rating, up to 32% from 30% in a December Zogby survey. Fifty percent of those who saw Bush's State of the Union address approved of it, while 42% disapproved. And while just 10% of Democrats approve of Bush's job performance, 26% of Democrats approved of the State of the Union speech.

Among independents, 22% approve of Bush's job performance, and 37% approved of the speech. Among Republicans, 63% approve of Bush's job performance, and 84% approved of the speech. On Iraq, 24% of all respondents approve of Bush's performance, while 75% disapprove. However, the poll found that 37% think the war has been worth the loss of US lives, up from 34% in December.

Newest Coast Guard Cutter Significantly Flawed. The Washington Post (1/27, Merle, Hsu, 690K) reports in a highly critical front-page article, "The Coast Guard's newest cutter, the flagship of a $24 billion plan to modernize the nation's coastal fleet, suffers from significant design flaws, and the service has failed to properly supervise the contractors doing the work, government inspectors have found." According to a study "scheduled to be released Monday," the ship "would be limited in its ability to venture far from U.S. shores in search of drug smugglers and terrorists." The Coast Guard and its contractors Lockheed and Northrop Grumman "hindered the audit of the program, known as Deepwater, after ignoring years of warnings from technical experts about the ships' designs, the report says."

WSJournal Says Senate Democrats Voted Against Restraint On Earmarks. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A8) writes in an editorial, "The next time Senate Democrats preach spending restraint, readers may want to recall this week's vote on the line-item veto. The new majority had a perfect opportunity to add a new check on spending earmarks but quickly passed it by." The Journal notes that Sens. Evan Bayh (IN) and Joseph Lieberman (CT) were the only Democrats supporting "the spending restraint they've preached" while Sen. Richard Shelby (AL) was the lone Republican who "voted for his beloved pork-barrel power."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Attend To Need For Accurate Census. The New York Times (1/27, A16) writes in an editorial on the need for an accurate census, arguing "planning for the 2010 count is already imperiled. The dangers fall into two categories: money (too little) and politics (too much)." Congress "must begin by reinstating the roughly $50 million that was cut from the current census budget by the previous Congress." Congress "should also hold hearings to air the reasons behind the abrupt resignation last November of the director of the Census Bureau and the equally sudden departure of his deputy director." It "should send a clear message that the White House must choose new census directors whose professional qualifications and impartiality are above reproach."

Pelosi Criticized For Exempting American Samoa From Minimum Wage Bill. Malia Zimmerman of the Hawaii Reporter writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, A8), "Nancy Pelosi led the effort in the U.S. House during her first week as speaker to increase the minimum wage to $7.25 per hour from $5.15. In the process she ensured that American Samoa, a U.S. territory, is exempt from the wage hike, but did not exempt the Marianas Islands." StarKist and Del Monte have "packing plants in American Samoa" and are "headquartered in California." American Samoa Delegate Eni Faleomavaega "argued that raising the minimum wage 'would devastate the local tuna industry.'" American Samoa "has historically treated its workers poorly, with many instances of human rights abuses, and paid them pittances, besides." Zimmerman questions Pelosi's support for "honest government" and "blue-collar workers" and concludes, "in addition to House speaker, Ms. Pelosi can add 'ethically challenged' to her resume."

OTHER NEWS:

Durable Goods, Housing Sectors Strong In December. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A3, Corkery, Whitehouse) reports, "The manufacturing and housing sectors exhibited some unexpected strength in December, although economists were cautious about both reports. The Commerce Department reported that new orders for durable goods…rose 3.1% in December from a month earlier. A surge in aircraft orders accounted for a large part of the gain, but orders for 'core' capital goods excluding defense and aircraft were also up at a good clip. That category, which counts everything from telephones to machine tools and is viewed as a measure of business investment, rose 2.4% in December." In a separate report, the Commerce Department said "new-home sales recovered in December, rising 4.8% from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.12 million units. But many economists cautioned that the monthly number may have been exaggerated. For one, unusually warm weather in December may have confounded seasonal adjustments meant to compensate for lower activity in winter." The Financial Times (1/27, Callan) says the economy "showed signs of renewed strength on Friday as data revealed unexpected growth in the housing sector and orders for big-ticket manufactured goods rose." The news "make it less likely that the Federal Reserve will consider cutting interest rates in the coming months." The Washington Post (1/27, D6, Deane) and the New York Times/AP (1/27, C3) also report the housing numbers.

ABC World News (1/26, story 6, 1:25, Gibson) reported, "The sales of new and existing homes dropped 10% last year. That translates to about 800,000 fewer homes sold. So, the obvious question -- is the market going to turn back up?" ABC (Stark): "It would be more accurate to say right now it's stabilizing and finding a bottom after a deep slide. There are signs that buyers are out there and looking again, in part because there was warm weather. And the mortgage rate is down half a point since July. It's an awful lot of unsold homes out there. But realtors say they're seeing more activity, more looking than they've seen in a couple of years. As we head into spring, that's good news."

Stocks End "Volatile Week" Mixed. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B1, Browning) reports, "The pundits weren't kidding when they said the stock market could be more volatile this year. The Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to its 26th record finish in four months on Wednesday, and then promptly plunged 119 points on Thursday, its largest point or percentage decline in two months. It fell an additional 15.54 points, or 0.12%, on Friday, to 12487.02 and now is little changed since the year began, up just 0.2%. For the week, the blue-chip average was down 0.6%." The New York Times/AP (1/27, C6) also says it was a "volatile week" on Wall Street. The S&P 500 "was down 1.72 points, or 0.12 percent, at 1,422.18," while the Nasdaq "rose 1.25 points, or 0.05 percent, to 2,435.49."

Dollar "Seesawed Indecisively" Friday. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B4, Lindenmayer) says the dollar "seesawed indecisively Friday, making few intra-session gains as the market awaits additional U.S. data" and the upcoming Fed meeting. Late Friday, "the euro stood at $1.2913 from $1.2935 late Thursday. The dollar stood at 121.595 yen from 121.14 yen late Thursday, while the euro stood at 157.00 yen from 156.72 yen late Thursday."

Crude Oil Futures Top $55. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B4, Farivar) reports crude oil futures "jumped above $55 a barrel Friday to their highest level in more than two weeks as freezing temperatures around the East Coast raised the prospect of increased consumption of heating fuel." The March crude contract "rose $1.19, or 2.2%, Friday to $55.42 a barrel" in New York.

Clinton Makes First Campaign Trip To Iowa.

The Washington Post (1/27, A2, Kornblut, Balz) reports that when Sen. Hillary Clinton hits Iowa this weekend, "she will encounter unfamiliar terrain -- a landscape where she is not the perceived front-runner for the Democratic nomination" for president. While Clinton "appears formidable at the national level, she has not built up a lead in Iowa," where John Edwards leads most polls at present. Gov. Chet Culver "met with Clinton shortly after she arrived Friday afternoon" but "is remaining neutral." Culver said, "This is anyone's race to win. … That's the wonderful thing about the caucus process. The winner will have to earn it." The Post says that "puts Clinton in the unusual position of having to prove herself against other Democrats, and having to build up a political infrastructure in Iowa at a time when many rivals already have a head start." Newsday (1/27, Thrush) says that after her "two-day political tour of Iowa," Clinton will head off on "rapid-fire excursions to New Hampshire, South Carolina and California."

Newsday notes Clinton has not been in Iowa since 2003, which Roger Simon also notes in The Politico (1/27). Simon writes that that visit "was considered her first real signal that she might run for president some day. Now that day has arrived and Hillary is back. … 'Candidates need to spend a lot of time here,' Culver said. And spend lots of money. Iowa loves the money that the campaigns and media spend, but they love the attention much more."

Purdy Signs On For Clinton New Hampshire Campaign. The Politico (1/27, Distaso) reports "highly-regarded Democratic strategist Liz Purdy of Concord has signed on in a senior staff role" for Clinton's New Hampshire campaign. She "was the fund-raising director for former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen's successful 2000 campaign for a third term as governor," and was also "deputy campaign manager for Shaheen's unsuccessful bid for the U.S. Senate in 2002."

Huckabee To Create Presidential Exploratory Committee Monday. The AP (1/26, Demillo) reports ex-Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas will create a presidential exploratory committee Monday. Huckabee, a fierce foe of abortion rights and gay marriage, isn't the only conservative in the field and he faces a tough fight for the support of the GOP's right flank" from Sen. Sam Brownback and Reps. Duncan Hunter and Tom Tancredo.

Biden Will Make Campaign Official On Wednesday. The AP (1/26) reports Sen. Joseph Biden, "who has made no secret of his plans to run for president in 2008, says he will make it official next Wednesday." Biden is "one of his party's leading spokesmen on foreign affairs and plans to stress that expertise on the campaign trail." However, he is "generally regarded as a longshot."

Hunter First To Buy Ad Time In New Hampshire. On its Web site, the Boston Globe (1/26, Pindell) reports Rep. Duncan Hunter "is the first candidate to pay for television advertising time on New Hampshire airwaves for the 2008 presidential election. The ad, which began airing on WMUR-TV in Manchester today, shows Hunter in front of a fence on the border with Mexico." The advertisement is also airing in Iowa.

Giuliani's Indecision On Presidential Run Concerns Some Supporters. The New York Times (1/27, Roberts) reports on its front page that Rudy Giuliani, "who developed a national reputation for decisive and reassuring leadership after 9/11, now faces the odd challenge of having to reassure some supporters that he can be decisive about a very different issue: running for president." While he has created an exploratory committee, recruited a campaign team, and is visiting New Hampshire, "he has studiously avoided making a public commitment to run." In that state Friday, he said he "would not be rushed by contenders who are already entering the race. 'You should do it when you feel it's the right time,' he said. Despite the delay, his aides argue that the accelerated pace of early primaries next year actually benefits a well-established figure like Mr. Giuliani," especially with large, metropolitan states like California, Florida, Illinois, and New Jersey poised to jump to the front of the queue. But still, "doubts have been raised about the proverbial fire in his belly. Some New Yorkers in particular recall his decision" to quit his 2000 Senate campaign "after running for months and raising millions of dollars but never formally declaring his candidacy."

McCain's Campaign Finance Reform Support Could Conflict With Ambitions. The Politico (1/27) reports Sen. John McCain "will sponsor a bill to strengthen campaign finance laws in this session of Congress despite vehement opposition to campaign finance reform from conservative Republican activists whose support he needs to win the party's nomination for president in 2008." He "recently had appeared to be backing away from his support of campaign finance reform" and he "has declined to support two other campaign finance measures that reformers consider priorities: one would expand the public financing system for presidential elections, and another would require grassroots organizations to disclose their funding and expenditures." That "worried campaign finance reformers" but "McCain's campaign officials deny that he's backed away from supporting campaign finance reform."

Obama Gained Reputation As Coalition-Builder On Harvard Law Review. In a front-page profile, the Los Angeles Times (1/27, Serrano, Savage) looks at Sen. Barack Obama's early career, when "a deeply divided editorial staff chose him as the first African American to lead the prestigious" Harvard Law Review. It was "no small accomplishment. Obama, who at nearly 30 was older and more world-wise than most of his classmates, had to navigate among sharply drawn factions of conservatives and liberals to beat 18 other candidates for the job. Today, Obama's weighing of a bid for the White House has provoked questions about whether he has the experience to build a winning coalition of voters. But at Harvard Law Review he showed that -- on a much smaller scale -- he had the savvy to maneuver through turbulent political waters. … Interviews with more than a dozen people associated with the law review, both liberals and conservatives, found no one who did not profess respect for Obama."

4, 2:00, Williams) reported, "If you think the process of picking a president in this country starts early now, there may be a game changer on the way if some proposed changes to the presidential primary system become a reality." NBC (Mitchell): "Small states where candidates campaign in people's living rooms will be joined in the opening weeks much next year's campaign not only by Nevada and South Carolina, but by delegate rich mega-states, California, Florida, Illinois and New Jersey when expensive television advertising is king. That means a number of delegates, and perhaps the nominee, could be decided almost immediately. … The move, engineered by Hillary Clinton supporters, would help her survive to the next round. It could help other well funded candidates like Republican front runner John McCain. … The calendar could make it harder for dark horse candidates to break out."

Gibbons Says Candidates Will Walk "Political Tightrope" In Nevada. Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons discussed his state's early caucuses on MSNBC's Hardball (1/26, Matthews), saying, "Nevada is going to make all of these candidates walk a political tightrope. Because if you're on the evangelical or conservative on the Republican side, you're going to have to come out and support gaming, the industries that are important to Nevada. You are going to have look at where is your stand on Yucca Mountain, a very, very contentious issue." Asked if Hillary Clinton can win the Democratic caucuses, Gibbons said, "There have been a lot of glass ceilings broken by women in Nevada."

Change Of Control In Tennessee Senate Another Sign Of South's GOP Trend. The New York Times (1/27, A11, Emery) reports on the replacement of the Tennessee Senate speaker, "John S. Wilder, an 85-year-old Democrat who had been speaker since 1971," who has been replaced by "Ronald L. Ramsey, the first Republican to lead the body since Reconstruction." Wilder "comes from a wealthy West Tennessee cotton family" and was "the nation's longest serving state legislative leader." The change is said to show "a reality in the South: rising Republican strength in state politics." While, "as recently as the early 1990s, Democrats controlled every Southern legislature" today, "Republicans control both houses in Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia, while Democrats control those in Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana and North Carolina. In Mississippi and Tennessee, Democrats control the House and Republicans the Senate."

LATimes Urges Lobbyists To Report Efforts To Stimulate Grass-Roots Lobbying. The Los Angeles Times (1/27) writes in an editorial favoring a provision that was removed from "the recently enacted ethics bill in the Senate" to "require any organization that spends at least $25,000 to stimulate grass-roots lobbying to file detailed reports with Congress." Now "more modest proposals being discussed would be limited to organizations that already are registered as lobbyists." And "members of Congress have a right to know whether a campaign is the result not of a spontaneous sea change in public opinion but a professional operation."

El-Baradei Says Iran Plans Full-Scale Uranium Enrichment. The New York Times (1/27, Landler, Sanger, 1.16M) notes IAEA head Mohamed El-Baradei "said Friday that Iranian officials had told him that they planned to begin installing equipment next month in an industrial-scale plant to enrich uranium. Such a move would intensify Iran's confrontation with the Security Council, which has demanded a full suspension of the production of nuclear material, and has authorized mild sanctions." El-Baradei's statement "was coupled with a plea to both Tehran and Western nations for all sides to take a 'timeout' to head off a larger confrontation." He "proposed a suspension of the sanctions against Iran, while the Iranians simultaneously suspend enrichment of uranium." While "nuclear experts and American officials say Iran's announcement may be a bluff," El-Baradei "seemed clearly concerned that once enrichment began, it would be difficult to halt, and that Iranian officials would be loath to dismantle any plant once construction had begun. He is also concerned that such a plant could become a military target for the United States or Israel." Washington "said it would stick to its insistence that Iran stop enrichment before negotiations begin. The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the reports that Iran planned to install 3,000 centrifuges showed its continued defiance."

The AP (1/26, Jahn) cites UN statements that Tehran "plans to begin work next month on an underground uranium enrichment facility, as part of a plan to create a network of tens of thousands of machines turning out material that could be used to make nuclear arms." Those "comments were the first concrete confirmation that work on the facility would begin in February." Undersecretary Burns "warned the move would be a 'major miscalculation' by Iran. 'If Iran takes this step, it is going to confront universal international opposition. If they think they can get away with 3,000 centrifuges without another Security Council resolution and additional international pressure, then they are very badly mistaken.'"

Beirut Curfew Ends But Further Sectarian Strife Feared. The New York Times (1/27, A6, Bakri) reports, "Lebanese Army soldiers reinforced checkpoints and maintained a heavy presence in tense neighborhoods in Beirut on Friday, lifting a rare nighttime curfew that had been imposed to stop the worsening violence between pro- and antigovernment crowds." The Times adds from the capital, "If there was any optimism in this beleaguered city, it was framed around the hopeful notion that all sides had become so frightened by the violence that perhaps they would be willing to find a compromise to end the nation's internal political standoff." There remains in Beirut "a veneer of calm yet deep uncertainty as the Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah and its allies held funerals for two of their activists who had been shot near the university campus. Leaders on all sides, as they have from the beginning, called for unity to prevent Lebanon from sliding toward civil war."

An analysis piece in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, A4, Fam) is titled, "Lebanon Stands At Shiite-Sunni Brink." The recent violence "has again raised the specter of a civil war with a sectarian slant that echoes the growing regional Sunni-Shiite tensions. It also has underscored how combustible the stalemate has become between the Lebanese government and the opposition." Noting Beirut's history of "mass protests that were largely disciplined and peaceful," the Journal says Lebanese have "more recently seen a frightening escalation of unrest that troubles many Lebanese still recovering from the 15-year-old civil war that ended in 1990." Today's "political differences…have sectarian undertones, among other things. Lebanese Sunnis largely back the government, while the Shiite Hezbollah and other Shiite groups stand in the opposition. Christians are divided between the two camps." Also, "increasing polarization in the Middle East further aggravates this issue."

A 1,000-word analysis in the Washington Post (1/27, A10, Shadid) describes the emergence of Beirut's Old Airport Road as the separation line between Shiite and Sunni factions. "The emerging border evokes the old and the new of Lebanon's two-month-old crisis: civil war memories and the sectarian schism transforming Lebanon and the region around it." Describing yesterday's events, the Post says "calm returned Friday after the army imposed an overnight curfew and politicians urged their followers to retreat from the streets. … But the telltale specter of civil war lingered." The Post adds, "In the claustrophobia inspired by Lebanon's shoe-horned diversity, many Sunnis were upset that Shiites had dared to encroach upon what Sunnis consider their turf, and they set up their own checkpoints in the Bekaa Valley and on the coast south of Beirut. Along the Old Airport Road, residents wrestled with the knowledge that civil wars often start through accumulated accidents, not by design."

Spate Of Gaza Violence Derails Palestinian Talks. The Washington Post/AP (1/27, A13) reports, "Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a fighter from the rival Fatah movement Friday, witnesses said, sparking a deadly gun battle. The clash capped a day of factional violence across the Gaza Strip that killed at least 13 people, including a 2-year-old boy." The AP notes the one-year anniversary yesterday of Hamas' parliamentary election victory and calls the violence "among the deadliest in nearly two months." Under the headline, "Deadly Battles Shatter Gaza Calm," BBC.com (1/27) adds, "At least 13 people have died in some of the deadliest fighting between rival Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah in Gaza for months." Both sides "said they were suspending talks after the violence, which continued into the night. Both factions also kidnapped members of the opposing side during the day."

ABC World News (1/26, story 5, :10, Gibson) reported, "Still overseas, it's been a tumultuous day in the Palestinian territories. In Gaza, a sea of Hamas supporters to mark the victory in the Palestinian elections a year ago. But elsewhere, at least 13 people were killed, including a 2-year-old boy. One of the deadliest days in fighting between Palestinian factions." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Boudreaux, Alouf) adds, "Fourteen Palestinians died Friday in a resurgence of factional violence that marred the one-year anniversary of Hamas' victory in parliamentary elections. The daily death toll was one of the highest in the sporadic street fighting that has sunk the Palestinians deeper into chaos and poverty over the last year and complicated efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

Suicide Bomber Targets Islamabad Marriott Hotel. The New York Times (1/27, A7, Masood) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a Marriott hotel [in Islamabad] on Friday afternoon, killing himself and a security guard, the police and security officials said. At least five other people were wounded. No one immediately claimed responsibility." The Times calls the attack site "an upscale neighborhood of the Pakistani capital considered to be a high-security zone. Many foreign visitors stay at the Marriott, and important government and private functions are often held there. The prime minister and many of his cabinet ministers, members of Parliament and diplomats live nearby." The US Embassy "issued an advisory to American citizens in the country. 'The embassy strongly advises all Americans to avoid the area, exercise caution, and limit unnecessary travel,' the statement read."

Chinese Officer Says Space Will Be Weaponized. The Washington Times (1/27, A1, Lederer) reports Chinese Senior Colonel Yao Yunzhu "predicts that weapons will be deployed in outer space despite her government's long-standing desire to prevent an arms race there." Her "remarks were the first time a member of the Chinese military has commented on" Beijing's recent anti-satellite missile test. "The only other official comment, from the Foreign Ministry, offered the barest confirmation and repeated stock positions about China's wish to keep space free of weapons." The Times adds, "Without naming any country, but in an apparent reference to the United States, Col. Yao said if there's going to be 'a space superpower, it's not going to be alone, and China is not going to be the only one.'"

Russia Denounces Georgia's Detention Of Uranium Smuggler. The New York Times/AP (1/27, A4) notes Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "denounced on Friday the detention of a Russian man accused of trying to sell highly enriched uranium to Georgian agents, calling it a 'provocation.'" The AP calls Lavrov's statement "the first public comment by a named Russian official to claims by Georgia that it arrested and jailed a Russian man last year for trying to sell weapons-grade uranium to an agent posing as a rich foreign buyer." A likely confirmation that the uranium in question was weapons-grade "renewed concern about security at Russia's array of nuclear facilities. [It] also aggravated already high tensions between Russia and Georgia." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Holley) reports, "Russian authorities on Friday rejected as an overblown propaganda ploy the announcement this week that one of their citizens was arrested last year in Georgia while allegedly trying to sell a small amount of weapons-grade uranium."

Kasparov Works To Hold Together Anti-Putin Coalition. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A9, Kirkpatrick) profiles former world chess champion and Russian political activist Garry Kasparov. "His latest game is politics, and his style is equally aggressive." His "Putin antipathy is well known to readers of this newspaper, of which he is a contributing editor." Having "sounded an early warning about" Putin in 2001, his "new occupation is not without its perils." The Journal describes Kasparov's anti-Putin political coalition: "The next step for the Other Russia, Mr. Kasparov says, is to come up with a platform and work out the rules for selecting a presidential candidate, tasks that are on the agenda for a conference planned for April."

UK Investigators See Moscow Behind Litvinenko Killing. ABC World News (1/26, story 4, 2:50, Gibson) reported, "In Britain, officials there think they have solved the mystery of who killed the former Russian spy, Alexander Litvinenko. … Investigators believe that Litvinenko's killing was a state-sponsored hit." ABC (Ross): "British officials say they reached that conclusion based on forensic evidence and intelligence reports from inside the Russian intelligence services. Now, criminal charges could be filed as soon as next week. … Two months after his death, British authorities feel they have finally cracked the case, pointing to Moscow and the Russian secret service, the FSB, headquartered here." The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 5, :10, Couric) says the British believe the culprit was "another ex-spy who currently is in Moscow."

Kosovo Independence Drive Could Strain Russian Relations. The Financial Times (1/27, Dombey, MacDonald) reports Kosovo "is to declare independence in the next few months, with the tacit support of the EU and NATO, in an effort to resolve the eight-year impasse on the status of the province at the heart of the 1999 war between NATO and Belgrade." The Times cites source that believe Kosovo "will make its move and be recognised as independent by European Union and NATO countries once a United Nations resolution about its future – expected to stop short of granting independence – is agreed." Some "Western diplomats believe bilateral recognition of Kosovo's independence is the only way out of the dispute about the future of the province, but acknowledge they will have to work hard to prevent Serbia's objections destabilising the region as a whole." The Times adds that Brussels and Washington "see Kosovo as the biggest remaining source of instability in the Balkans. They intend to avoid either more rioting among Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority like that in March 2004 or an attempt by Belgrade to partition the province, over which it claims sovereignty."

The New York Times (1/27, A3, Smith) adds UN mediator Martti Ahtisaari "presented his proposals for the final status of Kosovo on Friday, most likely setting the tiny war-torn territory on its way toward independence." The Times calls Ahtisaari's presentation "an important and long-delayed step in resolving the still potentially explosive tensions that led to war in Europe eight years ago." The deal "would leave the former Yugoslav province free to declare independence from Serbia, according to Western diplomats who have seen the plan. But they say it would also impose international supervision, much like what exists in Bosnia, to provide protection for Kosovo's ethnic Serbs." The Times notes, "Even with the promise of international involvement, the diplomats say, Russia, a Serbian ally whose support is a crucial element, remains cool to the plan."

Under the headline, "Rift Widens Among Nations Over Kosovo," the AP (1/26, Kole) notes Moscow "is pressing for more time to examine a U.N. proposal for the future of Kosovo, Western and Russian officials said Friday, underscoring a widening rift between Moscow – a key ally of Serbia – and the United States and its European allies." The AP adds Moscow "is a traditional ally of Serbia, which considers Kosovo the heart of its ancient homeland and insists that it remain part of Serbian territory. Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority has been pushing for outright independence."

Japanese Decentralization Said To Leave Rural Areas Without Economic Support. A front-page New York Times (1/27, Onishi) piece highlights the Japanese city of Yubari as an example of Tokyo's attempts to "hew to its new policy of weaning rural Japan from the central government." Noting Yubari's bankruptcy because of "poorly thought-out" tourist attractions, the Times says the "imminent drop in the quality of life has led to recriminations and finger-pointing: at local politicians for lack of foresight, at Tokyo for feeding the rural addiction to public works." The national government's "attitude has led to anger that the central government is singling out Yubari as a warning to the countless other Yubaris across Japan. If the Yubaris can no longer count on the government to rescue them, the reasoning goes, they will start cutting costs on their own."

US Ambassador To Venezuela Tries To Cool Rhetoric But Says "Bags Are Packed." A brief item in the New York Times (1/27, A10, Romero) reports, "Diplomatic relations with the United States appeared to become more fragile as" Ambassador to Venezuela William Brownfield "responded to a threat of expulsion from President Hugo Chávez by saying, 'My bags are always packed and ready.'" Brownfield "also emphasized that he hoped to avoid further confrontation and to focus instead on issues of political and economic importance to both Caracas and Washington."

Eagleburger Discusses Chavez "Threat." Asked on Fox News (1/26, Asman) how big a "threat" Chavez poses to the US, ex-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger said, "Depends on what you mean by a threat. There's no question that he could make life difficult for us in that part of the world and he could make life difficult for us with some of the nonaligned, for example. … His ability to appeal to the Venezuelan people is a classic case of Latin American sort of a leader of this kind, this crazy kind if you will, and it only works so long as the populace of Venezuela sees some ability for a better standard of living. If at some point the economy really gets very bad, Chavez's popularity within the country will certainly decrease. And it's the one weapon we have against him to begin with…namely the economic tools of trying to make the economy even worse so that his appeal in the country and in the region goes down."

WPost Says Chavez's Attempt To Broaden Influence May Be Harmful. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (1/27, A18) touts "a remarkable year of democracy in Latin America" but says 2007 "has begun with attention focused on a handful of countries where democracy is dead, dying or in danger." Chavez "began his term this month with a flurry of authoritarianism," and "then rushed to attend the inaugurations of Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega and Ecuador's Rafael Correa, whom he hopes to convert into satellite leaders in a Venezuelan-led 'socialist' bloc. Bolivia's Evo Morales and an ailing Fidel Castro are already in Mr. Chavez's orbit; thanks to Venezuela's petrodollars, Cuba's totalitarian system may survive Mr. Castro's demise." Noting these leaders' recent actions, the Post concludes, "Ortega may understand something that [Chavez] and his would-be followers have yet to learn: Socialist economics are a recipe for impoverishment, while political power grabs tend to boomerang. The mini-bloc of Latin outliers poses little threat to the United States or the region's overall stability. But even as their neighbors consolidate democratic institutions and unprecedented prosperity, the people of Venezuela, Bolivia, Ecuador and Cuba may be headed for a miserable year."

"Turmoil" In Bolivian Politics Said To Endanger Morales. An extensive Los Angeles Times (1/27, McDonnell) piece previews the second year of Evo Morales' "embattled" presidency in Bolivia. Some "recent turmoil in" former Morales strongholds "has raised new questions about his leftist government's ability to serve out its five-year mandate." Although "a sense of normalcy has returned to Cochabamba" and other areas, "the paroxysm of rage has reverberated in national politics at a time when Morales' 'democratic revolution' was already facing fierce resistance." The Times adds, "Bolivia has a long history of forced ousting of governments, including many military coups. Morales won the presidency after protests chased out two previous presidents," and "even some of his longtime supporters have assailed the president for failing to quell the festering crisis in Cochabamba and instead opting to heap the blame elsewhere — mostly on his chief political rival here, Gov. Manfred Reyes Villa, a once-defeated presidential candidate now seemingly positioned for a future run."

Ghanaians Said To "Pressure" Annan To Seek Presidency. Under the headline, "Ghana Looks To Annan To Lead," the Washington Times (1/27, Palmer) reports, "If Kofi Annan's compatriots have their way, his retirement from the United Nations will have less to do with golf and grandchildren and more to do with presidential politics." Annan "sounded every bit like a candidate this week as he gave his first public address since stepping down as U.N. secretary-general last month." He "spoke of the promise of Africa, the spirit of change and prosperity enveloping the continent and the continued challenges that hamper its development. … The only thing he didn't say would be the words many Ghanaians long to hear -- that he will run in next year's presidential elections." Annan "has explicitly and repeatedly denied having any interest in turning to politics. He has said previously that he will split his time between his West African homeland and Sweden, the birthplace of his wife, Nane Maria." However, the Times adds, "With a hero's welcome and a reception far warmer than any visiting head of state, Mr. Annan has been getting not-so-subtle pressure from all quarters of his birth country."

UN General Assembly Backs Rejection Of Holocaust Denials. The Washington Post (1/27, Brubaker, 690K) reports the UN General Assembly ratified "a resolution, drafted by the United States and co-sponsored by 103 countries, that condemns denials of the Holocaust. The resolution came six weeks after a conference in Tehran, organized by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, questioned whether six million Jews were exterminated during World War II." For its part, Tehran "disassociated itself from [the] resolution, calling it a political exercise to deflect attention from Israel's 'atrocious' crimes." Acting Ambassador Alejandro Wolff "told reporters he was disappointed that more of the 192 U.N. delegates did not attend today's General Assembly session. 'Those who would deny the Holocaust -- and, sadly, there are some who do -- reveal not only their ignorance but their moral failure as well,' Wolff said in a statement."

Vaccine Alliance Pledges To Boost Retention Of Local Healthcare Professionals. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Piller) notes the GAVI Alliance said yesterday "that it would commit $500 million over three years to strengthen healthcare systems and train health workers in developing nations, addressing a key problem for implementing its vaccination programs." The GAVI Alliance "is moving to counter a massive outflow of health workers in developing nations where its training and immunization programs have proved most effective. Doctors and nurses, particularly from Africa, often seek higher wages in developed nations that also face shortages of health professionals." The Times adds that GAVI "is a partnership that includes national governments, the United Nations, World Bank, the vaccine industry and the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation," and says GAVI "has prevented 2.3 million deaths from diseases for which vaccines are available, including 600,000 lives saved last year, according to World Health Organization data released today."

Experts Believe Pyongyang Seeks Strong Ties With Washington. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (1/27, A19), former State Department analyst Robert Carlin and Stanford University professor John Lewis

write, "Those who think that dealing with North Korea is impossible are wrong. Unfortunately, those who think that it is, in fact, possible to deal with North Korea often are not much closer to the truth. The basic problem is that people of both views simply haven't figured out what it is that the North really wants." Discounting the economic "carrots" and "political steps" frequently offered to Pyongyang, Carlin and Lewis say of the Kim regime, "Above all, it wants, and has pursued steadily since 1991, a long-term, strategic relationship with the United States. This has nothing to do with ideology or political philosophy. It is a cold, hard calculation based on history and the realities of geopolitics as perceived in Pyongyang. The North Koreans believe in their gut that they must buffer the heavy influence their neighbors already have, or could soon gain, over their small, weak country." Seeking strong ties with Washington "is hard for Americans to understand," but Pyongyang dislikes the six-party process because those talks "are a microcosm of the strategic world it most fears. Three strategic foes -- China, Japan and Russia -- sit in judgment, apply pressure and (to Pyongyang's mind) insist on the North's permanent weakness."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter Seeks Monday Meeting With Gonzales Over Surveillance Suits. On its Web site, The Hill (1/26, Schor) reports, "Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, initiated a fast-paced oversight inquiry late Friday, asking Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a Monday meeting to explain reports of controversial legal maneuvers employed by the Justice Department in civil lawsuits against the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program." Specter "voiced 'deep concern' about what he deemed 'extraordinary procedures' allegedly utilized by Justice."

Rockefeller May Subpoena Documents On Domestic Surveillance. Bloomberg (1/26, Bliss) reports, "Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Jay Rockefeller said he may subpoena Bush administration documents on its controversial domestic surveillance program." Rockefeller "vowed he'll get details on a secret court's approvals of the program that targets suspected al-Qaeda members in the U.S." The Justice Department "indicated Jan. 24 that it was reluctant to share the rulings." Rockefeller "saved some of his harshest criticism for Cheney, who he said tried to block the committee's efforts to get information on intelligence operations."

ACLU Asks Court To Unseal Surveillance Program Documents. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Weinstein) reports, "The American Civil Liberties Union asked a federal court Friday to unseal secret documents filed by the Bush administration in support of its warrantless domestic surveillance program." A hearing "is scheduled for Wednesday at the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati." The Justice Department has requested that the case be dropped.

The AP (1/27) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the secret panel of judges who oversee the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is reviewing and approving applications to spy on people believed to be linked to al-Qaida. … 'There is, therefore, no longer any live genuine controversy to adjudicate,' the Justice Department wrote in its brief filed Thursday. … But the ACLU said that without more information about what the secret court has authorized, it can't determine if current activities are lawful. It said the Bush administration might return to surveillance outside the secret panel without a court order against it." The AP adds, "The ACLU also asked the court Friday to make public or give ACLU lawyers access to secret materials in the case filed by the government as classified. … The National Security Agency program, secretly launched in 2001, monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States when one party is believed to have terrorist links. It became public in December 2005. … The administration says the program has been an important tool in the fight against terrorism and has helped prevent attacks."

NYTimes Criticizes Administration's "Obsession With Secrecy" And "Assault On The Rule Of Law." The New York Times (1/27, A16) writes in an editorial, "We often wonder whether there is a limit to the Bush administration's obsession with secrecy, its assault on the rule of law, its disdain for the powers of Congress, its willingness to con the public and its refusal to heed expert advice or recognize facts on the ground. Events of the past week suggest the answer is no." Cheney is criticized for his appearance on CNN in which he "spoke of 'enormous successes'" in Iraq "and refused to pay even curled-lip service to consulting Congress." Then "in Friday's Times, Adam Liptak gave an account of the way the administration -- after grandly announcing that it was finally going to obey the law on wiretapping -- is trying to quash lawsuits over Mr. Bush's outlaw eavesdropping operations by imposing outrageous secrecy and control over the courts." The Times calls such efforts "Orwellian" and adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales routinely stonewalls legitimate Congressional requests for documents and information on a wide range of issues." In conclusion, "Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney claim that they are protecting the powers of the presidency" but "by abusing the government's legitimate right to claim secrecy in court hearings, they will make it harder for other presidents to do that when it is actually justified. And with that switch, they have done grievous harm to the credibility of the Oval Office and the country."

More Commnetary. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (1/27), syndicated columnist Jacob Sullum writes, "The skeptics who doubt that 21,000 more troops will be the difference between war and peace in Iraq may be underestimating the Bush administration, which recently demonstrated it can do the impossible. This month, after violating the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) by eavesdropping on Americans without warrants for five years because obtaining judicial approval would have endangered national security, the administration somehow found a way to obey the law without sacrificing our safety." Sullum continues, "By exposing the hollowness of President Bush's national security justification, his tardy compliance with FISA demonstrates more contempt for the rule of law than continued defiance would have. Since the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program was publicly revealed in December 2005, the administration has maintained 'it was absolutely necessary to protect the security of our country,' as Attorney General Alberto

Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee on Jan. 18. Now we know that's not true." Sullum adds, "From now on, Mr. Gonzales said, NSA surveillance of international e-mail and phone calls involving people on U.S. soil 'where there is probable cause to believe that one of the communicants is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an associated terrorist organization' will be 'subject to the approval of the FISA court.' Although the Bush administration publicly insisted for a year that such a concession would compromise national security, Mr. Gonzales promised 'the country will not be any less safe' now that the president has deigned to follow the law. … According to Mr. Gonzales, the Justice Department managed to square this circle by coming up with a 'complicated' and 'innovative' approach that complies with FISA yet allows the 'speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat.' Since the statute explicitly permits retroactive approval of surveillance in emergencies up to 72 hours after the fact, it's not clear what additional leeway the government thought it needed. … Whether you buy that or not, the reason for the delay in complying with FISA is clear: When it comes to fighting terrorism, the president considers obeying the law optional. As Mr. Gonzales emphasized, the administration still maintains the president is not obligated to follow FISA; he is doing so only because he has decided that 'involving all branches of government on such an important program is best for the country.' Given the president's view of his 'inherent' powers, he could go back to evading the courts and flouting the will of Congress any day."

The Honolulu Advertiser (1/27) editorializes, "Americans who are worried about the Bush administration's tight grip on the reins of power can't be happy with the news from Capitol Hill. … First, the president signals that he's now ready to end the practice of conducting warrantless wiretapping, announcing that any such operations will now meet requirements for court orders under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. This administration's turnabout resulted from negotiations with the FISA court." The Advertiser continues, "But just when some critics felt ready to turn handsprings, others — including several U.S. senators — fired off pointed questions. … New York's Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer asked whether these warrants were blanket approvals or broad brushstrokes enabling generic roundups. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales owes us an answer." The Advertiser adds, "In later grillings about federal prosecution of terrorists, Gonzales' message to the Senate was clearer — but even more disturbing. Habeas corpus — the right to go to federal court and challenge one's imprisonment — is not protected by the Constitution. … Even veteran Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter was incredulous, quoting a section in the Constitution barring suspension of habeas. How, he argued, can you ban the suspension of a right that doesn't exist? … Good question. … If the voters tried to communicate a need for some limits to executive power, the president wasn't hearing it."

The Sacramento Bee (1/27, B6) reports, "Yes, the right of habeas corpus does exist. It's been part of the Anglo-American legal tradition since the Magna Carta in 1215. And the U.S. Constitution explicitly says that it cannot be suspended, except in the case of rebellion or invasion. Yet Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee this week that he believes people in the United States have no constitutional right to habeas corpus." The Bee continues, "The writ of habeas corpus -- literally, 'produce the body' -- has been a bulwark of personal liberty for more than 800 years. It requires that any time a person is detained, the government must produce the prisoner in person and state why he or she is being detained. A person taken into custody must either be charged or released. … But there was Gonzales, testifying before the Judiciary Committee that 'there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution; there is a prohibition against taking it away.' … Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., was flabbergasted: 'Now, wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away, except in the case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have a right of habeas corpus, unless there is an invasion or rebellion?' … Gonzales dug in: 'I meant by that comment, the Constitution doesn't say, "Every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas." It doesn't say that.' … Unfortunately, this was not merely a theoretical exchange. The Bush administration already has been detaining people without charge. … The Bush administration forces us to learn anew the hallowed principles of our legal tradition -- and to defend them. Habeas corpus continues to be a basic human right worth fighting for -- to prevent a king or any government from arbitrarily throwing people into prison without charges."

Canada Announces $9.75 Million Compensation For Arar. The New York Times (1/27, A5, Austen) reports, "Maher Arar, the Canadian software engineer who was detained by American officials in 2002 and deported to Syria, where he was jailed and regularly tortured, will receive 11.5 million Canadian dollars ($9.75 million) in compensation from the Canadian government, under a settlement announced Friday." Prime Minister Stephen Harper "offered a formal apology to Mr. Arar and his family for their 'terrible ordeal.'" The Washington Post (1/27, A14, Struck) reports, "Harper and Arar both criticized the United States for its refusal to accept the exhaustive Canadian inquiry that found Arar was an innocent man."

The AP (1/26) reports Harper "again called on the U.S. government to remove the Ottawa telecoms engineer from any of its no-fly or terrorist watchlists and reiterated that Ottawa would keep pressing Washington to clear Arar's name." Arar "thanked the Canadian government at a news conference Friday." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Farley) reports Arar had been deported to Syria "based on incorrect information" and "was imprisoned and tortured for a year." Harper said that "he had asked President Bush to clear him." Arar "tried to sue American officials and agencies over his detention and deportation, but the U.S. District Court of Appeals dismissed his suit last February, ruling that the action was protected on national security grounds. Arar is appealing the decision."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

9/11 Calls To Emergency Operators Show Lack Of Coordination. The New York Times (1/27, B2, Dwyer) reports, "The city yesterday released 19 recordings of telephone calls made to 911 operators from the World Trade Center on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001. While the calls included a rich example of the valor of the day, they also showed that the emergency response agencies worked as separate fiefdoms, with callers having to tell their stories multiple times as they were transferred from police operators to fire dispatchers or to Emergency Medical Service. And no one in the 911 system passed along what could have been a life-saving order that had been issued by fire chiefs on the scene: to evacuate the buildings."

The AP (1/26) reports, "Seven minutes before the World Trade Center's south tower collapsed, Larry Boisseau called a 911 operator from the lobby, asking for help for injured people. He stayed on the line while the phone to paramedics rang about a dozen times." Boisseau, "fire safety director for OCS Security, was one of two victims identified on the calls because he was on the job. The other victim was Melissa Doi, whose call was made public because it was played at the trial of Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. The rest of the calls released Friday only played the operator's side of the conversation, and recalled eerie tableaus presented in earlier released tapes: operators trying to calm down callers trapped on the 84th floor, the 89th floor, the 93rd floor, the 105th floor. Some operators became exasperated, and others weren't sure how to advise trapped callers."

Anti-Fraud Regulations Blamed For Slow Rebuilding Efforts Following Katrina. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A1, Cooper) reports in a front-page story on rebuilding efforts 17 months after Hurricane Katrina that throughout the region, "rebuilding is in a deep stall." The article blames "the size of the disaster…; the crush of competing bureaucracies…; and weak local leadership." It details the lack of spending by responsible agencies and lays chief blame on regulations which are intended to combat fraud and waste. As an example, a Louisiana program, "Road Home…has drawn nearly 100,000 applicants. As of this week, it had disbursed only 258 grants for a total of $14.4 million. Mississippi, which operates a similar but far less restrictive grant program, has distributed $665 million to 11,827 homeowners." "At the federal level, Bush administration officials defend their rules." Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu (D) "has promised to try rejiggering Stafford Act rules to make them more flexible."

Judge Delays State Farm Settlement In Katrina Case. The New York Times (1/27, C1, Treaster) reports Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court in Gulfport, Mississippi "has rejected -- at least temporarily -- a settlement by State Farm Insurance that was expected to provide several hundred million dollars to help policyholders rebuild homes destroyed by Hurricane Katrina 17 months ago." State Farm said that "it now looked forward to addressing the judge's concerns." Lead attorney Richard F. Scruggs, and Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood "said they were optimistic that the agreement would be revived." The settlement "was expected to be a model for other insurers to use in seeking settlements, which would help jump-start the lagging recovery of Mississippi's coast." Judge Senter "raised concerns about a lack of detail on how much money policyholders might receive." He also said that the agreement "failed to provide information on what the lawyers had done to justify an agreed-upon payment of up to $20 million in relation to reopening the 35,000 damage claims."

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A4, Pleven) reports, "The judge's ruling threw into uncertainty a plan that would have required State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., the nation's largest home insurer, to pay a total of at least $50 million to homeowners who suffered damage in the 2005 storm." Senter "raised a number of objections in his ruling about the procedure and other issues related to the case." CNN.com (1/26) reported Senter "said the bargain between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. and the Mississippi attorney general did not establish 'a procedure that is fair, just, balanced or reasonable.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says "I'm The Decision Maker" On Iraq. The Washington Post (1/27, Abramowitz, Weisman, 690K) reports on its front page that, "declaring 'I'm the decision maker,'" President Bush "challenged congressional efforts to formally condemn his Iraq plan." It was "part of a White House campaign to try to keep Republican lawmakers from signing on to any resolution that criticizes the president's new strategy in Iraq. By keeping down the number of Republican defections, the administration hopes to make any vote appear highly partisan and to buy Bush's new plan more time."

BBC.com (1/26) reports Bush "has made it clear he will ignore any attempt by the US Congress to question his sending 20,000 extra troops to Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (1/26, lead story, 2:40, Couric) led by reporting that while "he has faced day after day of criticism of his new Iraq strategy, and on this day President Bush said, in effect, it doesn't matter. He's in charge, he's calling the shots. The President said congressional opponents are condemning his troop buildup before it even has a chance to work, and his new defense secretary went even further, accusing them of giving America's enemies a boost." NBC Nightly News (1/26, lead story, 3:05, Williams) led by saying Bush "felt the need to remind some of those in Washington and beyond that he makes the decisions. He was talking about one in particular, however: sending almost 22,000 fresh US troops into Iraq. The President knows congress is probably going to pass resolutions against his policy. He further knows several Republicans have turned against him publicly. He also knows it won't have the force of law and today's pronouncement sounded like that, however unpopular the policy, there can only be one commander and chief at a time."

Gates Says Resolutions Embolden Enemy. The Washington Times (1/27, A1, Dinan, 88K) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said yesterday that Congress' push to oppose President Bush's troop increase in Iraq 'emboldens the enemy' and undercuts the commanders in the field. ... Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, called Mr. Gates' statement 'a desperate attempt' to bolster the president's policy." The Times adds, "Members of Congress are increasingly talking about a vision of victory that is different from Mr. Bush's picture of an Iraq that can 'govern, sustain and defend itself.'" The Washington Post (1/27, A1, Abramowitz, Weisman, 690K) also reports Gates's concern about the effect of Congressional resolutions. But on its Web site, The Hill (1/26, Marre) says if Republicans "stand in the way of an up-or-down vote on such a resolution, the resulting cloture vote would, in effect, be a referendum on the war. 'We're going to get a vote one way or the other,' Kennedy said in the Capitol."

Pelosi Meets With Maliki In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, :10, Couric) reported, "One fierce critic of the President's Iraq policy, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, was in Baghdad today. She met with Prime Minister Maliki and wished his government success." The Washington Post (1/27, A10, Londono, 690K) reports Maliki told Pelosi he would "like to see 50,000 U.S. troops leave by the end of the year, Iraqi officials said." Her "primary concern in meeting Maliki appeared to be to determine how soon he thought the United States could withdraw its soldiers from Iraq, said Ali Dabbagh, the prime minister's spokesman." The Speaker "told the prime minister that she and fellow Democrats are eager to see a prompt transition of authority, Maliki's office said in a statement."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Daragahi) reports Pelosi "reportedly voiced support for Iraq's 'democratic experiment' and vowed to push for the speedy transfer of security duties from U.S. to Iraqi forces long demanded by the Shiite-dominated government." The AP (1/26) reports that she was accompanied on her trip by Rep. John Murtha, "a longtime critic of the war."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/27, A8, Zernike, 1.16M) reports House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer "set out a road map for the House to exercise more control over Iraq strategy, as he and other Democratic leaders continued on Friday to exert pressure against the president's plan to send in an additional 21,500 troops."

On Fox News' The Big Story (1/26, Gibson), Newt Gingrich said of Pelosi's trip, "It's a very good thing for her to go. It's a very good thing for her to ask questions. It will be a very bad thing if she communicates to the Iraqi government anything other than the official policy of the United States. … I hope that Speaker Pelosi will be very cautious and the people with her will be very cautious about what they say when they're in those meetings."

Brownback, Pataki Oppose Surge. An announced and a potential Republican presidential candidate are both speaking out against the surge. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Levey) reports Sen. Sam Brownback "said Friday that he would back the symbolic push to oppose President Bush's plans to increase troop levels in Iraq, further evidence of the growing division within the GOP over the unpopular plan." And the New York Times (1/27, A12, Hernandez, 1.16M) reports ex-Gov. George Pataki, "a Republican who has steadfastly supported President Bush's Iraq policies, said on Friday that he would oppose Mr. Bush's plan for sending more troops to Baghdad unless Iraqi leaders took clearer steps to build a nonsectarian government."

Pataki said on Fox News (1/26, Browne), "Before we commit more American troops to the middle of sectarian violence between the Shia and Sunni, we should demand that the Maliki government take action; that they stop just talking about what they hope to do and actually start implementing tasks that will allow them to take the lead in protecting and making their democracy work."

Gates Works To Accelerate Deployment In Iraq. The Washington Post (1/27, A14, Tyson, 690K) reports Gates said he "was working to accelerate the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, suggesting that the influx of American troops is no longer contingent upon the Iraqi government fulfilling its commitments for Baghdad security operations. ... In congressional testimony and statements earlier this month, Gates had suggested that the flow of additional U.S. troops to Iraq would be dependent upon the Iraqi government meeting specific pledges -- such as sending three more Iraqi army brigades to Baghdad and lifting restrictions on U.S. military operations targeting certain Baghdad districts or individuals." The Post adds, "Yesterday's statements made it clear that any decision on withholding troops would be left to Petraeus, who has said he favors moving the troops to Iraq as quickly as possible."

Gates Displays New Style At First Pentagon News Conference. Coverage of Gates' first Pentagon newsconference was focused his stylistic differences with predecessor Donald Rumsfeld. The New York Times (1/27, A12, Cloud, 1.16M) said the session was "nothing like those of his predecessor," who "invariably stood behind the lectern in the Pentagon briefing room, often on live television, gleefully sparring with reporters, challenging the premises of their questions, and usually frustrating all efforts to elicit hard information. Mr. Gates seemed to go out of his way to do things differently. ... his answers were generally more concise and free of scoffing, teasing or smirking."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Barnes, 850K) also says Gates' "manner and method could not have been more different from those of his controversial predecessor." Gates "met the media in his private dining room, seating reporters and himself around a large conference table. And the answers he offered could not have been more dissimilar to Rumsfeld's. Stylistically, Gates refrained from scoffing at reporters, from restating their questions on more favorable terms and from challenging the premises of inquiries." In addition, "Gates came close to blaming Rumsfeld for many of the problems in Iraq."

Bush, Gates Defend Anti-Iran Effort Within Iraq. ABC World News (1/26, lead story, 2:30, Gibson) reported, "As if US forces don't have enough to worry about in Iraq, officials in Washington, today, were talking about forces from Iran, who are coming into Iraq. Recently, Iranian agents were detained on suspicion they were aiding the insurgency. And today, the President made it clear, American forces can respond with deadly force, if agents from Iran threaten their lives. We turn to our chief White House correspondent, Martha Raddatz. Martha?" ABC (Raddatz): "Charlie, the focus has been on Iraq. But today, it definitely switched to Iran. From the President to the Secretary of Defense and to the battlefields of Iraq -- today it was clear that pressure is being ratcheted up against Iran." The Bush Administration "is now aggressively pursuing a 'capture or kill' policy towards Iranians aiding the Iraqi insurgency." President Bush: "It makes sense that if somebody is trying to harm our troops or stop us from achieving our goal or killing innocent citizens in Iraq that we will stop them." Raddatz: "US officials say that the Pentagon will soon present evidence that Iran is providing deadly weapons to the insurgents, such as the explosively formed Penetrators that can cut through the strongest armor."

The Washington Post (1/27, A12, Linzer, Tyson, 690K) reports Bush "yesterday defended a Pentagon program to kill or capture Iranian operatives inside Iraq, saying that U.S. troops would use all necessary measures to protect themselves and Iraqi civilians from harm." However, Bush and Gates "said U.S. troops would not cross Iraq's border with Iran under the program, and the president said he is still committed to resolving the dispute over Iran's nuclear program diplomatically." Gates "id not discuss the program's rules of engagement but said that U.S. military targeting of Iranians or any foreign fighters is limited to those who pose a threat to U.S. troops, adding that such practice is not new." Bush "said his administration is already making good progress on the diplomatic front, citing a U.N. Security Council resolution that calls on Iran to halt much of its nuclear program and return to negotiations. Iran has rejected that."

The New York Times (1/27, Mazzetti, Cloud, 1.16M) says Bush "and his senior aides on Friday justified American actions against Iranian operatives inside Iraq as necessary to protect American troops and Iraqis, and said they would continue as long as Tehran kept up what they called its support for Shiites involved in sectarian attacks." Bush "decided several months ago to allow American troops to make targets of select Iranian operatives inside Iraq whom military officials have accused of helping militants build sophisticated and powerful roadside bombs." Leaders including Gates "said that President Bush had given the military no new authorities to carry out the offensive, and that the Pentagon had long had permission to capture or kill foreign operatives thought to be aiding attacks against American troops."

The Los Angeles Times (1/27, A1, Richter) reports, "President Bush staunchly defended a tough new administration policy on Iran that is drawing criticism at home and causing anxiety abroad, arguing Friday that it was only sensible for U.S. troops to move aggressively against Iranians who endangered them in Iraq. ... The new push has been welcomed by some Sunni Arab countries that are worried about the rising influence of predominantly Shiite Iran, as well as by members of U.S. Congress from both parties who are nervous about the prospect that Tehran may acquire a nuclear weapon and possibly use it to threaten Israel. But the aggressive approach has been unsettling to Shiite Arabs and Kurdish leaders in Iraq, as well as to others in the United States and Europe."

Bush Downplays Plan For Offensive Strike Against Iran. Under the headline "Bush Denies Preparing Attack Against Iran," the Financial Times (1/27, Luce) notes President Bush yesterday "sought to deny widespread rumours his administration was preparing some kind of military action against Iran. Mr Bush confirmed a report in Friday's Washington Post that he had authorised US troops to shoot and kill Iranian operatives in Iraq, but denied this was a prelude to stronger action." However, his "relatively emollient comments are unlikely to quell speculation about the reasons behind the recent escalation of White House rhetoric towards Iran." The Times says Secretaries Rice and Gates "are thought to be pushing the White House to open talks with Iranian," while "others in the Bush administration, notably Dick Cheney, who last year warned Iran that it would face 'meaningful consequences' if it continued to foment violence in Iraq, are thought to be arguing for the military option."

Domenici Would Oppose Strike On Iran "At This Point." Sen. Pete Domenici was asked on the Imus In The Morning (1/26) radio program, simulcast on MSNBC, "If the President wanted to bomb Iran, would you support that?" Domenici replied, "At this point, I would not. I think we're back in the same muddle that we're in in this one if we do that. … They don't have a nuclear bomb yet. … We have some time. They're making it harder to find it, because they're moving it all over the place in very prolonged tunnels. But we have to decide later on what we do about that. Right now, we have better stay focused" on Iraq.

Dowd Denounces Cheney For Defense Of Iraq Policy. Maureen Dowd writes in her column for the New York Times (1/27, A17), "Dick Durbin went to the floor of the Senate on Thursday night to denounce the vice president as 'delusional.'" But "delusional is far too mild a word to describe Dick Cheney." She adds, "W. and Vice…learned no lessons from Vietnam, probably because they worked so hard to avoid going. They rush into a war halfway around the world for no reason and with no foresight about the culture or the inevitable insurgency, and then assert that any criticism of their fumbling management of Iraq and Afghanistan is tantamount to criticizing the troops." Cheney "has turned his perversity into foreign policy. He assumes that the more people think he's crazy, the saner he must be."

Senate Confirms Petraeus 81-0. ABC World News (1/26, story 3, :10, Gibson) reported the Senate "confirmed the President's choice to command US troops in Iraq, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus. The Senate confirmed Petraeus unanimously." The Washington Times/AP (1/27) says the "81-0 approval was in contrast to the widespread public and congressional opposition to Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq."

Domenici Says "We Don't Produce Smarter Men Than Him Anywhere." Sen. Pete Domenici appeared on the Imus In The Morning (1/26) radio program, simulcast on MSNBC, where he said of Petraeus, "We don't produce smarter men than him anywhere, and we're just lucky that, as smart as he is and as intelligent, well-versed, he happens to be in the military and he's going to take this job on. So we're very lucky as Americans to find these kind of people every now and then."

Petraeus Might Use Iraqi Facilities Protection Service. The Washington Post (1/27, A12, Pincus, 690K) reports Petraeus "told Congress that he might supplement efforts to secure Baghdad using the Iraqi Facilities Protection Service, a 150,000-man force that guards Iraqi government agencies. But that service is widely considered unreliable, and elements were described in July by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as 'more dangerous than the militias,' according to Sen. Jack Reed."

Military Confirms Abduction Of Troops In Karbala Slayings. Coverage of the raid against Americans in Karbala pointedly noted the military's earlier denials that an abduction had occurred. ABC World News (1/26, story 2, 2:10, Gibson) reported, "The military, at first, said five US soldiers had died repelling that attack. However, today the story is quite different. And it turns out the attack represents almost a total breakdown in security." ABC (Marquez): "In the immediate aftermath, it looked like the scene of so many deadly attacks on US forces. But this assault was far more brazen and brutal. US officials say the attack began when a convoy of GMC sport utility vehicles, the kind used by US government officials, entered the governor's compound in Karbala."

The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 3, 1:45, Couric) reported, "Meanwhile, the Pentagon has changed its account of what happened when US troops were ambushed in Karbala last week." CBS (Orr): "The US military now concedes the assault on this compound in Karbala was a sophisticated and brazen attack." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "was pressed today about the new details of the Karbala attack." Gates: "I've just been made aware of the discrepancy in the account and I've asked for the specifics about it." NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 3:20, Miklaszewski) reported, "The level of security provided by the Iraqis is dismally low. The Iraqi guards are not properly trained and certainly not reliable. ... The tragic incident raises questions about the new US strategy for Baghdad and the increased risk to American troops."

The AP (1/26) reports, "Four American soldiers were abducted during a sophisticated sneak attack last week in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, the U.S. military confirmed Friday. It said three were shot to death and a fourth was mortally wounded with a gunshot to the head when they were found in a neighboring province, far from the compound where they were captured. ... The brazen assault, 50 miles south of Baghdad, was conducted by nine to 12 militants posing as an American security team, according to two senior U.S. military officials as well as Iraqi officials." The AP adds, "The confirmation has emerged after nearly a week of inquiries. The U.S. military in Baghdad initially did not respond to repeated requests for comment on reports that began emerging from Iraqi government and military officials on the abduction and a major breakdown in security at Karbala site."

The Washington Post (1/27, A10, Londono, 690K) reports, "The U.S. military, reversing earlier statements, acknowledged Friday that four of five soldiers killed last Saturday had been abducted before being executed." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "The account of the attack provided by the military suggests both a breakdown of security in the relatively safe southern province as well as increased skill on the part of armed groups."

Suicide Bombing Kills At Least 15 At Baghdad Pet Market. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 4, 2:00, Couric) reported, "Today in Baghdad, a busy pet market was attacked. A bomb hidden in a crate of pigeons exploded. At least 15 people were killed as were dozens of animals. Sunni insurgents are suspected." NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 3:20, Williams) reported, "Yet another bombing at a Baghdad market, this time at a popular fair where animals are bought and sold routinely."

The New York Times (1/27, A8, Santora, 1.16M) reports, "There used to be two great joys on Fridays for Iraqis in Baghdad: browsing the ancient bookshops, and exploring the Ghazil animal market, home to an extraordinary array of creatures. ... The animal market, too, has suffered, having been reduced to a shell of its lively former self. When a bomb exploded there on Friday, killing 15 people and wounding 50, it was the third such attack since June." The Washington Times/AP (1/27, Gamel) reports, "Suspicion fell on Sunni insurgents because the market sits near a predominantly Shi'ite neighborhood on the east bank of the Tigris River that divides Baghdad. It was the latest in a series of attacks on busy commercial targets in the capital as insurgents apparently sought to maximize bloodshed ahead of a U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Daragahi, Kareem, 850K) reports, "As usual, the attack carried sectarian overtones."

Soldiers Caught In Baghdad Crossfire. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 4, 2:00, Couric) reported, "Chief foreign correspondent Lara Logan is on patrol with US forces in Baghdad's Dura district. Today they found themselves caught in the crossfire." CBS (Logan): "Crazyhorse troops are right in the middle of Iraq's sectarian war. Here, rushing to the scene of a shooting; only the gunmen are gone, leaving US troops to deal with the anger that follows."

Soldiers Serving In Iraq Are Profiled. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 3, 2:20, Williams) reported, "Tonight we get to see American soldiers on the job in Iraq and more important really we get to hear from them about all of the talk about the war here at home." NBC (Engel): "When the Stryker Brigade Apache company headed out this morning, they had one mission, to find bases for the new US troops coming in. There aren't a lot of safe options in this city."

Western Iraq Sees More Cooperation With US Forces. The Washington Post (1/27, A13, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Before tribal sheiks aligned themselves with U.S. forces in the violent deserts of western Iraq, the number of people willing to become police officers in the city of Ramadi -- the epicenter of the fight against the insurgent group known as al-Qaeda in Iraq -- might not have filled a single police pickup. ... With the help of a confederation of about 50 Sunni Muslim tribal sheiks, the U.S. military recruited more than 800 police officers in December and is on track to do the same this month. Officers credit the sheiks' cooperation for the diminishing violence in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province." However, "some Iraqi politicians and Anbar residents who oppose the U.S. presence describe the confederation, known as the Awakening, as a divisive group that pits tribes against each other, uses police officers as armed guards to protect tribal territory, and harnesses American support to consolidate its power."

Officer Faces Court Martial For Abu Ghraib Role. The Washington Post/AP (1/27, A3) reports Lt. Col. Steven Jordan, the "only U.S. military officer charged with a crime in the Abu Ghraib scandal," will be "court-martialed on eight charges, including cruelty and maltreatment of prisoners, the Army said Friday." Jordan, "a 50-year-old reservist from Virginia who ran the interrogation center at the Iraqi prison, was accused of failing to exert his authority as the place descended into chaos, with prisoners stripped naked, photographed in humiliating poses and intimidated by snarling dogs."

Antiwar Demonstrators To March In Washington Today. The Washington Post (1/27, B1, Ruane, 690K) reports, "Tens of thousands of demonstrators from across the country are expected to converge in Washington today to urge the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq as President Bush is proposing to send more troops in an effort to stabilize the country." The event "is expected to draw groups of many stripes. The chart for the assembly site shows sections reserved for veterans and labor, gay and peace organizations, in addition to others dedicated to opposing global warming, nuclear arms and torture and a group called End Israeli Occupation of Palestine. In addition, at least one group is protesting the protest." The AP (1/26, Margasak) says a "small number of active military troops will take part in today's rally in Washington against the Iraq war." The Washington Times (1/27, Cella, Taylor, 88K) also reports on the planned march.

Coleman Among Activists' Targets. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/27, Hotakainen, 395K) says "groups opposed to the war in Iraq announced that they're targeting Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., as part of a national campaign to stop the troop increase proposed by President Bush. ... Coleman has been in the national spotlight since Jan. 10, when he announced his opposition to Bush's request. But Coleman has made a distinction between sending more troops to Baghdad and sending them to Anbar Province."

Older Generation Is Majority In Iraq War Protests. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/27, Gammage) reports that many have found that "at protests, the people carrying signs are often middle-age or retired" an "inverse of the 1960s, when U.S. campuses erupted in protest, sometimes in flames, over the war in Southeast Asia. … To the iPod generation, standing on street corners and holding banners can seem anachronistic" because "its members are more likely to voice political objections on blogs and other Internet venues."

Fonda Faces Heat Again In Antiwar Protest. The Boston Globe (1/27, Bender) reports that "actress and long time peace activist Jane Fonda…will rejoin the ranks of the antiwar movement today at a major rally in Washington." Her "return to the spotlight…was seen by some activists and chroniclers of the antiwar movement as politically risky. They said her presence could be distracting in a rally that organizers hope can capitalize on congressional opposition" to President Bush's surge plan.

Tree Memorial To Fallen Soldiers Grows Larger. The AP (1/26) reports from Fort Stewart, Georgia, on the "318th soldier memorialized at Warriors Walk, a grove of eastern redbuds started with 34 trees in April 2003. Fort Stewart has planted a tree here for every member of the 3rd Infantry Division to die in the war, as well as for soldiers from other Army posts killed while serving with the division. Jeff Fornshell, the post's ceremonies coordinator, said he wonders how many trees he'll have to plant this year. Expanded twice since its inception, Warriors Walk has room for only 72 more trees." The monument "exhibits the war's cost in a way that's staggering in scale yet also intensely personal."

Rice's Appeal For Bolstered Afghanistan Mission Said To Meet Skepticism. Under the headline, "Rice Presses Allies To Boost Afghan Aid," the Washington Post (1/27, A16, Moore, 690K) notes Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "citing the $10.6 billion in new aid that the Bush administration proposes to give Afghanistan, pressed NATO and European allies Friday to increase their contributions of money and manpower." Her "push came as concern grows over the resurgence of the Taliban in southern Afghanistan, massive increases in opium production and rising tension between Afghanistan and neighboring Pakistan, where Taliban leaders and fighters have been allowed refuge." Rice "defended U.S. and NATO operations in Afghanistan, saying, 'The violence we are seeing is not evidence that our strategy has failed, nor that the situation will improve in our absence.' She added, 'It is evidence of how much we are needed.'"

The AP (1/27, Gearan) adds Rice "asked allies Friday to intensify their efforts to keep the Taliban from retaking parts of Afghanistan, and asserted a resurgence in Taliban attacks does not mean the U.S. war strategy has failed." The Administration "wants NATO allies to increase money, troops and other support for the unsteady democracy in Afghanistan. It is also working to dispel European suspicion that the United States is too busy in Iraq to pay attention to the older Afghan fight."

The New York Times (1/27, Cooper, 1.16M) titles its coverage, "NATO Allies Wary Of Sending More Troops To Afghanistan." European powers "remained noncommittal about sending additional troops to Afghanistan, even as the Bush administration sought to inject new energy into the NATO mission against the Taliban by offering more American soldiers and money." The Times reports, "Officially, the language at a NATO meeting here on Friday reflected resolve and commitment toward Afghanistan. … But beyond the sound bites, the realities that have troubled the NATO mission in Afghanistan since the 26-member trans-Atlantic alliance took command last year remained on display."

Army Reprimands Special Forces Soldiers For Beating Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Sack) reports, "The Army announced Friday night that it had given administrative reprimands to two Special Forces soldiers for assaulting detainees held at a base in eastern Afghanistan in 2003 and for failing to report the death of one detainee. However, the U.S. Army Special Forces Command absolved the soldiers of any wrongdoing in the deaths of two [other] detainees." The Special Forces' statement "did not name the soldiers who had been disciplined, nor did it provide details about which death led to the disciplinary action for failure to report."

Ex-Taliban Governor Gunned Down In Afghanistan. The Los Angeles Times/AP (1/27) reports, "An Afghan lawmaker who oversaw the destruction of two massive 1,500-year-old Buddha statues in March 2001 was gunned down here on his way to Friday prayers, police said." Mawlawi Mohammed Islam Mohammedi "was the former Taliban regime's governor of Bamian province when the 5th century Buddha statues carved from the living rock were blasted with dynamite and artillery." The gunman's motive was unknown.

Halliburton, KBR Report Income Declines. The AP (1/26, Porretto) reports Halliburton "was upbeat Friday despite a 40 percent decline in fourth-quarter profit, citing heavy demand for its oilfield equipment and personnel and predicting more of the same for 2007." The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B14, Vuocolo) reports KBR, "which was partially spun off from Halliburton in November, saw net income decline 23%."

War College Scholar Argues More NATO-Like Alliances Needed. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/27, A17, 1.16M), Joseph R. Núñez, an Army colonel and the chairman of the art of war department at the Strategic Studies Institute, United States Army War College, argues, "Like the one strong horse that carries load after load, NATO is getting tired of having to serve as the proxy both for the United Nations and feeble regional organizations. ... What we need are more permanent regional security and defense organizations, supported by major powers." The US and its allies "should work to create a minimum of six additional security and defense organizations patterned on NATO -- one each for North America, South America, Africa, the Asia-Pacific region, South Asia and the Middle East. Headquarters for these organizations might be, respectively, in Colorado Springs, Brasília, Johannesburg, Beijing, New Delhi and Amman, Jordan."

Wills Complains Of Creeping Militarization Of Presidency. In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/27, A17, 1.16M), author Garry Wills writes, "The president is not the commander in chief of civilians. He is not even commander in chief of National Guard troops unless and until they are federalized. … We have not seen normal life in 66 years. The wartime discipline imposed in 1941 has never been lifted." In addition, "There has never been an executive branch more fetishistic about secrecy than the Bush-Cheney one. ... We used to take pride in civilian leadership of the military under the Constitution, a principle that George Washington embraced when he avoided military symbols at Mount Vernon. We are not led -- or were not in the past -- by caudillos."

President Satirized As Weapons Visionary. In a satirical op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/27), author Larry Doyle and his son Ben present an imaginary memo from the White House in which President Bush muses about useful high-tech weapons: "POTUS was curious about where we are on the invisibility cloak. ... We have smart bombs; why not smart bullets? They could be trained to tell the difference between Shiites or Sunnis and only shoot the right one, depending on the day. ... We need a time machine, either based on the POTUS La-Z-Boy design or something more scientific, as long as it's done by Friday."

DOJ:

DOJ's IG Says Department Is Not Prepared For Emergencies. The Washington Times (1/27, Seper) reports, "The Justice Department, hampered by budget shortfalls and high staff turnover, is not prepared to respond quickly to terrorist attacks, hostage incidents, hurricanes and other natural disasters, said a report yesterday by" Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. He "also said that while U.S. attorneys nationwide stepped up training in response to the September 11 attacks, their efforts have fallen off, noting that fewer than half complied with requirements to conduct annual training exercises in 2005 and 2006."

Bloomberg (1/27, Roland) reports, "The U. S. attorneys are responsible for making on-site legal decisions and coordinating for the department with other federal, state and local officials. Justice Department officials have been lax in supervising the preparations, and some plans have been deficient for years, the 70-page report said. … The Justice Department's efforts 'have regressed since June 2005,' said the audit, posted Friday on the department's Web site. Agency officials 'have not provided the direction and support needed to ensure' proper preparations, it said." Bloomberg adds, "The Justice Department, which oversees the FBI as well as the U. S. attorneys' office, has been criticized by Congress for its responses to the 1993 Branch Davidian standoff in Texas, the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing and various hurricanes. Department officials made "serious mistakes" in the use of deadly force, coordinating between negotiators and attack planners and in collecting evidence, the report said. … Department officials plan 'to resolve and implement solutions to the' audit findings, said Michael Battle, head of the office that oversees the U. S. attorneys, in a Jan. 8 letter appended to the inspector general's report."

Recent US Attorney Appointments Are Called Political. McClatchy Newspapers (1/27, Taylor, Gordon) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is transforming the ranks of the nation's top federal prosecutors by firing some and appointing conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle who critics say are unlikely to buck Washington." McClatchy continues, "The newly appointed U.S. attorneys all have impressive legal credentials, but most have few, if any, ties to the communities they've been appointed to serve, and some have had little experience as prosecutors. … The nine recent appointees identified by McClatchy Newspapers held high-level White House or Justice Department jobs, and most were handpicked by Gonzales under a little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act that became law in March." McClatchy adds, "With Congress now controlled by the Democrats, critics fear that in some cases Gonzales is trying to skirt the need for Senate confirmation by giving new U.S. attorneys interim appointments for indefinite terms. … Some legal scholars contend that the administration pushed for the change in the Patriot Act as part of an ongoing attempt to expand the power of the executive branch, a charge administration officials deny. … Being named a U.S. attorney 'has become a prize for doing the bidding of the White House or administration,' said Laurie Levenson, a former federal prosecutor. … A Justice Department spokesman called such assessments 'reckless.' … The selection of U.S. attorneys has always been a political process. … Traditionally, the top assistant U.S. attorney in each local office temporarily fills any vacancy while home-state senators search for preferred candidates to present to the White House for consideration. … Gonzales gained the authority to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms as a result of a change to the Patriot Act that stripped federal judges of their appointment power. … A Justice Department spokesman denied that Gonzales has sought to compromise the independence of U.S. attorneys' offices by appointing political loyalists. In some recent cases Gonzales has followed the traditional process. … 'Allegations that politics inappropriately interfere with personnel decisions made about U.S. attorneys are reckless and plainly wrong,' said department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former CA Official Sentenced For Fraud. The New York Times/AP (1/27) reports, "A former executive with Computer Associates who pleaded guilty to securities fraud and who prosecutors said was instrumental in the prosecution of the company's former chief executive, Sanjay Kumar, was sentenced to seven months in prison and seven months of home detention." The AP continues, "The executive, Ira Zar, the former chief financial officer, pleaded guilty in 2004 and has cooperated with authorities in the prosecution of Mr. Kumar and the company's former sales chief, Stephen Richards. … Mr. Zar, 45, also pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy and was sentenced by Judge I. Leo Glasser of United States District Court in Brooklyn. He was also ordered to serve two years of supervised release after the completion of his sentence. No fine was imposed and restitution will be determined at a later date."

SEC Launches Options Probe Of KB Home. The Financial Times (1/27, Cameron) reports, "KB Home, the fourth-largest US housebuilder, on Friday revealed that US regulators had opend a formal investigation into the stock-options backdating practices that led to the departure of its chief executive last November." The Times continues, "The Los Angeles-based group is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the unfolding options scandal, and the launch of a formal probe by the Securities and Exchange Commission comes as management wrestles with the impact of the slowing housing market." The Times adds, "The SEC launched an informal investigation into KB Home last August, and intensified the probe on January 19, according to the company, which said it was co-operating with regulators. .. An internal probe by the company revealed KB Home used "incorrect measurement dates for financial reporting purposes for annual stock option grants during the period 1998-2005". The report led to the departure of Bruce Karatz, who had led the company since its initial public offering, and the dismissal of its chief legal officer, who had helped to set dates for the stock options."

Hewlett-Packard In Legal Dispute With Former Official Over Spying Allegations. The San Jose Mercury News (1/27, Wong) reports, "A run-of-the-mill divorce proceeding has led to allegations of corporate espionage involving Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer giant whose reputation was recently tarnished by a board-spying scandal." The News continues, "The Palo Alto computer giant is in an ugly fight against a former executive, Karl Kamb Jr., who has accused HP of having him spy on rival Dell. HP has accused Kamb of stealing HP's trade secrets. The story is complete with allegations of a hired informant, bribery and adultery. Key documents in the case, in federal court in Tyler, Texas, have been sealed and the parties were ordered Thursday by a judge not to speak to the media. … But the saga can be pieced together from documents obtained before Kamb's lawsuit was sealed." The News adds, "In August 2005, Kamb's wife, as part of divorce proceedings, subpoenaed HP for information about a business Kamb had established on the side while he was employed by the Palo Alto company in Tokyo, HP said in court filings. After investigating, HP sued Kamb in November 2005 for allegedly stealing its trade secrets to start a multimillion-dollar flat-panel television business while he helped launch HP's TV line. … Last week, Kamb countersued HP for allegedly spying on him, alleging that HP had impersonated him to retrieve his personal phone records. He claimed that HP instructed him to obtain trade secrets on rival Dell's entry into the printer market."

Judge Scolds Nacchio Prosecutors Over Evidence Exchange. The AP (1/27, Shore) reports, "With a stern reminder that Joe Nacchio's trial is just weeks away, a federal judge ordered prosecutors Friday to step up efforts to provide some key evidence to the former Qwest chief executive's attorneys." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham set deadlines for evidence to be turned over and told attorneys to file status reports by Feb. 6.

… 'This case is going to be tried on March 19, folks,' Nottingham said." The AP adds, "Nacchio, who is free on bail, is accused of selling $101 million worth of stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets. … Nacchio is charged with 42 counts, each carrying a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine, and has pleaded not guilty." The AP notes, "At issue in Friday's hearing was evidence that could be deemed favorable to Nacchio, which prosecutors are required by law to provide the defense. … Nacchio's attorneys have contended government attorneys have been slow to deliver some evidence, citing a report on a witness delivered two months after the interview was conducted. … Prosecutor Cliff Stricklin said government attorneys are still interviewing witnesses. 'We're doing the best we can,' he said. … Another problem stems from classified documents that defense attorneys say they need. Prosecutors said the evidence-exchange process had been slowed because some of the documents fall under the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets guidelines for viewing secret government documents. … Prosecutors said they must coordinate the documents with federal agencies that are involved. … Defense lawyers have said Nacchio believed Qwest would get hundreds of millions of dollars worth of classified government contracts that gave him hope for the company's financial future."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Testimony Said To Cause Anxiety At White House. Newsweek (1/26, Isikoff) reports on its Web site, "White House anxiety is mounting over the prospect that top officials -- including deputy chief of staff Karl Rove and counselor Dan Bartlett-may be forced to provide potentially awkward testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis (Scooter) Libby." And "the possibility that Rove could be called to testify would bring his own role into sharper focus." An account of reported testimony by former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer "potentially puts Bartlett…on the hot seat." And "it's not a scenario that anybody at the White House can be looking forward to."

CNN.com (1/27) reports, "Two of President Bush's top advisers have been subpoenaed as possible witnesses in the trial of former White House aide Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, a legal source familiar with the case told CNN on Friday. It remains unclear whether either of the aides -- Karl Rove and Dan Bartlett -- will actually be called to the stand."

Martin Testifies She Told Cheney, Libby That Wilson's Wife Worked For CIA. AFP (1/27) reports Deputy White House communications director Cathie Martin "testified in court Thursday that Vice President Dick Cheney personally led the 2003 effort to discredit Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson." Martin "testified that the vice president ordered her to monitor all print and television news reports on Wilson after the former ambassador went public with his criticism." Martin "also testified that she clearly remembered telling both Cheney and Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA days before Libby said he first learned of it."

Libby Lawyers Skeptical Of Fleischer Deal. The Washington Times/AP (1/27, Press) reports, "Attorneys for former vice presidential aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby Jr. want more information about an unusual immunity-from-prosecution deal that government lawyers gave former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer in the CIA leak case. Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald says that in early 2004, as his investigation was heating up into who revealed CIA operative Valerie Plame's name to reporters, Mr. Fleischer stepped forward with an offer to prosecutors: Promise no prosecution and he would help their case." Attorneys for Libby "want details about Mr. Fleischer's agreement to cast the defendant as someone who's pointing fingers to protect himself."

New Prosecutors In Duke Lacrosse Case Under Pressure. The Washington Post (1/27, A3, Adcock) reports from Raleigh, NC, "Six boxes and two file folders were transferred to the state attorney general's office near Capital Square here last week, and with them comes a shift in a case that has transfixed the nation. … The boxes and files contain the sum total of evidence against three former Duke University lacrosse players charged with sexually assaulting an escort service dancer at an off-campus team party last spring. In the recent months, the actions of the previous prosecutor, Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong, have taken center stage. But now that Nifong has asked to be relieved while he faced charges from the North Carolina Bar Association, including withholding evidence from defense lawyers, the focus of the case shifts to state Attorney General Roy Cooper and the two prosecutors he has chosen to evaluate the evidence." The Post continues, "Pressure on them will be enormous. An intense publicity campaign this month painted a sympathetic picture of the players, in Newsweek and on '60 Minutes.' And the NAACP held a news conference here last week to call on prosecutors to take into account the accuser's version of events, saying it was aware of 'the impact that this case can have on chilling the rights of women, particularly African Americans, to file criminal complaints of sexual violence and exploitation.' The three players are white and the accuser is black, and witnesses have reportedly said they heard racist comments when the woman was leaving the house last March 13."

Denver, "A federal judge has proposed keeping secret for 25 years the sworn statements made by the parents of the Columbine High School gunmen for a civil lawsuit settled more than three years ago." The AP continues, "The judge, Lewis T. Babcock of Federal District Court, suggested the plan on Friday to settle a dispute over whether the depositions should be destroyed. Chief Judge Babcock's proposal calls for them to be turned over to the National Archives and Records Administration. It was not immediately clear what would happen to them after 25 years. … The judge asked the parties in the dispute to respond to his proposal within two weeks." The AP adds, "The parents of the Columbine gunmen, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, gave the statements in 2003 for a civil lawsuit filed by families of victims of the April 1999 shooting near Littleton. Mr. Harris, 18, and Mr. Klebold, 17, killed 12 fellow students and a teacher before taking their own lives. … After the suit was settled, a magistrate ordered the depositions destroyed, but victims' families and others argued that the material had historical value and could contain lessons to prevent school shootings. … Brian Rohrbough, whose son, Daniel, 15, was among those killed, objected to the judge's plan. Mr. Rohrbough said that the public had a right to know, but that the government seemed to think the release of such information was 'somehow going to unravel American society.'"

The Denver Post (1/27, Pankratz) reports, "Babcock said he wouldn't make a final decision until all sides had an opportunity to file written responses with him. He gave the parties a two-week deadline to file motions. … The Colorado attorney General's Office has suggested that the depositions be sent to the Colorado State Archives where a youth-violence expert could review them and issue a public report."

New York Official Claims DOJ Derailed FBI Probe Of Endorsement Sales. The Buffalo News (1/27, McCarthy) reports, "The secretary of the Erie County Independence Party says he wore a wire and allowed his telephone to be tapped last year during an FBI investigation into the alleged sale of political endorsements by party Chairman Anthony L. Orsini. … But Louis P. Corrigan said the probe ended after Justice Department officials in Washington declared that the federal government lacks jurisdiction to prosecute a practice they call 'slating.'" The News continues, "Neither the FBI nor federal prosecutors would address Corrigan's claim about an investigation. But U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn said his staff reached out to the Office of Public Integrity in Washington to determine if a party official - as opposed to a public official - could be criminally charged for taking money in exchange for an endorsement. … 'We were told that, since the 1970s, it's been Department of Justice policy that we do not prosecute cases where a candidate pays money to be put on a slate,' Flynn said." The News adds, "Corrigan, however, said he played undercover agent for much of 2006, cooperating in a probe he hoped would weed out corruption from at least a part of local politics. … 'I carried a wire for the FBI all last year,' Corrigan said, adding that federal agents also tapped his phone to determine whom they would target in a probe they expected to be wide-ranging. … He said federal investigators became especially interested after he talked to two potential candidates while wearing a small transmitter in his shirt pocket. … Corrigan would not reveal the names of either of the people he recorded. But after The Buffalo News independently determined that one of them was Jeffrey A. Bono, a longtime Democratic operative who unsuccessfully ran for the Assembly last May, Corrigan acknowledged that he taped Bono's conversation in the Olympic Restaurant near Buffalo Niagara International Airport last April."

Prosecutors In Utah, North Carolina Find No Crimes In "Hounddog." The AP (1/27, Robertson) reports, "Prosecutors in two states said Friday they found nothing illegal about a movie shot in North Carolina and screened this week at Utah's Sundance Film Festival that depicts a child rape, and instead said 'Hounddog' offered viewers a 'good message' about child sexual abuse." The AP continues, "The movie has troubled some Christians, who have called for a federal investigation into whether the movie breaks federal anti-pornography laws. A state lawmaker in North Carolina also said he is drafting legislation that would require the state approve the script of any television or movie production seeking a state tax break. … But Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff, who watched the movie this week with his state's child sexual exploitation law in hand, said his concerns didn't materialize on the screen. … 'None of the things on the Internet that people were saying about it were true,' Shurtleff said. 'Not only does it not violate the statute, I think it's a good message for people on the subject.'" The AP adds, "The opinion is shared by the district attorneys in the two North Carolina counties where 'Hounddog' was filmed last summer. … Rex Gore, the Brunswick County district attorney, said prosecutors reviewed the movie in November and interviewed crew members, producers and star Dakota Fanning. The movie includes a scene depicting the rape of a 9-year-old child played the 12-year-old actress. … The Christian Film and Television Commission and its chairman, movieguide.org publisher Ted Baehr, had claimed "Hounddog" breaks federal child-pornography law because it 'appears' to show minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct. The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights also asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate."

New Orleans Officials Say City Is Making Progress Against Violent Crime. The AP (1/26, Foster) reports, "Two weeks after thousands marched on City Hall to protest violent crime, city officials gathered there again Friday to provide an update on their latest crime fighting efforts, including increased use of remote cameras, beefed up patrols and traffic checkpoints." The AP continues, "The city has identified 20 crime 'hot spots' were cameras will be placed, adding to 50 already operating, Mayor Ray Nagin said. There will also be cameras providing coverage along St. Charles Avenue for next month's Mardi Gras parades, Nagin said. … The cameras are not monitored, they can, however, provide evidence for investigations since the images they record are kept in a computer." The AP adds, "Police have begun regular patrols in three districts, superintendent Warren Riley said. And at least one officer is walking for 1 1/2 hours a day in every district, he said. … The police have put another 60 officers on the streets three days a week, Riley said, by pulling them from administrative jobs. He's going to use federal grants to pay overtime for another 40 to 50 patrol officers. Riley is also using undercover officers to converge on scenes of violent crime. … The city's initiatives are in addition to plans announced Thursday by the U.S. Justice Department. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Attorney Jim Letten announced additional federal manpower and equipment being sent to the city to help police fight violent crime that increased as the city repopulates following Hurricane Katrina in August 2005."

Alabama Woman, Daughter Sentenced For FEMA Fraud. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (1/27) reports, "A Jackson woman who admitted submitting 28 phony applications for assistance following Hurricane Katrina will spend more than six years in prison, while her mother will serve probation for similar offenses, a federal judge in Mobile decided this week." The Press-Register continues, "U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose on Wednesday sentenced Lawanda Williams to six years and three months in prison and ordered her to pay back the $267,377 she received in fraudulent aid from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The judge also ordered her to surrender four automobiles, real estate, televisions, electronics equipment and other items she purchased with the money. .. .At a separate hearing Friday, DuBose sentenced the woman's mother, Hannah Williams, to three months probation." The Press-Register adds, "The pair are among more than a dozen people who have pleaded guilty to FEMA fraud associated with Katrina, but the younger Williams is responsible for more money than any of the others, according to authorities. … 'Ms. Williams used Hurricane Katrina and the relief efforts as an opportunity to make hundreds of thousands of dollars by lying and by stealing other people's identities,' U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes said in a prepared statement. 'The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force is actively working to bring to justice those who took advantage of the recovery efforts to enrich themselves.' … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales created the national task force in September 2005, weeks after Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast. Chaired by the assistant attorney general for the criminal division, the task force includes representatives from the FBI, the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General and other agencies."

Judge Dismisses Two Jurors From New York Death Penalty Case. The New York Post (1/27, Cohen) reports, "An irreverent Brooklyn federal judge had to dismiss two jurors from a capital murder case yesterday after his mocking statements about the defendant's possible death sentence wound up splashed across city newspapers." The Post continues, "Judge Frederic Block told lawyers earlier this week that the feds' bid to have drug lord Kenneth 'Supreme' McGriff - who is charged in two murder-for-hire schemes - put to death was 'absurd.' … The jury and the press were not in the courtroom when the judge made the unusual comments, but a copy of the public court transcript wound up in reporters' hands - and then became fodder for the following day's news cycle." The Post adds, "Morning talk-radio shows then picked up the story. And Assistant U.S. Attorney Caroline Pokorny complained to Block yesterday morning, as he launched a bid to discover whether the jury has been tainted. … McGriff, a legendary Queens drug kingpin, is on trial for plotting the deaths of two rivals in 2001. The judge said that, based on the jury's demeanor and the evidence presented during the initial phase of the trial, which ended yesterday, 'there's no chance in the world there would be a death-penalty verdict in this case . . . This is an absurd prosecution, based upon what I have heard.' … He asked Pokorny to send a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, telling him that he didn't support proceeding with the penalty phase of the trial. Federal death-penalty cases require two trials - one in which jurors decide the defendant's guilt and, if there's a conviction, a separate trial in which they say whether he should face life in prison or death. … It's unclear what impact the judge's suggestion will have on the case. … Yesterday, he admitted he'd made a mistake by allowing the comments to become public - but didn't seem to regret making them."

Virginia Legislature Approves Expansion Of Death Penalty To Accomplices. The Washington Post (1/27, B1, Craig) reports the Virginia House of Delegates "voted Friday to expand the use of the death penalty" by "making accomplices and judge killers eligible for execution." The Senate "passed nearly identical versions of the bills earlier in the week." Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) "personally opposes capital punishment" but a spokesman said that he "has not taken a position on the bill" which "allows for the death penalty to be imposed if the accomplice has the same intent as the killer."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Seale Seeks Dismissal Of Charges In 1964 Civil Rights Slayings. The AP (1/27, Elliott) reports from Jackson, MS, "A reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men has asked a federal judge to dismiss the charges, saying the statute of limitations has expired." The AP continues, "Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester filed the motion Friday in U.S. District Court on behalf of James Ford Seale, who pleaded not guilty Thursday to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy. … U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said yesterday he had not seen the motion and could not comment." The AP adds, "Seale, 71, could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee. … Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown. … A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities. … Seale and Edwards were arrested in the case in 1964. But the FBI — consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that summer — turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges. … The Justice Department reopened the case in 2000."

Two Men Shot By Maryland Official Released From Custody. The Washington Post (1/27, B1, Castaneda, Rich) reports, "Two critically wounded men who were shot by the No. 2 homeland security official in Prince George's County were released from police custody yesterday as the department backed off earlier statements that the men would probably face assault charges." The Post continues, "Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey determined yesterday that Robert White, 36, and Brandon D. Clark, 22, should no longer be in custody. 'The state's attorney's office did not want to rush to judgment. We believe that further inspection of the evidence and further interviews with all concerned parties is necessary before any charges are brought forward,' said Ramon Korionoff, Ivey's spokesman." The Post adds, "Michael J. Winkelman, an attorney for the men's families, said the decision means that their relatives will have free access to them in the hospital. … On Thursday, county police said assault charges were pending against the men, both furniture movers, for allegedly assaulting Cpl. Keith Washington, who is also a county police officer, in his Accokeek home Wednesday. They said then that Washington apparently acted in self-defense, based on statements from Washington and a family member whom they did not identify. The movers were unarmed, police said. … Yesterday, Sharon Taylor, the police department's top spokeswoman, said the statement that assault charges were pending 'was obviously based on preliminary information.'"

More Commentary. The Washington Post (1/27, A18) editorializes, "We don't presume to know what happened Wednesday night when Cpl. Keith Washington shot the two men making a delivery for Marlo Furniture at his home in Accokeek. We don't assume that the two men he shot, Brandon D. Clark and Robert White, were angels; Mr. White evidently has an arrest record, and Mr. Clark also has had a brush or two with the law. … But we do know that Cpl. Washington has been the subject of repeated complaints about his on- and off-duty behavior. The common thread is that he turns routine encounters into highly charged, violent incidents. In separate meetings of a homeowners association on whose board he served three years ago, Cpl. Washington assaulted a property manager, shoved the association's treasurer and berated the association's president, it was alleged. Earlier, Cpl. Washington was sued for wrongfully arresting and abusing a man who protested Cpl. Washington's allegedly rough treatment of a motorist involved in a fender bender; an initial $260,000 judgment against him was overturned on appeal." The Post concludes, "Cpl. Washington is a friend and political ally of County Executive Jack B. Johnson. In 2004, Mr. Johnson named Cpl. Washington to the newly created job of deputy director of homeland security for the county. At the time, we were among those questioning Mr. Johnson's judgment in appointing someone of Cpl. Washington's evidently deficient interpersonal skills. … Cpl. Washington, Mr. Clark and Mr. White all deserve a thorough, evenhanded investigation. What's on the line here is not only the reputation of a county police officer and the lives of two working men but the impartiality and judgment of police and prosecutors in Prince George's County."

Judge Orders Court Monitoring Of Philadelphia Jails. The AP (1/27) reports from Philadelphia, "A federal judge ordered city jails to go back under court monitoring, describing conditions there as overcrowded and squalid and saying that inmates lacked access to clean cells and adequate medical attention." The AP continues, "The judge, R. Barclay Surrick of Federal District Court, issued a scathing ruling on Thursday, saying that holding facilities were overflowing and that lockups at police stations were firetraps that violated detainees' constitutional rights. … The ruling came in a lawsuit filed last year on behalf of 11 inmates with the help of David Rudovsky, a University of Pennsylvania law professor who filed a similar suit 35 years ago. That case led to court oversight of the jails from 1971 to 2001." The AP adds, "Judge Surrick had toured the system, which holds roughly 8,800 inmates. … While waiting to be assigned to regular cells, detainees at one jail 'were forced to sleep overlapping one another and on every inch of concrete floor,' Judge Surrick wrote. 'Prisoners slept with their heads next to the toilet.' … Inmates would spend days 'without bedding provisions, sleeping, if they could, on metal benches or directly on the concrete floor,' he wrote. … The city solicitor, Romulo L. Diaz Jr., said Friday that officials were evaluating the decision. Mr. Diaz said the city remained committed to improving conditions and to developing a fire safety plan that would satisfy the court."

Professor Claims Baptist Seminary Dismissed Her Over Gender. The AP (1/27) reports from Fort Worth, TX, "A former theology professor at a prominent Southern Baptist seminary here said officials had told her to leave because women are biblically forbidden to teach men." The AP continues, "The professor, Sheri Klouda, said she was hired in 2002 to a tenure-track position as an assistant professor at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, where she taught Hebrew and had earned her doctorate. But in 2004, Dr. Klouda said, an administrator, whom she would not name, told her that the seminary's president, Paige Patterson, would not be recommending her for tenure because she was a woman, and that she should plan to move on." The AP adds, "Dr. Klouda said she continued teaching for two more years, receiving good evaluations and usually filling her classrooms. In January 2006, the same administrator told her she would no longer be able to teach but would be paid through the 2006-7 academic year. A couple of weeks later, she said, she was told she would be terminated at the end of 2006 instead. She appealed to Dr. Patterson in April, she said, to no avail."

New York Voting Machine Delays Continue. The AP (1/26, Humbert) reports, "It is highly unlikely new voting machines will be in place for this year's fall elections in New York and fully implementing them may have to wait until 2009, state election officials said Friday. … That could leave New Yorkers using the state's aging lever-action voting machines for yet another presidential election." The AP continues, "The prediction, from state Board of Election officials, came after state and county officials participated in two days of meetings about the situation this week with officials of the U.S. Justice Department. … 'Clearly, 2007 is going to be very difficult for us and they understand that,' said Peter Kosinski, the board's co-executive director. 'We are in discussions about what is doable.'" The AP adds, "Federal officials sued New York last year over its slowest-in-the-nation moves to comply with provisions of the federal Help America Vote Act, which was adopted after the disputed 2000 presidential election. HAVA was designed to get states to replace their aging voting systems with modern machinery. The plan was to have everything in place for the 2006 elections at the latest. … Under a court-approved settlement of the lawsuit, New York agreed to have new machinery in place that could be used by handicapped voters for the 2006 elections. Other voters continued to use lever-action machinery. … While the state Legislature and former Gov. George Pataki had adopted legislation last year that required new voting machines for all voters to be in place for the 2007 elections, testing of possible new machines for certification by the state has been repeatedly delayed. The deadline for certification was originally set for late last year, then moved to this March and further pushed back to May by the state board earlier this month."

Ohio Secretary Of State Proposes Conscripting Election Workers. The New York Times (1/27, A11, Driehaus) reports Ohio Secretary of State Jennifer L. Brunner (D) said that "the chronic shortage of election workers in Ohio could be solved by requiring residents to work at the polls the way they fulfill jury duty." She is "asking lawmakers to require conscripted workers to have two days of training and then work eight-hours on Election Day."

New York Delays Replacing Voting Systems. The New York Times (1/27, B2, Drew) reports, "New York officials have given up on replacing the state's aging voting machines by the fall elections, and some would like to put off buying new electronic voting systems until after the 2008 presidential election, state officials said yesterday. New York is the last state to update its machines, and the latest delay comes amid growing questions about the work of a laboratory that was hired to help test the machines being offered by five bidders." It "might be possible to have the new system ready for the presidential primary in March 2008."

Indiana Businessman Sentenced In Concrete Price-Fixing Scheme. The Indianapolis Star (1/27, Corcoran) reports, "The second of two ringleaders in a conspiracy to fix ready-mix concrete prices in the Indianapolis area was sentenced Friday to 14 months in federal prison." The Star continues, "Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney gave Gus 'Butch' Nuckols III, 46, Fishers, a sentence seven months shorter than the one the government had recommended. … Nuckols' sentence matched that of price-fixing conspirator Scott D. Hughey, 52, president of Hughey Inc., a company doing business as Carmel Concrete Products. Hughey was sentenced Dec. 14." The Star adds,

"Nuckols held two secret meetings to fix prices from July 2000 through May 2004 at a horse barn on his property. … Antitrust officials estimate $37.5 million to $100 million in concrete sales by Nuckols' firm, Builder's Materials & Supply Co., were affected by the conspiracy to increase prices and limit discounts to major purchasers. In June, McKinney fined Nuckols' company $4 million. The company also had pleaded guilty to an antitrust violation. … During sentencing, McKinney said he was concerned about an interview Nuckols gave WISH (Channel 8) in December. In the interview, the president and owner of the Fishers-based company said market 'prices were eroding, and we probably did what any businessman would do.' Nuckols also referred to fallout from the FBI and Justice Department investigation as 'a hassle.' … 'Tell me why I shouldn't be concerned about that,' McKinney said to Nuckols in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis. 'I want to be sure you really understand what you did was against the law.' … Nuckols was contrite during his sentencing, saying he had brought shame upon himself, his family and his company and employees through his leadership of the conspiracy, which potentially affected hundreds of millions of dollars in spending on public and private projects. … Jonathan A. Epstein, an attorney for the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, asserted Nuckols was 'saying all the right things' at his sentencing but had minimized his role in the conspiracy during trial testimony in December and in the TV interview."

Delta Creditors May Seek To Extend US Airways Bid Deadline. Bloomberg (1/27, Schlangenstein, Onge) reports, "Delta Air Lines Inc.'s creditors may ask US Airways Group Inc. to extend the Feb. 1 deadline on its hostile takeover bid as they study competing plans for the bankrupt carrier's future, people familiar with the matter said." Bloomberg continues, "The nine-member committee of unsecured creditors is split between those favoring a quicker payback of their claims through a US Airways merger and those who would benefit under a Delta plan to emerge from court protection as an independent company, said the people, who didn't want to be identified because the discussions are private." Bloomberg adds, "US Airways wants the panel to urge Atlanta-based Delta, which operates a hub at Salt Lake City International Airport, to open its financial records and trigger a U.S. antitrust review. If the committee doesn't act by Feb. 1, the $9.67 billion offer expires, Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker has said. … US Airways probably would extend its deadline if the creditors 'said one single positive thing about the deal,' said Jim Corridore, a New York-based analyst for Standard & Poor's. 'All they need to do is allow the process to continue. This is not a selection of one plan over the other.' … An extension would give the creditors' panel more time to debate US Airways' merger plan and Delta's bid to leave bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline by mid-2007, the people said."

Hynbix Denied Bid For New Antitrust Trial In Rambus Dispute. Bloomberg (1/27, News) reports, "Hynix Semiconductor Inc. lost a bid to revisit a $133.4 million damage award to Rambus Inc. in a patent lawsuit over computer memory-chip technology, as a federal judge said he may decide next month whether to allow the case to move into its final phase." Bloomberg continues, "Rambus shares surged as much as 11 percent. U.S. District Judge Ronald Whyte in San Jose, Calif., said a new trial on damages can't happen until the final phase of the lawsuit, which will address antitrust, unfair competition and fraud claims." Bloomberg adds, "The judge Friday set a hearing for Feb. 16 to decide whether he should delay that phase until the U.S. Federal Trade Commission issues its penalty in an antitrust suit against Rambus, a designer of computer memory chip interfaces. … A federal jury in April awarded Rambus $307 million in its dispute with Ichon, South Korea-based Hynix, the world's second- largest memory chipmaker."

Rivals Renew Complaints About Microsoft's Vista. The AP (1/27) reports, "Rivals of Microsoft renewed their call Friday for European regulators to act against what they say are 'illegal practices,' charging that the new Vista operating system is the company's effort to extend its monopoly to the Internet." The AP continues, "They asked the European Commission to make a decision 'as fast as possible' on a complaint they filed last February. It had accused Microsoft of working to keep its existing monopolies and trying to extend its market dominance into other areas, including Web-based computing." The AP adds, 'Microsoft had no immediate comment beyond saying that the rivals — represented by the European Committee for Interoperable Systems — were not saying anything new. The company has described the group as a front for I.B.M. and other competitors that have tried to use regulatory complaints to their business advantage. .. .The group said Microsoft's XAML markup language — which it said was positioned to replace the current Web page language HTML — was designed 'from the ground up to be dependent on Windows.' … 'The very same practices the European Commission found to be illegal almost three years ago have now been implemented in Vista,' the group of rivals said. .. A spokesman for the group, Thomas Vinje, said Microsoft was seeking to impose its own Windows-dependent standards and displace existing ones."

Jury Clears Broadcom Of Patent Infringement Allegations. The AP (1/27, Spagat) reports, "A federal jury ruled Friday that Broadcom Corp. did not infringe on two of rival semiconductor maker Qualcomm Inc.'s patents for video compression technology, Broadcom said." The AP continues, "The nine-day trial, the latest turn in a long-running legal battle between the two companies included testimony from both chairmen, Broadcom's Henry Samueli and Qualcomm's Irwin Jacobs." The AP adds, "Lou Lipin, Qualcomm's general counsel, told the San Diego Union-Tribune the company was disappointed with the verdict and had not decided whether to appeal. The verdict comes amid a fierce attack against Qualcomm's business model by Broadcom, Nokia Corp. and other wireless equipment makers who say Qualcomm charges excessive royalties for rights to its patented inventions." The AP notes, "Qualcomm accused Broadcom of violating two patents for the compressing of video signals - technology that is used in DVD players, digital televisions and iPod music players. … Qualcomm has filed numerous lawsuits that accuse Broadcom of infringing on a combined 10 patents and misappropriating trade secrets. Broadcom has filed lawsuits that accuse Qualcomm of violating a total of 18 patents, and is one of six companies that has asked the European Commission to investigate Qualcomm's business practices."

Bank Of America In Alliance Talks With Countrywide. The Financial Times (1/27, Ben White, Politi) reports, "Bank of America and Countrywide Financial have held discussions about an alliance that would create the biggest mortgage lending group in the US, people close to the matter said." The Times continues, The talks are said to be at an early stage and may not lead to a deal. But if they proceed, the negotiations could lead to a joint venture between the two companies, under which BofA would use its big branch network to help sell home mortgages originated by Countrywide. Countrywide would have the support of BofA's far bigger balance sheet to fund its lending." The Times adds, "The talks could also lead to an acquisition of Countrywide by BofA, which is eager to expand its mortgage lending business to match its breadth in credit cards. Such an acquisition would probably cost BofA, the second-biggest US bank, about $30bn, analysts said. … The talks indicate that BofA continues to focus on expansion in the US in spite of recent reports that it might be interested in buying UK bank Barclays. Ken Lewis, chief executive, has said a major foreign acquisition would be difficult for BofA to execute."

Nasdaq Declines To Boost Bid For London Stock Exchange. The New York Times (1/27, Timmons) reports, "Nasdaq said on Friday that it did not plan to raise its offer for the London Stock Exchange, just before a deadline to do so, damping investors' expectations. Investors have until Feb. 10 to tender their shares for a deal, but any changes in the bid would have to happen this weekend unless a rival bidder emerges. … That is generally seen as unlikely, though any such deal would not happen quickly, because the N.Y.S.E. is just starting to absorb pan-European exchange Euronext." The Times continues, "The exchange's shares have fallen over the last week as investors who were hoping for a higher price than Nasdaq's initial $5.3 billion bid head for the door. … If the deal does not go through, Nasdaq has to walk away for a year, possibly leaving the door open to other bidders. Shares of the London Stock Exchange rose 12 pence on Friday, to £12.95, above Nasdaq's 1,243 pence-a-share offer." The Times adds, "Nasdaq already owns 28.8 percent of the London exchange and needs an additional 21 percent to take control. Nasdaq has hinted that it could reduce its position, but many other investors think that is a bluff designed to persuade them to tender their shares of stock for the hostile offer."

The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B3, Macdonald, Teitelbaum) reports, "Nasdaq could have raised its offer until a deadline at midnight Saturday if the LSE's board had agreed to a new bid. Under United Kingdom takeover rules, Nasdaq will no longer be able to increase its offer for the LSE unless a rival bidder appears, which most analysts see as being unlikely. … If Nasdaq aimed to spook the LSE's investors into selling -- something the London exchange has accused it of trying to do in the past -- the ploy has failed for the moment. The LSE's shares closed 4.2% higher than Nasdaq's offer at £12.95 Friday, on heavy volume."

Bush Seen As Shifting Views On Climate Change, Emission Caps. The Washington Post (1/27, A1, Baker, Mufson) reports in a front-page story, "President Bush's commitment to fight global warming in his State of the Union address this week has echoed around the world and provoked debate about whether he is shifting his view of climate change." While, "leaders in Europe and Asia took notice…, hailing what they saw as a turning point while renewing pressure on Bush to accompany words with more meaningful action," environmentalists "were skeptical but said Bush may be starting to respond to the growing political momentum for grappling with climate change." The plan is credited to the president's concern with "energy security" and to efforts by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman and FedEx Chairman Frederick W. Smith. Former EPA administrator Christine Todd Whitman called it "a step forward" and said that "Bush may be willing to sign carbon emission caps into law."

Alternative Fuels Plan Examined. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A7, Timiraos) reports that under the president's plan, "ethanol demand could pressure the corn supply" and "almost half of the country's corn harvest could go toward the fuel." In addition, "ethanol costs between $1.45 and $1.65 a gallon to produce and is less efficient than gasoline." The plan is also said to have "an apparent contradiction" because "ethanol gets less gas mileage than gasoline" and so "could undermine efforts to achieve increased fuel economy."

WSJournal Criticizes Alternative Fuels Plan. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A8) writes in an editorial criticizing the President's "big push for alternative fuels" calling it "a classic political stampede rooted more in hope and self-interest than science or logic." The plans "would, at present corn yields, require the entire U.S. corn harvest" and that "isn't such good news." Ethanol "increases the level of nitrous oxides in the atmosphere and thus causes smog." It is "less efficient than ordinary gasoline" and it "cannot be shipped using existing pipelines." It also "barely makes a dent" in reducing "greenhouse gas emissions by no more than 5%." So "here comes Big Corn. Make that Very, Very Big Corn. Sooner or later, our experience with this huge public gamble may make us yearn for the efficiency, capacity, lower cost and -- yes -- superior environmental record of 'Big Oil.'"

NYTimes Questions Cost Of Expanding Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The New York Times (1/27, A16) writes in an editorial, "One of the stranger and so far unexplained items in President Bush's energy program is his proposal to double the capacity of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve." While, "a larger reserve would seem to make sense in the post-9/11 world … is there nothing better to do with the money? Might it not be more usefully deployed developing alternative fuels or more efficient vehicles."

Bush Proposes Increase In Coastal, Marine Conservation Programs. The AP (1/26) reports, "President Bush on Friday proposed an 8% increase in the $1.75 billion federal budget for coastal and marine conservation programs." Under the proposal, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration "would receive $123 million" for "research and…ocean protections" while "Another $20 million would go to the National Science Foundation and the U.S. Geological Survey, helping increase research, sea floor mapping, forecast models, and water quality monitoring in the Gulf of Mexico, Chesapeake Bay and other coastal areas."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Coca Heritage Under Siege. The AP (1/27, Goodman) reports from Bogata, Colombia, "You're unlikely to see Milena Bonilla's artwork on display in a New York gallery. Just mounting one of her installations inside the United States could land the 30-year-old artist in jail. … That's because, instead of oil on canvas, Bonilla's preferred medium is coca leaf, the base ingredient for cocaine. Classified as a dangerous substance, importing the plant is a felony without U.S. Justice Department permission." The AP continues, "The stalky shrub, which Bonilla planted in 12 two-liter plastic Coca-Cola bottles sheared off at the spout, is getting a makeover by a cadre of artists who want to wrest coca's millennial heritage and aesthetic appeal from the teeth of the war on drugs. … But the main target of so-called coca art may be Colombia President Alvaro Uribe, who has become the plant's chief eradicator as caretaker of the United States' $4 billion war on drugs." The AP adds, "Amid an upsurge in anti-American sentiment, several leftist leaders in the Andes have embraced the virtues of the much-maligned leaf even as the conservative Uribe - Washington's staunchest regional ally - has committed himself to its annihilation. … When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice first met with President Evo Morales of Bolivia in Chile, the former coca grower presented her with a charango - a Bolivian ukulele - decorated with lacquered coca leaves. To avoid a run-in with U.S. customs authorities, the diplomat left the present behind. President Alan Garcia of Peru, who is a relative moderate in the region, suggested to foreign journalists that the calcium-rich leaf tastes great in a salad. … Bonilla's installation, 'Legal Consumption,' was one of a handful invited last year to partake in the 40th National Salon of Artists, a showcase of Colombia's most innovative artists. She calls it a meditation on the hypocrisies of a marketplace that commercially exploits a plant most countries ban in its natural form. … But under Uribe, the plant's namesake habitat has been under constant assault by U.S.-supplied crop duster planes that chemically eradicated a record 445,000 acres of the plant last year - 31 percent more than in 2005, also a record year."

FBI To Join LAPD In Targeting Cross-Border Gangs. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Helfand, McGreevy) reports, "Seeking to combat the spread of street gangs across international borders, the FBI will join forces with Los Angeles police and prosecutors next month to teach authorities from Mexico, El Salvador and other Latin American countries how to better track and investigate gang crime." The Times continues, "The three-day training in Los Angeles comes amid an alarming increase in 'transnational' gangs that move between countries despite repeated efforts to dismantle their organizations and finances, authorities said. … The U.S. law enforcement officials will focus much of their attention on how they have dealt with local gangs that have gained footholds in Mexico and Central America." The Times adds, "Special attention will be given, for example, to the MS13 and 18th Street gangs, both of which began in Los Angeles but have branched out to Central America, federal officials said. About 12 of 17 members of the 18th Street gang arrested in Los Angeles in September were foreign nationals, the officials said. .. .The training will include discussions about which laws countries use — or do not use — to attack gang problems. El Salvador, for example, does not allow wiretapping, a strategy employed by U.S. authorities to monitor gang activity. … The interagency training Feb. 7-9 will occur as Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton unveil their strategies for dealing with the city's own 39,000 gang members. They are expected to call for a multi-agency effort using court orders, injunctions and stepped-up enforcement to target Los Angeles' most dangerous gangs. Among those expected to attend the FBI summit are Bratton, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca and representatives of the city attorney and district attorney."

Suspected Drug Cartel Boss Hires Texas Attorney. The McAllen (TX) Monitor (1/27, Martinez) reports, "Suspected Gulf Cartel leader Osiel Cardenas-Guillen has hired prominent McAllen lawyer Roberto Yzaguirre as part of his defense team in a federal drug case that prompted Cardenas' extradition from Mexico a week ago." The Monitor continues, "Cardenas-Guillen, who faces a 17-count indictment out of Brownsville, was flown to the United States on Jan. 19 with 14 other fugitives. … He appeared in court once this week, but the judge closed the proceedings to the public. His arraignment is set for Feb. 1 in Houston. It's unclear whether the trial will be in Brownsville or Houston." The Monitor adds, "Yzaguirre defended the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel's former head, Juan Garcia Abrego, in another federal drug case in 1996. Unlike Cardenas, who was first tried in Mexico before being extradited, Mexican authorities whisked Garcia out of the country without a trial the day after he was arrested. .. .U.S. Justice Department officials told reporters Monday that Cardenas-Guillen was responsible for smuggling 4 to 6 tons of cocaine a month into the United States from 1999 to 2003. They also claimed he is responsible for a majority of the violence associated with drug cartels during the last few years, including the attempted murder of FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Matamoros. .. Cardenas-Guillen had been running the cartel from his prison cell in Mexico since 2003, according to Mexican authorities. … Yzaguirre was also the lawyer for Guillermo Gonzalez Calderoni, Mexico's former drug czar. Calderoni led Mexico's effort against drug cartels in the early 1990s, but later fled the country after rumors spread that he protected some cartels."

Video Of Marshals Shooting In DC Recovered. WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC (1/27, Statter) reports, "The shooting of a 16 year old by US Marshals is caught on camera. An attorney for the teen wounded on January 3 on 4th Street Southeast, says he recovered video from 4 different cameras. … David Shurtz says the images paint a different picture than the story given by a US Marshals Service spokesman." WUSA-TV continues, "On the day of the shooting the spokesman said deputy marshals working an eviction fired on a teenager who tried to run them over with a car. Shurtz says the video doesn't show any deputy marshal in danger of being hit by the vehicle. Shurtz and the teen's mother believe their is a cover-up by the Marshals Service." WUSA notes, "Spokesman Dave Turner denies there is a cover up. Here is Turner's complete statement sent by email Thursday to 9NEWS NOW: … 'The U.S. Marshals Service takes this shooting incident very seriously. We are processing the case according to our standard procedures, which call for the initial investigation to be conducted by the Metropolitan Police Department. That's underway right now, and we're cooperating with them to the fullest extent. There isn't 'a cover up' because we're responding appropriately to the investigation. After the completion of MPD's independent investigation, this agency will receive the matter for internal review to see if there were any violations of our own policies, or Justice Department's.'"

Former ATF Agent Cross-Examined In Chicago Suit. The Chicago Tribune (1/27) reports, "Lawyers for the city of Chicago and former Police Officer Joseph Miedzianowski on Friday cross-examined a one-time ATF agent who contends she lost her job after confronting the officer about corruption." The Tribune continues, "Diane Klipfel and her husband are suing the city, alleging that Miedzianowski was protected and turned internal investigations against them after they tried to bring his activities to light in 1992. … Miedzianowski was arrested six years later and was convicted of running a Chicago-to-Miami drug ring." The Tribune adds, "The attorneys attempted to show that Klipfel had significant issues with her ATF employers that had nothing to do with a detail she worked with Miedzianowski. They went through Klipfel's history of filing complaints against her bosses and asked about some of the reasons she may have been dismissed from ATF."

Judge Declares Mistrial In Alabama Bomb Trial. The Mobile (AL) Press-Register (1/26, Kirby) reports, "Jurors weighing criminal charges against accused bomb maker Gregory Wendell Nichols reported Thursday that they were hopelessly deadlocked, prompting the judge to declare a mistrial." The Press-Register continues, "The charges remain pending, unless federal prosecutors in Mobile move to dismiss them. They said they will confer among themselves before deciding whether to try the case again." The Press-Register adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Anderson asked Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Emmett "Rip" Cox to set the case for March, which would give prosecutors an extra month to decide if they want to proceed. He stated in a written motion that a February setting would not give enough time to either side to coordinate with their expert witnesses from out of town. He also indicated that both sides would like to explore the possibility of a plea bargain. … Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden said he does not know whether the U.S. attorney's office ultimately plans to take another shot at the 46-year-old car salesman from Flomaton. … Acting on a tip, agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5. Getting permission to search his pickup truck, they found five explosive devices and charged him with violations of federal firearms laws."

IMMIGRATION:

Unions Divided Over Immigration Reform. The Washington Post (1/27, D1, Williams) reports, "Union leaders are fundamentally divided over how to best tackle immigration reform." The Service Employees International Union "backs the guest-worker idea" while the AFL-CIO, "calls guest-worker programs exploitative and wants immigrants who enter the country to do so as permanent residents, not temporary workers." The SEIU "advocates a guest-worker program with visas that would let workers change jobs, join unions and petition for permanent residency." That "reflects a desire to create politically tenable immigration reform." But, it is "nothing like the president's plan" or "the guest-worker provisions floated in Congress." So "finding middle ground could be tough."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Iraq Policy Is Focus Of Bush Meeting With House Republicans. RollCall.com (1/26, Davis) reports, "President Bush spent nearly two hours at the House Republican retreat today in further efforts to build support for his Iraq War strategy and to allay concerns that Congressional Republicans could be sidelined in the legislative process under Democratic control." House Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor of Virginia said that "recent Whip meetings have shown encouraging signs that the GOP may be more unified than Democrats anticipate" on Iraq. House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam of Florida described the meeting as "a full discussion."

The New York Times (1/27, A12, Hulse) describes House Republicans as "hunkered down on the Eastern Shore" as they "struggled to come to grips with their new minority status and the challenge of the continuing war in Iraq." Bush "exhorted" them "to work with him on education, health care, immigration and retirement issues and to give his troop buildup in Iraq a chance to work." The president also "took more than a dozen questions from lawmakers in a closed session." Republican leaders said that the appearance "bolstered the Republican rank and file, which will face a fight over a Democratic resolution opposing the president's new strategy." Still, "there is deep skepticism among even these loyalists about whether his new Iraq plan will work." The meeting was also addressed by former speaker Newt Gingrich "who urged them to think big" and former Notre Dame football coach Lou Holtz, who "delivered what was described as a rousing motivational speech."

The Washington Times (1/27, Bellantoni) reports, "President Bush yesterday rallied House Republicans" telling them "the party can unite around his domestic agenda" and "explained the importance of success in Iraq without explicitly asking them to support his plan." A "private session" was described as "a 'frank,' 'unabashed,' 'good family discussion.'" Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said that "most members support a Republican resolution calling for the creation of a bipartisan panel to oversee the implementation of the troop surge and setting benchmarks for the plan's progress."

Upcoming Bush Meeting With House Democrats Seen As Helpful On Energy, Immigration. The Wall Street Journal's Gerald Seib (1/27, A2) writes, "President Bush travels to Williamsburg, Va., next Saturday to meet with the entire House Democratic delegation" in "a real 'Kumbaya' moment for the nation's leaders … While it lasts." The meeting "was the brainchild of Rep. Rahm Emanuel" and "a senior White House aide characterizes" it "as a way to open some lines of communication, which in turn might help build some trust." Seib argues that while "it's increasingly obvious there simply won't be any bipartisan understanding on the biggest issue of the year, Iraq," there is "limited time, and a limited set of issues, energy and immigration the most interesting among them, for which something bipartisan can actually happen." Seib concludes that, in Texas "Bush developed a reputation for working the Democratic side pretty well, and he got meaningful results to show for it."

Bush Health Care Proposal Said To Favor Policies That Benefit Wealthy. The Washington Post (1/27, A8, Lee) reports, "President Bush likes to say that his health-care proposal would 'level the playing field' between people who get health coverage through their job and those who buy it on their own. But experts said yesterday that it would tilt that field toward…a high-deductible plan paired with a special tax-exempt health savings account." That is said to "benefit the wealthy and undercut Bush's goal of bringing fairness to the private health insurance system." The president's plan also "faces opposition from Democrats in Congress." Experts are said to expect that "more people would sign up for" high-deductible policies and HSAs if the plan were adopted, "because they tend to have lower premiums and to allow consumers to accumulate money tax-free."

No Child Left Behind Act Reauthorization Expected To Include High School Reform. The Washington Times (1/27, Fagan) reports in a front-page story, "Educators, lawmakers and the White House are indicating that high school reform should be included in this year's renewal of the No Child Left Behind law, and the discussion about what it will include is already under way." The administration "included several new high school requirements in its NCLB proposal" and U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings has said, "I think something can and will happen this year on high school reform." Bob Wise, president of the Alliance for Excellent Education (AEE), speaking at a Capitol Hill conference yesterday said, "If we're going to do significant high school reform, this is the vehicle, this is the year." Democratic leaders of the House and Senate education committees "already have indicated an openness to tackling high school reform."

Bush Approval Up To 32% In Zogby Poll. A Zogby poll of 1,000 likely voters taken January 24-26 (+/- 3.2%) finds a slight increase in President Bush's approval rating, up to 32% from 30% in a December Zogby survey. Fifty percent of those who saw Bush's State of the Union address approved of it, while 42% disapproved. And while just 10% of Democrats approve of Bush's job performance, 26% of Democrats approved of the State of the Union speech. Among independents, 22% approve of Bush's job performance, and 37% approved of the speech. Among Republicans, 63% approve of Bush's job performance, and 84% approved of the speech. On Iraq, 24% of all respondents approve of Bush's performance, while 75% disapprove. However, the poll found that 37% think the war has been worth the loss of US lives, up from 34% in December.

Newest Coast Guard Cutter Significantly Flawed. The Washington Post (1/27, Merle, Hsu, 690K) reports in a highly critical front-page article, "The Coast Guard's newest cutter, the flagship of a $24 billion plan to modernize the nation's coastal fleet, suffers from significant design flaws, and the service has failed to properly supervise the contractors doing the work, government inspectors have found." According to a study "scheduled to be released Monday," the ship "would be limited in its ability to venture far from U.S. shores in search of drug smugglers and terrorists." The Coast Guard and its contractors Lockheed and Northrop Grumman "hindered the audit of the program, known as Deepwater, after ignoring years of warnings from technical experts about the ships' designs, the report says."

Navy Seeks Helicopter Crash Victims. The AP (1/27, Hoffman) reports, "Navy vessels about 50 miles off the California coast searched Saturday for three crew members of a Navy helicopter that crashed during a training operation. The Friday crash killed one crew member and left the remaining three missing as darkness fell over the Pacific. ... The helicopter, based at Naval Air Station North Island in Coronado, was on a training mission when it crashed at about 5:30 p.m. EST."

WSJournal Says Senate Democrats Voted Against Restraint On Earmarks. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A8) writes in an editorial, "The next time Senate Democrats preach spending restraint, readers may want to recall this week's vote on the line-item veto. The new majority had a perfect opportunity to add a new check on spending earmarks but quickly passed it by." The Journal notes that Sens. Evan Bayh (IN) and Joseph Lieberman (CT) were the only Democrats supporting "the spending restraint they've preached" while Sen. Richard Shelby (AL) was the lone Republican who "voted for his beloved pork-barrel power."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Attend To Need For Accurate Census. The New York Times (1/27, A16) writes in an editorial on the need for an accurate census, arguing "planning for the 2010 count is already imperiled. The dangers fall into two categories: money (too little) and politics (too much)." Congress "must begin by reinstating the roughly $50 million that was cut from the current census budget by the previous Congress." Congress "should also hold hearings to air the reasons behind the abrupt resignation last November of the director of the Census Bureau and the equally sudden departure of his deputy director." It "should send a clear message that the White House must choose new census directors whose professional qualifications and impartiality are above reproach."

Pelosi Criticized For Exempting American Samoa From Minimum Wage Bill. Malia Zimmerman of the Hawaii Reporter writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, A8), "Nancy Pelosi led the effort in the U.S. House during her first week as speaker to increase the minimum wage to $7.25 per hour from $5.15. In the process she ensured that American Samoa, a U.S. territory, is exempt from the wage hike, but did not exempt the Marianas Islands." StarKist and Del Monte have "packing plants in American Samoa" and are "headquartered in California." American Samoa Delegate Eni Faleomavaega "argued that raising the minimum wage 'would devastate the local tuna industry.'" American Samoa "has historically treated its workers poorly, with many instances of human rights abuses, and paid them pittances, besides." Zimmerman questions Pelosi's support for "honest government" and "blue-collar workers" and concludes, "in addition to House speaker, Ms. Pelosi can add 'ethically challenged' to her resume."

OTHER NEWS:

Durable Goods, Housing Sectors Strong In December. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A3, Corkery, Whitehouse) reports, "The manufacturing and housing sectors exhibited some unexpected strength in December, although economists were cautious about both reports. The Commerce Department reported that new orders for durable goods…rose 3.1% in December from a month earlier. A surge in aircraft orders accounted for a large part of the gain, but orders for 'core' capital goods excluding defense and aircraft were also up at a good clip. That category, which counts everything from telephones to machine tools and is viewed as a measure of business investment, rose 2.4% in December." In a separate report, the Commerce Department said "new-home sales recovered in December, rising 4.8% from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.12 million units. But many economists cautioned that the monthly number may have been exaggerated. For one, unusually warm weather in December may have confounded seasonal adjustments meant to compensate for lower activity in winter." The Financial Times (1/27, Callan) says the economy "showed signs of renewed strength on Friday as data revealed unexpected growth in the housing sector and orders for big-ticket manufactured goods rose." The news "make it less likely that the Federal Reserve will consider cutting interest rates in the coming months." The Washington Post (1/27, D6, Deane) and the New York Times/AP (1/27, C3) also report the housing numbers.

ABC World News (1/26, story 6, 1:25, Gibson) reported, "The sales of new and existing homes dropped 10% last year. That translates to about 800,000 fewer homes sold. So, the obvious question -- is the market going to turn back up?" ABC (Stark): "It would be more accurate to say right now it's stabilizing and finding a bottom after a deep slide. There are signs that buyers are out there and looking again, in part because there was warm weather. And the mortgage rate is down half a point since July. It's an awful lot of unsold homes out there. But realtors say they're seeing more activity, more looking than they've seen in a couple of years. As we head into spring, that's good news."

Stocks End "Volatile Week" Mixed. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B1, Browning) reports, "The pundits weren't kidding when they said the stock market could be more volatile this year. The Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to its 26th record finish in four months on Wednesday, and then promptly plunged 119 points on Thursday, its largest point or percentage decline in two months. It fell an additional 15.54 points, or 0.12%, on Friday, to 12487.02 and now is little changed since the year began, up just 0.2%. For the week, the blue-chip average was down 0.6%." The New York Times/AP (1/27, C6) also says it was a "volatile week" on Wall Street. The S&P 500 "was down 1.72 points, or 0.12 percent, at 1,422.18," while the Nasdaq "rose 1.25 points, or 0.05 percent, to 2,435.49."

Dollar "Seesawed Indecisively" Friday. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B4, Lindenmayer) says the dollar "seesawed indecisively Friday, making few intra-session gains as the market awaits additional U.S. data" and the upcoming Fed meeting. Late Friday, "the euro stood at $1.2913 from $1.2935 late Thursday. The dollar stood at 121.595 yen from 121.14 yen late Thursday, while the euro stood at 157.00 yen from 156.72 yen late Thursday."

Crude Oil Futures Top $55. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, B4, Farivar) reports crude oil futures "jumped above $55 a barrel Friday to their highest level in more than two weeks as freezing temperatures around the East Coast raised the prospect of increased consumption of heating fuel." The March crude contract "rose $1.19, or 2.2%, Friday to $55.42 a barrel" in New York.

Clinton Makes First Campaign Trip To Iowa. The Washington Post (1/27, A2, Kornblut, Balz) reports that when Sen. Hillary Clinton hits Iowa this weekend, "she will encounter unfamiliar terrain -- a landscape where she is not the perceived front-runner for the Democratic nomination" for president. While Clinton "appears formidable at the national level, she has not built up a lead in Iowa," where John Edwards leads most polls at present. Gov. Chet Culver "met with Clinton shortly after she arrived Friday afternoon" but "is remaining neutral." Culver said, "This is anyone's race to win. … That's the wonderful thing about the caucus process. The winner will have to earn it." The Post says that "puts Clinton in the unusual position of having to prove herself against other Democrats, and having to build up a political infrastructure in Iowa at a time when many rivals already have a head start." Newsday (1/27, Thrush) says that after her "two-day political tour of Iowa," Clinton will head off on "rapid-fire excursions to New Hampshire, South Carolina and California."

Newsday notes Clinton has not been in Iowa since 2003, which Roger Simon also notes in The Politico (1/27). Simon writes that that visit "was considered her first real signal that she might run for president some day. Now that day has arrived and Hillary is back. … 'Candidates need to spend a lot of time here,' Culver said. And spend lots of money. Iowa loves the money that the campaigns and media spend, but they love the attention much more."

Purdy Signs On For Clinton New Hampshire Campaign. The Politico (1/27, Distaso) reports "highly-regarded Democratic strategist Liz Purdy of Concord has signed on in a senior staff role" for Clinton's New Hampshire campaign. She "was the fund-raising director for former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen's successful 2000 campaign for a third term as governor," and was also "deputy campaign manager for Shaheen's unsuccessful bid for the U.S. Senate in 2002."

Huckabee To Create Presidential Exploratory Committee Monday. The AP (1/26, Demillo) reports ex-Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas will create a presidential exploratory committee Monday. Huckabee, a fierce foe of abortion rights and gay marriage, isn't the only conservative in the field and he faces a tough fight for the support of the GOP's right flank" from Sen. Sam Brownback and Reps. Duncan Hunter and Tom Tancredo.

Biden Will Make Campaign Official On Wednesday. The AP (1/26) reports Sen. Joseph Biden, "who has made no secret of his plans to run for president in 2008, says he will make it official next Wednesday." Biden is "one of his party's leading spokesmen on foreign affairs and plans to stress that expertise on the campaign trail." However, he is "generally regarded as a longshot."

Hunter First To Buy Ad Time In New Hampshire. On its Web site, the Boston Globe (1/26, Pindell) reports Rep. Duncan Hunter "is the first candidate to pay for television advertising time on New Hampshire airwaves for the 2008 presidential election. The ad, which began airing on WMUR-TV in Manchester today, shows Hunter in front of a fence on the border with Mexico." The advertisement is also airing in Iowa.

Giuliani's Indecision On Presidential Run Concerns Some Supporters. The New York Times (1/27, Roberts) reports on its front page that Rudy Giuliani, "who developed a national reputation for decisive and reassuring leadership after 9/11, now faces the odd challenge of having to reassure some supporters that he can be decisive about a very different issue: running for president." While he has created an exploratory committee, recruited a campaign team, and is visiting New Hampshire, "he has studiously avoided making a public commitment to run." In that state Friday, he said he "would not be rushed by contenders who are already entering the race. 'You should do it when you feel it's the right time,' he said. Despite the delay, his aides argue that the accelerated pace of early primaries next year actually benefits a well-established figure like Mr. Giuliani," especially with large, metropolitan states like California, Florida, Illinois, and New Jersey poised to jump to the front of the queue. But still, "doubts have been raised about the proverbial fire in his belly. Some New Yorkers in particular recall his decision" to quit his 2000 Senate campaign "after running for months and raising millions of dollars but never formally declaring his candidacy."

McCain's Campaign Finance Reform Support Could Conflict With Ambitions. The Politico (1/27) reports Sen. John McCain "will sponsor a bill to strengthen campaign finance laws in this session of Congress despite vehement opposition to campaign finance reform from conservative Republican activists whose support he needs to win the party's nomination for president in 2008." He "recently had appeared to be backing away from his support of campaign finance reform" and he "has declined to support two other campaign finance measures that reformers consider priorities: one would expand the public financing system for presidential elections, and another would require grassroots organizations to disclose their funding and expenditures." That "worried campaign finance reformers" but "McCain's campaign officials deny that he's backed away from supporting campaign finance reform."

Obama Gained Reputation As Coalition-Builder On Harvard Law Review. In a front-page profile, the Los Angeles Times (1/27, Serrano, Savage) looks at Sen. Barack Obama's early career, when "a deeply divided editorial staff chose him as the first African American to lead the prestigious" Harvard Law Review. It was "no small accomplishment. Obama, who at nearly 30 was older and more world-wise than most of his classmates, had to navigate among sharply drawn factions of conservatives and liberals to beat 18 other candidates for the job. Today, Obama's weighing of a bid for the White House has provoked questions about whether he has the experience to build a winning coalition of voters. But at Harvard Law Review he showed that -- on a much smaller scale -- he had the savvy to maneuver through turbulent political waters. … Interviews with more than a dozen people associated with the law review, both liberals and conservatives, found no one who did not profess respect for Obama."

Front-Loaded Primary Calendar Could Boost Current Frontrunners. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 4, 2:00, Williams) reported, "If you think the process of picking a president in this country starts early now, there may be a game changer on the way if some proposed changes to the presidential primary system become a reality." NBC (Mitchell): "Small states where candidates campaign in people's living rooms will be joined in the opening weeks much next year's campaign not only by Nevada and South Carolina, but by delegate rich mega-states, California, Florida, Illinois and New Jersey when expensive television advertising is king. That means a number of delegates, and perhaps the nominee, could be decided almost immediately. … The move, engineered by Hillary Clinton supporters, would help her survive to the next round. It could help other well funded candidates like Republican front runner John McCain. … The calendar could make it harder for dark horse candidates to break out."

Gibbons Says Candidates Will Walk "Political Tightrope" In Nevada. Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons discussed his state's early caucuses on MSNBC's Hardball (1/26, Matthews), saying, "Nevada is going to make all of these candidates walk a political tightrope. Because if you're on the evangelical or conservative on the Republican side, you're going to have to come out and support gaming, the industries that are important to Nevada. You are going to have look at where is your stand on Yucca Mountain, a very, very contentious issue." Asked if Hillary Clinton can win the Democratic caucuses, Gibbons said, "There have been a lot of glass ceilings broken by women in Nevada."

Change Of Control In Tennessee Senate Another Sign Of South's GOP Trend. The New York Times (1/27, A11, Emery) reports on the replacement of the Tennessee Senate speaker, "John S. Wilder, an 85-year-old Democrat who had been speaker since 1971," who has been replaced by "Ronald L. Ramsey, the first Republican to lead the body since Reconstruction." Wilder "comes from a wealthy West Tennessee cotton family" and was "the nation's longest serving state legislative leader." The change is said to show "a reality in the South: rising Republican strength in state politics." While, "as recently as the early 1990s, Democrats controlled every Southern legislature" today, "Republicans control both houses in Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia, while Democrats control those in Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana and North Carolina. In Mississippi and Tennessee, Democrats control the House and Republicans the Senate."

LATimes Urges Lobbyists To Report Efforts To Stimulate Grass-Roots Lobbying. The Los Angeles Times (1/27) writes in an editorial favoring a provision that was removed from "the recently enacted ethics bill in the Senate" to "require any organization that spends at least $25,000 to stimulate grass-roots lobbying to file detailed reports with Congress." Now "more modest proposals being discussed would be limited to organizations that already are registered as lobbyists." And "members of Congress have a right to know whether a campaign is the result not of a spontaneous sea change in public opinion but a professional operation."

El-Baradei Says Iran Plans Full-Scale Uranium Enrichment. The New York Times (1/27, Landler, Sanger, 1.16M) notes IAEA head Mohamed El-Baradei "said Friday that Iranian officials had told him that they planned to begin installing equipment next month in an industrial-scale plant to enrich uranium. Such a move would intensify Iran's confrontation with the Security Council, which has demanded a full suspension of the production of nuclear material, and has authorized mild sanctions." El-Baradei's statement "was coupled with a plea to both Tehran and Western nations for all sides to take a 'timeout' to head off a larger confrontation." He "proposed a suspension of the sanctions against Iran, while the Iranians simultaneously suspend enrichment of uranium." While "nuclear experts and American officials say Iran's announcement may be a bluff," El-Baradei "seemed clearly concerned that once enrichment began, it would be difficult to halt, and that Iranian officials would be loath to dismantle any plant once construction had begun. He is also concerned that such a plant could become a military target for the United States or Israel." Washington "said it would stick to its insistence that Iran stop enrichment before negotiations begin. The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the reports that Iran planned to install 3,000 centrifuges showed its continued defiance."

The AP (1/26, Jahn) cites UN statements that Tehran "plans to begin work next month on an underground uranium enrichment facility, as part of a plan to create a network of tens of thousands of machines turning out material that could be used to make nuclear arms." Those "comments were the first concrete confirmation that work on the facility would begin in February." Undersecretary Burns "warned the move would be a 'major miscalculation' by Iran. 'If Iran takes this step, it is going to confront universal international opposition. If they think they can get away with 3,000 centrifuges without another Security Council resolution and additional international pressure, then they are very badly mistaken.'"

Beirut Curfew Ends But Further Sectarian Strife Feared. The New York Times (1/27, A6, Bakri) reports, "Lebanese Army soldiers reinforced checkpoints and maintained a heavy presence in tense neighborhoods in Beirut on Friday, lifting a rare nighttime curfew that had been imposed to stop the worsening violence between pro- and antigovernment crowds." The Times adds from the capital, "If there was any optimism in this beleaguered city, it was framed around the hopeful notion that all sides had become so frightened by the violence that perhaps they would be willing to find a compromise to end the nation's internal political standoff." There remains in Beirut "a veneer of calm yet deep uncertainty as the Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah and its allies held funerals for two of their activists who had been shot near the university campus. Leaders on all sides, as they have from the beginning, called for unity to prevent Lebanon from sliding toward civil war."

An analysis piece in the Wall Street Journal (1/27, A4, Fam) is titled, "Lebanon Stands At Shiite-Sunni Brink." The recent violence "has again raised the specter of a civil war with a sectarian slant that echoes the growing regional Sunni-Shiite tensions. It also has underscored how combustible the stalemate has become between the Lebanese government and the opposition." Noting Beirut's history of "mass protests that were largely disciplined and peaceful," the Journal says Lebanese have "more recently seen a frightening escalation of unrest that troubles many Lebanese still recovering from the 15-year-old civil war that ended in 1990." Today's "political differences…have sectarian undertones, among other things. Lebanese Sunnis largely back the government, while the Shiite Hezbollah and other Shiite groups stand in the opposition. Christians are divided between the two camps." Also, "increasing polarization in the Middle East further aggravates this issue."

A 1,000-word analysis in the Washington Post (1/27, A10, Shadid) describes the emergence of Beirut's Old Airport Road as the separation line between Shiite and Sunni factions. "The emerging border evokes the old and the new of Lebanon's two-month-old crisis: civil war memories and the sectarian schism transforming Lebanon and the region around it." Describing yesterday's events, the Post says "calm returned Friday after the army imposed an overnight curfew and politicians urged their followers to retreat from the streets. … But the telltale specter of civil war lingered." The Post adds, "In the claustrophobia inspired by Lebanon's shoe-horned diversity, many Sunnis were upset that Shiites had dared to encroach upon what Sunnis consider their turf, and they set up their own checkpoints in the Bekaa Valley and on the coast south of Beirut. Along the Old Airport Road, residents wrestled with the knowledge that civil wars often start through accumulated accidents, not by design."

Spate Of Gaza Violence Derails Palestinian Talks. The Washington Post/AP (1/27, A13) reports, "Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a fighter from the rival Fatah movement Friday, witnesses said, sparking a deadly gun battle. The clash capped a day of factional violence across the Gaza Strip that killed at least 13 people, including a 2-year-old boy." The AP notes the one-year anniversary yesterday of Hamas' parliamentary election victory and calls the violence "among the deadliest in nearly two months." Under the headline, "Deadly Battles Shatter Gaza Calm," BBC.com (1/27) adds, "At least 13 people have died in some of the deadliest fighting between rival Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah in Gaza for months." Both sides "said they were suspending talks after the violence, which continued into the night. Both factions also kidnapped members of the opposing side during the day."

ABC World News (1/26, story 5, :10, Gibson) reported, "Still overseas, it's been a tumultuous day in the Palestinian territories. In Gaza, a sea of Hamas supporters to mark the victory in the Palestinian elections a year ago. But elsewhere, at least 13 people were killed, including a 2-year-old boy. One of the deadliest days in fighting between Palestinian factions." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Boudreaux, Alouf) adds, "Fourteen Palestinians died Friday in a resurgence of factional violence that marred the one-year anniversary of Hamas' victory in parliamentary elections. The daily death toll was one of the highest in the sporadic street fighting that has sunk the Palestinians deeper into chaos and poverty over the last year and complicated efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

Suicide Bomber Targets Islamabad Marriott Hotel. The New York Times (1/27, A7, Masood) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a Marriott hotel [in Islamabad] on Friday afternoon, killing himself and a security guard, the police and security officials said. At least five other people were wounded. No one immediately claimed responsibility." The Times calls the attack site "an upscale neighborhood of the Pakistani capital considered to be a high-security zone. Many foreign visitors stay at the Marriott, and important government and private functions are often held there. The prime minister and many of his cabinet ministers, members of Parliament and diplomats live nearby." The US Embassy "issued an advisory to American citizens in the country. 'The embassy strongly advises all Americans to avoid the area, exercise caution, and limit unnecessary travel,' the statement read."

Chinese Officer Says Space Will Be Weaponized. The Washington Times (1/27, A1, Lederer) reports Chinese Senior Colonel Yao Yunzhu "predicts that weapons will be deployed in outer space despite her government's long-standing desire to prevent an arms race there." Her "remarks were the first time a member of the Chinese military has commented on" Beijing's recent anti-satellite missile test. "The only other official comment, from the Foreign Ministry, offered the barest confirmation and repeated stock positions about China's wish to keep space free of weapons." The Times adds, "Without naming any country, but in an apparent reference to the United States, Col. Yao said if there's going to be 'a space superpower, it's not going to be alone, and China is not going to be the only one.'"

Russia Denounces Georgia's Detention Of Uranium Smuggler. The New York Times/AP (1/27, A4)

notes Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "denounced on Friday the detention of a Russian man accused of trying to sell highly enriched uranium to Georgian agents, calling it a 'provocation.'" The AP calls Lavrov's statement "the first public comment by a named Russian official to claims by Georgia that it arrested and jailed a Russian man last year for trying to sell weapons-grade uranium to an agent posing as a rich foreign buyer." A likely confirmation that the uranium in question was weapons-grade "renewed concern about security at Russia's array of nuclear facilities. [It] also aggravated already high tensions between Russia and Georgia." The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Holley) reports, "Russian authorities on Friday rejected as an overblown propaganda ploy the announcement this week that one of their citizens was arrested last year in Georgia while allegedly trying to sell a small amount of weapons-grade uranium."

Kasparov Works To Hold Together Anti-Putin Coalition. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, A9, Kirkpatrick) profiles former world chess champion and Russian political activist Garry Kasparov. "His latest game is politics, and his style is equally aggressive." His "Putin antipathy is well known to readers of this newspaper, of which he is a contributing editor." Having "sounded an early warning about" Putin in 2001, his "new occupation is not without its perils." The Journal describes Kasparov's anti-Putin political coalition: "The next step for the Other Russia, Mr. Kasparov says, is to come up with a platform and work out the rules for selecting a presidential candidate, tasks that are on the agenda for a conference planned for April."

UK Investigators See Moscow Behind Litvinenko Killing. ABC World News (1/26, story 4, 2:50, Gibson) reported, "In Britain, officials there think they have solved the mystery of who killed the former Russian spy, Alexander Litvinenko. … Investigators believe that Litvinenko's killing was a state-sponsored hit." ABC (Ross): "British officials say they reached that conclusion based on forensic evidence and intelligence reports from inside the Russian intelligence services. Now, criminal charges could be filed as soon as next week. … Two months after his death, British authorities feel they have finally cracked the case, pointing to Moscow and the Russian secret service, the FSB, headquartered here." The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 5, :10, Couric) says the British believe the culprit was "another ex-spy who currently is in Moscow."

Kosovo Independence Drive Could Strain Russian Relations. The Financial Times (1/27, Dombey, MacDonald) reports Kosovo "is to declare independence in the next few months, with the tacit support of the EU and NATO, in an effort to resolve the eight-year impasse on the status of the province at the heart of the 1999 war between NATO and Belgrade." The Times cites source that believe Kosovo "will make its move and be recognised as independent by European Union and NATO countries once a United Nations resolution about its future – expected to stop short of granting independence – is agreed." Some "Western diplomats believe bilateral recognition of Kosovo's independence is the only way out of the dispute about the future of the province, but acknowledge they will have to work hard to prevent Serbia's objections destabilising the region as a whole." The Times adds that Brussels and Washington "see Kosovo as the biggest remaining source of instability in the Balkans. They intend to avoid either more rioting among Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority like that in March 2004 or an attempt by Belgrade to partition the province, over which it claims sovereignty."

The New York Times (1/27, A3, Smith) adds UN mediator Martti Ahtisaari "presented his proposals for the final status of Kosovo on Friday, most likely setting the tiny war-torn territory on its way toward independence." The Times calls Ahtisaari's presentation "an important and long-delayed step in resolving the still potentially explosive tensions that led to war in Europe eight years ago." The deal "would leave the former Yugoslav province free to declare independence from Serbia, according to Western diplomats who have seen the plan. But they say it would also impose international supervision, much like what exists in Bosnia, to provide protection for Kosovo's ethnic Serbs." The Times notes, "Even with the promise of international involvement, the diplomats say, Russia, a Serbian ally whose support is a crucial element, remains cool to the plan."

Under the headline, "Rift Widens Among Nations Over Kosovo," the AP (1/26, Kole) notes Moscow "is pressing for more time to examine a U.N. proposal for the future of Kosovo, Western and Russian officials said Friday, underscoring a widening rift between Moscow – a key ally of Serbia – and the United States and its European allies." The AP adds Moscow "is a traditional ally of Serbia, which considers Kosovo the heart of its ancient homeland and insists that it remain part of Serbian territory. Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority has been pushing for outright independence."

Japanese Decentralization Said To Leave Rural Areas Without Economic Support. A front-page New York Times (1/27, Onishi) piece highlights the Japanese city of Yubari as an example of Tokyo's attempts to "hew to its new policy of weaning rural Japan from the central government." Noting Yubari's bankruptcy because of "poorly thought-out" tourist attractions, the Times says the "imminent drop in the quality of life has led to recriminations and finger-pointing: at local politicians for lack of foresight, at Tokyo for feeding the rural addiction to public works." The national government's "attitude has led to anger that the central government is singling out Yubari as a warning to the countless other Yubaris across Japan. If the Yubaris can no longer count on the government to rescue them, the reasoning goes, they will start cutting costs on their own."

US Ambassador To Venezuela Tries To Cool Rhetoric But Says "Bags Are Packed." A brief item in the New York Times (1/27, A10, Romero) reports, "Diplomatic relations with the United States appeared to become more fragile as" Ambassador to Venezuela William Brownfield "responded to a threat of expulsion from President Hugo Chávez by saying, 'My bags are always packed and ready.'" Brownfield "also emphasized that he hoped to avoid further confrontation and to focus instead on issues of political and economic importance to both Caracas and Washington."

Eagleburger Discusses Chavez "Threat." Asked on Fox News (1/26, Asman) how big a "threat" Chavez poses to the US, ex-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger said, "Depends on what you mean by a threat. There's no question that he could make life difficult for us in that part of the world and he could make life difficult for us with some of the nonaligned, for example. … His ability to appeal to the Venezuelan people is a classic case of Latin American sort of a leader of this kind, this crazy kind if you will, and it only works so long as the populace of Venezuela sees some ability for a better standard of living. If at some point the economy really gets very bad, Chavez's popularity within the country will certainly decrease. And it's the one weapon we have against him to begin with…namely the economic tools of trying to make the economy even worse so that his appeal in the country and in the region goes down."

WPost Says Chavez's Attempt To Broaden Influence May Be Harmful. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (1/27, A18) touts "a remarkable year of democracy in Latin America" but says 2007 "has begun with attention focused on a handful of countries where democracy is dead, dying or in danger." Chavez "began his term this month with a flurry of authoritarianism," and "then rushed to attend the inaugurations of Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega and Ecuador's Rafael Correa, whom he hopes to convert into satellite leaders in a Venezuelan-led 'socialist' bloc. Bolivia's Evo Morales and an ailing Fidel Castro are already in Mr. Chavez's orbit; thanks to Venezuela's petrodollars, Cuba's totalitarian system may survive Mr. Castro's demise." Noting these leaders' recent actions, the Post concludes, "Ortega may understand something that [Chavez] and his would-be followers have yet to learn: Socialist economics are a recipe for impoverishment, while political power grabs tend to boomerang. The mini-bloc of Latin outliers poses little threat to the United States or the region's overall stability. But even as their neighbors consolidate democratic institutions and unprecedented prosperity, the people of Venezuela, Bolivia, Ecuador and Cuba may be headed for a miserable year."

"Turmoil" In Bolivian Politics Said To Endanger Morales. An extensive Los Angeles Times (1/27, McDonnell) piece previews the second year of Evo Morales' "embattled" presidency in Bolivia. Some "recent turmoil in" former Morales strongholds "has raised new questions about his leftist government's ability to serve out its five-year mandate." Although "a sense of normalcy has returned to Cochabamba" and other areas, "the paroxysm of rage has reverberated in national politics at a time when Morales' 'democratic revolution' was already facing fierce resistance." The Times adds, "Bolivia has a long history of forced ousting of governments, including many military coups. Morales won the presidency after protests chased out two previous presidents," and "even some of his longtime supporters have assailed the president for failing to quell the festering crisis in Cochabamba and instead opting to heap the blame elsewhere — mostly on his chief political rival here, Gov. Manfred Reyes Villa, a once-defeated presidential candidate now seemingly positioned for a future run."

Ghanaians Said To "Pressure" Annan To Seek Presidency. Under the headline, "Ghana Looks To Annan To Lead," the Washington Times (1/27, Palmer) reports, "If Kofi Annan's compatriots have their way, his retirement from the United Nations will have less to do with golf and grandchildren and more to do with presidential politics." Annan "sounded every bit like a candidate this week as he gave his first public address since stepping down as U.N. secretary-general last month." He "spoke of the promise of Africa, the spirit of change and prosperity enveloping the continent and the continued challenges that hamper its development. … The only thing he didn't say would be the words many Ghanaians long to hear -- that he will run in next year's presidential elections." Annan "has explicitly and repeatedly denied having any interest in turning to politics. He has said previously that he will split his time between his West African homeland and Sweden, the birthplace of his wife, Nane Maria." However, the Times adds, "With a hero's welcome and a reception far warmer than any visiting head of state, Mr. Annan has been getting not-so-subtle pressure from all quarters of his birth country."

UN General Assembly Backs Rejection Of Holocaust Denials. The Washington Post (1/27, Brubaker, 690K) reports the UN General Assembly ratified "a resolution, drafted by the United States and co-sponsored by 103 countries, that condemns denials of the Holocaust. The resolution came six weeks after a conference in Tehran, organized by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, questioned whether six million Jews were exterminated during World War II." For its part, Tehran "disassociated itself from [the] resolution, calling it a political exercise to deflect attention from Israel's 'atrocious' crimes." Acting Ambassador Alejandro Wolff "told reporters he was disappointed that more of the 192 U.N. delegates did not attend today's General Assembly session. 'Those who would deny the Holocaust -- and, sadly, there are some who do -- reveal not only their ignorance but their moral failure as well,' Wolff said in a statement."

Vaccine Alliance Pledges To Boost Retention Of Local Healthcare Professionals. The Los Angeles Times (1/27, Piller) notes the GAVI Alliance said yesterday "that it would commit $500 million over three years to strengthen healthcare systems and train health workers in developing nations, addressing a key problem for implementing its vaccination programs." The GAVI Alliance "is moving to counter a massive outflow of health workers in developing nations where its training and immunization programs have proved most effective. Doctors and nurses, particularly from Africa, often seek higher wages in developed nations that also face shortages of health professionals." The Times adds that GAVI "is a partnership that includes national governments, the United Nations, World Bank, the vaccine industry and the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation," and says GAVI "has prevented 2.3 million deaths from diseases for which vaccines are available, including 600,000 lives saved last year, according to World Health Organization data released today."

Experts Believe Pyongyang Seeks Strong Ties With Washington. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (1/27, A19), former State Department analyst Robert Carlin and Stanford University professor John Lewis write, "Those who think that dealing with North Korea is impossible are wrong. Unfortunately, those who think that it is, in fact, possible to deal with North Korea often are not much closer to the truth. The basic problem is that people of both views simply haven't figured out what it is that the North really wants." Discounting the economic "carrots" and "political steps" frequently offered to Pyongyang, Carlin and Lewis say of the Kim regime, "Above all, it wants, and has pursued steadily since 1991, a long-term, strategic relationship with the United States. This has nothing to do with ideology or political philosophy. It is a cold, hard calculation based on history and the realities of geopolitics as perceived in Pyongyang. The North Koreans believe in their gut that they must buffer the heavy influence their neighbors already have, or could soon gain, over their small, weak country." Seeking strong ties with Washington "is hard for Americans to understand," but Pyongyang dislikes the six-party process because those talks "are a microcosm of the strategic world it most fears. Three strategic foes -- China, Japan and Russia -- sit in judgment, apply pressure and (to Pyongyang's mind) insist on the North's permanent weakness."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Sen. Specter Presses Gonzales On Surveillance Program (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 26, 2007

Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, initiated a fast-paced oversight inquiry late Friday, asking Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a Monday meeting to explain reports of controversial legal maneuvers employed by the Justice Department in civil lawsuits against the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program.

Justice officials have blocked access to court filings in several suits against the warrantless surveillance conducted by the National Security Agency, on the grounds that the information to be filed is classified, according to report in Friday's New York Times.

Although the administration is seeking dismissal of one court challenge to the surveillance, citing a White House announcement last week that future wiretapping efforts will be conducted only with a judge's consent, senators from both parties are skeptical that the move eliminates the need for future oversight.

In a Friday letter to Gonzales, Specter voiced "deep concern" about what he deemed "extraordinary procedures" allegedly utilized by Justice.

"If the Times story is correct, the Department of Justice may have a conflict of interest in limiting access to key evidence on national security grounds as a means of controlling the outcome in these cases and obstructing the federal courts in their adjudications," Specter wrote, adding that he had attempted to reach Gonzales by phone before drafting the letter.

Specter made the request of Gonzales without the signature of Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), who is out of the country, according to the letter. "…I believe he would authorize" a request for Gonzales' presence on the Hill during the Senate's next business day, Specter wrote.

Rockefeller Says He May Subpoena Documents On Spying (BLOOM)

By Jeff Bliss

Bloomberg, January 26, 2007

Jan. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Jay Rockefeller said he may subpoena Bush administration documents on its controversial domestic surveillance program.

Rockefeller, a West Virginia Democrat, vowed he'll get details on a secret court's approvals of the program that targets suspected al-Qaeda members in the U.S.

``I don't trust what they're doing," Rockefeller said in an interview on ``Political Capital With Al Hunt" airing this weekend on Bloomberg TV. ``If I can't get the information," he said, ``I will not shy away from subpoenaing" it.

The Justice Department on Jan. 17 publicly reversed its opposition to letting the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court supervise the eavesdropping yet has declined to say how that oversight works.

Rockefeller said it's ``not acceptable" if the court doesn't review each instance of the electronic surveillance carried out by the National Security Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0123661

``In the end, every single wiretap has to have a warrant," he said. ``I can't trust" what the administration says.

The Justice Department indicated Jan. 24 that it was reluctant to share the rulings.

``The executive branch does not publicly release classified information concerning methods, means and operational details of ongoing, clandestine surveillance activities," department lawyers wrote in court papers filed with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati. ``More to the point, the longstanding practice is that FISA Court orders remain classified and not subject to public dissemination," they wrote.

Revelations about the program in December 2005 caused a public furor over privacy rights and led to calls that the program be disbanded.

Provoking Iran

Rockefeller also said he suspects that Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials are trying to provoke a military conflict with Iran.

``I don't know that, but I assume that," he said.

The senator said he's skeptical that President George W. Bush's program to kill Iranian operatives in Iraq has uniform support within the administration.

``The president has given the order," Rockefeller said. ``I'm not sure that it's even clear within the administration that it's a justified policy."

`We Will Stop Them'

Bush said today he's given the go-ahead for the military to stop suspected Iranian agents in Iraq from attacking civilians or American troops.

``If somebody is trying to harm our troops, or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, we will stop them," Bush told reporters after meeting with his top military commanders at the White House.

Bush backed the killings as a way of putting pressure on Iran to stop aiding Iraqi Shiite militias who are taking part in the country's sectarian fighting, according to a story in today's Washington Post. Some administration officials are concerned the program will prompt Iran to retaliate with similar actions against U.S. forces, the paper said.

Rockefeller saved some of his harshest criticism for Cheney, who he said tried to block the committee's efforts to get information on intelligence operations.

``He's doing everything possible to stop that," he said.

A spokeswoman for Cheney couldn't be reached immediately for comment.

Rockefeller said he hopes the next administration will be headed by someone who ``can do as good or better a job."

While declining to make an endorsement, he said he wouldn't discount first-term Democratic Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who said Jan. 16 that he's exploring a presidential bid.

``Experience is incredibly important," Rockefeller said. ``It also can be overrated."

What's more important is a president ``who is very bright, somebody who in this town can so easily surround himself with incredibly thoughtful people who are wise," he said.

ACLU Wants Access To Sealed Wiretap Filings (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

The American Civil Liberties Union asked a federal court Friday to unseal secret documents filed by the Bush administration in support of its warrantless domestic surveillance program.

The administration announced last week that it was suspending the electronic surveillance program and says the ACLU case challenging its constitutionality should therefore be dismissed. It has filed some of its arguments under seal, preventing the ACLU from seeing them.

A hearing on the case is scheduled for Wednesday at the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit held that the wiretapping program violated the 1st and 4th Amendments, which respectively protect free speech and prohibit unlawful searches.

The government appealed and Taylor's ruling was stayed pending the appeal, which is to be heard by a three-judge panel.

Last week, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales announced that the administration had suspended the program. He also announced that the court set up by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act had issued secret orders Jan. 10 approving the surveillance.

Justice Department officials have declined to say whether the FISA court approved a specific warrant or approved the surveillance program in broad terms.

U.S. officials have said that under the secret program, the National Security Agency electronically monitored telephone calls and e-mails between people in the U.S. and those in foreign countries suspected of having ties to terrorist organizations.

On Thursday, Justice Department attorneys filed a motion at the 6th Circuit, asking the court to drop further consideration of the case.

The lawsuit "no longer has any live significance," said a brief filed by six department attorneys led by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement.

"The surveillance activity they challenge … does not exist. And the specific relief they sought and were awarded … cannot redress any claimed injury because no electronic surveillance is being conducted under the [Terrorist Surveillance Program]."

The Justice Department also said that the secret intelligence court was reviewing the program and that it would oppose release of the Jan. 10 authorization order. "The long-standing practice is that FISA court orders remain classified and not subject to public dissemination," the Justice Department said in its brief.

ACLU attorneys, led by Associate Legal Director Ann Beeson, emphasized in their filing Friday that President Bush still claimed he retained the "inherent authority" to engage in wiretapping without FISA court oversight.

"Presumably to protect that supposed power, the government has declined to stipulate that it will comply with the district court's injunction in this case, which merely requires the government to comply with FISA," Beeson wrote. "Moreover, while a judge on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court has apparently approved some form of the government's spying program, the government has refused to disclose the [FISA] judge's orders. Whatever those orders do, they do nothing to resolve the ultimate issue in this case: whether the president may lawfully conduct electronic surveillance outside of FISA.

"The government cannot have it both ways," Beeson wrote. "It cannot argue that the case is moot because the government is currently in compliance with FISA, and at the same time expressly retain the authority to violate FISA tomorrow. Because nothing prevents the government from ignoring FISA's requirements after the threat of this litigation has passed, the government has failed to satisfy its heavy burden of showing that this case is moot," Beeson added.

In addition, Beeson wrote that without more information about what the FISA court had authorized, there was no means of determining whether the National Security Agency's current activities were lawful.

Twice in the last week, the government informed the ACLU that it had filed secret material in the case, disclosing only that it bore on the case. On Friday, Beeson asserted that those materials were improperly classified and should be made available to the ACLU in order to give the organization an adequate opportunity to respond.

"Recognition of the 1st Amendment right of access is of particular importance" in this case "because of the extraordinary public interest, and significance of, the issues presented in this appeal," Beeson wrote. "The secrecy surrounding the FISA judge's Jan. 10 orders, and the government's continued assertion of authority to disregard FISA and the Constitution, have only deepened public interest and concern."

Along the same line, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, sent a letter Friday to Gonzales asking for a meeting on the issue and expressing "deep concern … about extraordinary procedures taken by the Department of Justice in the 6th Circuit" and in another case involving the Terrorist Surveillance Program pending in U.S. District Court in Portland.

"The Department of Justice may have a conflict of interest in limiting access to key evidence on national security grounds as a means of controlling the outcome of these cases and obstructing the federal courts in their adjudications," Specter said in the letter.

U.S. argues challenge to domestic surveillance moot, court now monitors it

CINCINNATI - The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday urged a federal appellate court to keep alive its challenge to the Bush administration's domestic spying program, saying the president still asserts the authority for the warrantless surveillance.

The Bush administration said Thursday the case is moot and should be dismissed because a secret court now monitors the surveillance.

``The government continues to insist, however, that the president had and continues to have the authority to conduct the program outside'' the secret court, said an ACLU brief filed with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

The government appealed to the court after a federal district judge ruled that the program was unconstitutional. Oral arguments are set for Wednesday.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the secret panel of judges who oversee the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is reviewing and approving applications to spy on people believed to be linked to al-Qaida.

``There is, therefore, no longer any live genuine controversy to adjudicate," the Justice Department wrote in its brief filed Thursday.

But the ACLU said that without more information about what the secret court has authorized, it can't determine if current activities are lawful. It said the Bush administration might return to surveillance outside the secret panel without a court order against it.

The ACLU also asked the court Friday to make public or give ACLU lawyers access to secret materials in the case filed by the government as classified.

The National Security Agency program, secretly launched in 2001, monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States when one party is believed to have terrorist links. It became public in December 2005.

The administration says the program has been an important tool in the fight against terrorism and has helped prevent attacks.

The ACLU sued last year, and a federal judge in Detroit ruled in August that the program was unconstitutional, violating free speech and privacy rights and the separation of powers. A 6th Circuit panel in October ruled that the administration could keep the program in place while it appealed.

The Bait-and-Switch White House (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

We often wonder whether there is a limit to the Bush administration's obsession with secrecy, its assault on the rule of law, its disdain for the powers of Congress, its willingness to con the public and its refusal to heed expert advice or recognize facts on the ground. Events of the past week suggest the answer is no.

In his State of the Union speech, Mr. Bush stuck to his ill-conceived plans for Iraq, but at least admitted the situation was dire. He said he wanted to work with Congress and announced a bipartisan council on national security.

That lasted a day. By Wednesday evening, Vice President Dick Cheney was on CNN contradicting most of what Mr. Bush had said. We were left asking, once again, Who exactly is running this White House?

While Mr. Bush has been a bit more forthright lately about how badly things have gone in Iraq, Mr. Cheney spoke of "enormous successes" there and refused to pay even curled-lip service to consulting Congress. Whatever votes Congress takes on Iraq, Mr. Cheney said, "it won't stop us."

Whenever the vice president does this sort of thing, and it's pretty often, Americans are faced with an unpleasant choice: Are Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney running a bait-and-switch operation, or does the vice president simply feel free to cut the ground out from under Mr. Bush?

All of that was distressing enough. But in Friday's Times, Adam Liptak gave an account of the way the administration — after grandly announcing that it was finally going to obey the law on wiretapping — is trying to quash lawsuits over Mr. Bush's outlaw eavesdropping operations by imposing outrageous secrecy and control over the courts.

Justice Department lawyers are withholding evidence from plaintiffs and even restricting the access of judges to documents in cases involving Mr. Bush's decision to authorize the warrantless interception of e-mail and phone calls. In one suit, Justice Department lawyers tried to seize computers from the plaintiffs' lawyers to remove a document central to their case against the government.

In response to these and other serious concerns, the Justice Department offered only the most twisted excuses, which a federal judge rightly compared to "Alice in Wonderland."

When government lawyers tried to take back a document that has circulated around the world, the judge asked a Justice Department lawyer, "Who is it secret from?" The answer: "Anyone who has not seen it."

These are not isolated events. The government has made the same Orwellian claims of secrecy in a lawsuit over the president's decision to create secret C.I.A. prisons for terrorism suspects. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales routinely stonewalls legitimate Congressional requests for documents and information on a wide range of issues. He negotiated a secret agreement to give supposed judicial oversight to Mr. Bush's wiretapping program, with a court that does not permit anyone into its hearings to argue against the government.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney claim that they are protecting the powers of the presidency. At least that's the bait they use to explain their trampling on civil liberties and the constitutional balance of power. But by abusing the government's legitimate right to claim secrecy in court hearings, they will make it harder for other presidents to do that when it is actually justified. And with that switch, they have done grievous harm to the credibility of the Oval Office and the country.

Tardy Compliance (WT)

By Jacob Sullum

The skeptics who doubt that 21,000 more troops will be the difference between war and peace in Iraq may be underestimating the Bush administration, which recently demonstrated it can do the impossible. This month, after violating the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) by eavesdropping on Americans without warrants for five years because obtaining judicial approval would have endangered national security, the administration somehow found a way to obey the law without sacrificing our safety.

By exposing the hollowness of President Bush's national security justification, his tardy compliance with FISA demonstrates more contempt for the rule of law than continued defiance would have. Since the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program was publicly revealed in December 2005, the administration has maintained "it was absolutely necessary to protect the security of our country," as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee on Jan. 18. Now we know that's not true.

From now on, Mr. Gonzales said, NSA surveillance of international e-mail and phone calls involving people on U.S. soil "where there is probable cause to believe that one of the communicants is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an associated terrorist organization" will be "subject to the approval of the FISA court." Although the Bush administration publicly insisted for a year that such a concession would compromise national security, Mr. Gonzales promised "the country will not be any less safe" now that the president has deigned to follow the law.

According to Mr. Gonzales, the Justice Department managed to square this circle by coming up with a "complicated" and "innovative" approach that complies with FISA yet allows the "speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat." Since the statute explicitly permits retroactive approval of surveillance in emergencies up to 72 hours after the fact, it's not clear what additional leeway the government thought it needed.

Nor is it clear how the government was able to get that extra flexibility without asking Congress to change the law (something Congress has been happy to do in the past). Mr. Gonzales refused to clarify whether the FISA court orders cover particular individuals (as the Justice Department has implied), groups of suspects or the program as a whole, although it's hard to see how answering that question would jeopardize national security.

Mr. Gonzales also failed to explain why complying with FISA was not possible until now. Although Bush administration officials discussed it "from time to time" over the years, he said, negotiations with the FISA court did not begin until 2005, in response to "the concerns raised" by members of Congress who knew about the program before the New York Times publicly disclosed its existence. He insisted the administration's reversal had nothing to do with the Times story, the ensuing criticism, or the lawsuits challenging the program's legality.

Whether you buy that or not, the reason for the delay in complying with FISA is clear: When it comes to fighting terrorism, the president considers obeying the law optional. As Mr. Gonzales emphasized, the administration still maintains the president is not obligated to follow FISA; he is doing so only because he has decided that "involving all branches of government on such an important program is best for the country." Given the president's view of his "inherent" powers, he could go back to evading the courts and flouting the will of Congress any day.

Mr. Bush is vague about the limits of the powers he claims -- whether, for instance, they include the authority unilaterally to order the opening of mail or the surveillance of purely domestic phone calls. Worse, he asks us to accept blindly his word that in any given case the terrorist nexus that supposedly justifies these extraordinary measures is in fact present. The danger of such unchecked power is the reason that, under our Constitution, "involving all branches of government" is not just a good idea; it's the law.

Limits On Power? Bush Won't Hear Of It (HONADV)

Honolulu Advertiser, January 27, 2007

Americans who are worried about the Bush administration's tight grip on the reins of power can't be happy with the news from Capitol Hill.

First, the president signals that he's now ready to end the practice of conducting warrantless wiretapping, announcing that any such operations will now meet requirements for court orders under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. This administration's turnabout resulted from negotiations with the FISA court.

But just when some critics felt ready to turn handsprings, others — including several U.S. senators — fired off pointed questions.

DOJ_NMG_0123665

New York's Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer asked whether these warrants were blanket approvals or broad brushstrokes enabling generic roundups.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales owes us an answer.

In later grillings about federal prosecution of terrorists, Gonzales' message to the Senate was clearer — but even more disturbing. Habeas corpus — the right to go to federal court and challenge one's imprisonment — is not protected by the Constitution.

Even veteran Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter was incredulous, quoting a section in the Constitution barring suspension of habeas. How, he argued, can you ban the suspension of a right that doesn't exist?

Good question.

If the voters tried to communicate a need for some limits to executive power, the president wasn't hearing it.

Editorial: A Stunning Assertion (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, January 27, 2007

Yes, the right of habeas corpus does exist

It's been part of the Anglo-American legal tradition since the Magna Carta in 1215. And the U.S. Constitution explicitly says that it cannot be suspended, except in the case of rebellion or invasion. Yet Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee this week that he believes people in the United States have no constitutional right to habeas corpus.

The writ of habeas corpus -- literally, "produce the body" -- has been a bulwark of personal liberty for more than 800 years. It requires that any time a person is detained, the government must produce the prisoner in person and state why he or she is being detained. A person taken into custody must either be charged or released.

But there was Gonzales, testifying before the Judiciary Committee that "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution; there is a prohibition against taking it away."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., was flabbergasted: "Now, wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away, except in the case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have a right of habeas corpus, unless there is an invasion or rebellion?"

Gonzales dug in: "I meant by that comment, the Constitution doesn't say, 'Every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas.' It doesn't say that."

Specter was justifiably appalled: "You may be treading on your interdiction and violating common sense, Mr. Attorney General."

Unfortunately, this was not merely a theoretical exchange. The Bush administration already has been detaining people without charge. For example, Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen, was detained in 2002 at a Chicago airport and then held for 3½ years without charges at a U.S. Navy brig in South Carolina.

The Bush administration forces us to learn anew the hallowed principles of our legal tradition -- and to defend them. Habeas corpus continues to be a basic human right worth fighting for -- to prevent a king or any government from arbitrarily throwing people into prison without charges.

Canada To Pay $9.75 Million To Man Tortured In Syria (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

OTTAWA, Jan. 26 — Maher Arar, the Canadian software engineer who was detained by American officials in 2002 and deported to Syria, where he was jailed and regularly tortured, will receive 11.5 million Canadian dollars ($9.75 million) in compensation from the Canadian government, under a settlement announced Friday.

The compensation ends a lawsuit brought by Mr. Arar and follows a recommendation from a judicial inquiry into his case. That inquiry said the expulsion to Syria was caused by false assertions made by the Canadian police to United States officials, saying that Mr. Arar was an Islamic extremist linked to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Arar, traveling on a Canadian passport, was pulled aside by immigration agents in New York as he changed planes on his way home to Ottawa from Tunisia. He was instead flown to Syria, his birthplace.

The Canadian judicial inquiry cleared Mr. Arar of any terrorism connections in September 2006, and concluded that anonymous Canadian officials had orchestrated a defamation campaign against him after his return from Syria in October 2003.

As he announced the settlement on Friday, Prime Minister Stephen Harper offered a formal apology to Mr. Arar and his family for their “terrible ordeal.”

DOJ_NMG_0123666

Mr. Arar, whose career was destroyed by the episode and who has suffered emotional problems since returning to Canada, said the government's apology was more important for him than the financial settlement.

"The government of Canada and the prime minister have acknowledged my innocence," Mr. Arar told a news conference. "This means the world to me."

After apologizing, Mr. Harper renewed calls for the United States to remove Mr. Arar from its terrorist watch list. "Canada fully understands and appreciates and shares the United States' concerns with regard to security," he said. "However, the Canadian government has every right to go to bat when it believes one of its citizens has been treated unfairly by another government."

The case has strained the otherwise cordial relationship between Mr. Harper's Conservative government and the Bush administration.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, have told Canadian officials that Mr. Arar is still on the watch list because of independent information about him obtained independently by law enforcement agencies in the United States.

After reviewing a confidential file concerning Mr. Arar, however, Stockwell Day, Canada's public safety minister, said that it contained "nothing new" that justified blocking Mr. Arar from entering the United States.

This week, David H. Wilkins, the United States ambassador to Canada, publicly rebuked Mr. Day. "It's a little presumptuous for him to say who the United States can and cannot allow into our country," Mr. Wilkins said at a news conference in Edmonton, Alberta.

Mr. Arar has been unemployed since his ordeal in Syria, where he had been held for 10 months in a 3-by-6-foot cell and beaten repeatedly, often with a frayed electrical cable.

According to Mr. Harper, the settlement amount was based on an estimate of what a court would award Mr. Arar, and includes about $850,000 for legal costs.

Mr. Arar said: "I wish money could buy my life back. That's my biggest wish."

He has also sued American officials and agencies. A United States District Court judge in Brooklyn dismissed the suit last February, largely on jurisdictional grounds, but the decision is being appealed.

Tortured Man Gets Apology From Canada (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

MONTREAL, Jan. 26 -- The prime minister of Canada apologized Friday to Maher Arar and agreed to give $9 million in compensation to the Canadian Arab, who was spirited by U.S. agents to Syria and tortured there after being falsely named as a terrorism suspect.

Arar, 36, a former computer engineer who was detained while changing planes at a New York airport in 2002 and imprisoned in a Syrian dungeon for 10 months, said after the announcement that he "feels proud as a Canadian."

"We cannot go back and fix the injustice that occurred to Mr. Arar," Prime Minister Stephen Harper said in issuing the formal apology in Ottawa. "However, we can make changes to lessen the likelihood that something like this will ever happen again." The head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police resigned over the affair, and the government has pledged to increase oversight of its intelligence agencies.

Harper and Arar both criticized the United States for its refusal to accept the exhaustive Canadian inquiry that found Arar was an innocent man. Public resentment in Canada has swelled this week over U.S. officials' insistence that Arar should remain on its "watch list" of potential suspects, as well as the testy comments of U.S. Ambassador David Wilkins, who said Canada had no business questioning who was on the list.

The United States has never acknowledged it made a mistake in the Arar case, which has become one of the most public embarrassments in the U.S. practice of "extraordinary rendition" of suspects to other countries for interrogation and imprisonment. Last week, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) demanded an explanation for the administration's stance. He complained that American officials "knew damn well, if he went to Syria, he'd be tortured. It's beneath the dignity of this country to send somebody to another country to be tortured."

The financial compensation settles a claim Arar made against the government for having provided exaggerated and false information to the United States that identified him as a terrorist suspect. Harper said the amount "is within this government's realistic assessment of what Mr. Arar would have won in a lawsuit." His attorneys also were awarded about $870,000 in legal fees.

"The evidence is clear that Mr. Arar has been treated unjustly. He should not be on a watch list," Harper said.

Reacting at a separate news conference in Ottawa, Arar thanked Canadians for siding with him in the campaign, which he began with a news conference when he was finally returned from Syria uncharged.

"I cannot begin to tell you how important it is today that Prime Minister Harper and his government have followed through" on the recommendations of the inquiry commission, he said. "In doing so, the government of Canada and the prime minister have acknowledged my innocence. This means the world to me."

"The struggle to clear my name has been long and hard," he said. "My kids have suffered silently, and I think I owe them a lot. I feel now I can devote more time to them, more time for being a good father and to rebuild my life."

Canada Compensates Man U.S. Deported To Syria (AP)

OTTAWA, Canada (AP) -- Canada's prime minister apologized to Maher Arar on Friday and announced the government would compensate him C$10.5 million (US$8.9 million) for its role in his deportation from the U.S. to Syria, where he was tortured while held in prison for nearly a year.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper again called on the U.S. government to remove the Ottawa telecoms engineer from any of its no-fly or terrorist watchlists and reiterated that Ottawa would keep pressing Washington to clear Arar's name.

"We think the evidence is absolutely clear and that the United States should in good faith remove Mr. Arar from the list," Harper told a news conference in Ottawa. "We don't intend to either change or drop our position."

The U.S. government has repeatedly insisted it has reasons to leave the 37-year-old on its watchlists. The issue has grown into an unpleasant diplomatic row between the world's largest trading partners and closest allies.

The Syrian-born Arar, who moved to Canada with his family when he was 17, is the best-known case of rendition, a practice in which the U.S. government sends foreign terror suspects to third countries for interrogation.

Arar thanked the Canadian government at a news conference Friday.

"The struggle to clear my name has been long and hard; my kids have suffered silently and I feel that I owe them a lot," said Arar, who also thanked Canadians for standing by him.

"Without the support of the Canadian people, I may never have come home and I would not have been able to stay strong and push for the truth," he said.A 'terrible ordeal'

Arar was detained at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport in 2002 during a stopover on his way home to Canada from a vacation with his family in Tunisia.

He said he was chained and shackled by U.S. authorities for 11 days during interrogation and then flown to Syria, where he was tortured and forced to make false confessions.

He was released 10 months later, with Syrian officials saying they had no reason to hold him further.

"On behalf of the government of Canada, I want to extend a full apology to you and Monia as well as your family for the role played by Canadian officials in the terrible ordeal that you experienced in 2002 and 2003," Harper said. Arar and his wife, Monia Mazigh, and their young son and daughter now live in Kamloops, British Columbia.

"I sincerely hope that these words and actions will assist you and your family in your efforts to begin a new and hopeful chapter in your lives," Harper said, adding the compensation package would also pay for his estimated $1 million in legal fees.

Arar was exonerated last September after a two-year public inquiry led by Associate Chief Justice of Ontario Dennis O'Connor.

It found that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police wrongly labeled Arar as an Islamic fundamentalist and passed misleading and inaccurate information to U.S. authorities, which very likely led to Arar's arrest and deportation.

The report pointed out that Arar's inability to find work since his return from Syria has had a devastating economic and psychological impact on him and his family.

O'Connor urged the RCMP to usher in a raft of policy changes on information sharing, training and monitoring of security probes. In the aftermath, RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli resigned over his handling of the file.Cross-border tensions

The U.S. District Court of Appeals last February dismissed Arar's lawsuit against U.S. government officials, ruling the deportation of the dual Syrian-Canadian citizen was protected on national security grounds. His attorneys with the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights filed an appeal in December.

"We are grateful that the Canadian government has had the humanity to try to right the terrible wrong that was done to Maher," CCR Attorney Maria LaHood said in a statement Friday. "We still hope the U.S. government will follow Canada's lead."

The new Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy, earlier this month publicly scolded U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for refusing to explain why the United States had sent a Canadian citizen to Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0123668

"The Canadian government now has taken several steps to accept responsibility for its role in sending Mr. Arar to Syria, where he was tortured," Leahy said in a statement Friday. "The question remains why, even if there were reasons to consider him suspicious, the U.S. government shipped him to Syria where he was tortured, instead of to Canada for investigation or prosecution."

He said the U.S. Justice Department intended to respond to his demands next week.

U.S. Ambassador to Canada, David Wilkins, on Wednesday chastised Canadian Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day for continuing to press Washington on the Arar matter.

"It's a little presumptuous of him to say who the United States can and cannot allow into our country," Wilkins said.

In a recent letter to Day, U.S. Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and Gonzales said U.S. files on Arar indicate the decision to keep Arar on watchlists is "appropriate."

"Our conclusion in this regard is supported by information developed by U.S. law enforcement agencies that is independent of that provided to us by Canada with regard to Mr. Arar," the letter said, adding that they wished to thank Canada for its cooperation in fighting terrorism.

Arar said his case has forced some Canadians to question their relationship to the United States, noting U.S. authorities declined to participate in Canada's federal inquiry.

"It's a question that touches all Canadians," Arar said. "Can we really trust the Americans to be our partners in the fight against terrorism?"

Canada To Compensate Torture Victim (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

NEW YORK — Canada's prime minister apologized and offered $8.9 million in compensation Friday to Maher Arar, a Canadian software engineer who, based on incorrect information, was deported by U.S. officials to Syria in 2002, where he was imprisoned and tortured for a year.

After being identified by Canadian police as an Islamic extremist in faulty intelligence shared with U.S. authorities, Arar was detained by American agents during a stopover at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport. They interrogated him for 11 days, then sent him to his native Syria, where he was tortured into making false confessions that he was involved with the Al Qaeda terrorist network.

The compensation, valued at $10.5 million in Canadian dollars, was announced by Prime Minister Stephen Harper in a televised news conference. It was recommended last fall by a Canadian judicial inquiry, which cleared Arar of terrorism links and determined that the Canadian government had passed along faulty intelligence and did not make adequate efforts to correct it.

The United States has refused to remove Arar from a terrorism watch list, however, and Harper said he had asked President Bush to clear him.

"We were clear, we don't believe Mr. Arar should be on the watch list," he said. "We will not drop this matter just because there is a disagreement and they don't like our position."

Harper also formally apologized to Arar, his wife and two children.

"On behalf of the government of Canada, I wish to apologize to you, Monia Mazigh and your family for any role Canadian officials may have played in the terrible ordeal that all of you experienced in 2002 and 2003," Harper said.

The settlement includes an additional $1.1 million to cover Arar's legal fees.

"We cannot go back and fix the injustice that occurred to Mr. Arar. However, we can make changes to lessen the likelihood that something like this will ever happen again," the prime minister said.

Arar accepted the apology at a separate, emotional news conference, saying the official acknowledgment of his innocence "means the world to me."

"The struggle to clear my name has been long and hard," he said, with 10 Canadian flags behind him and his lawyers at his side. He said he would like to use the compensation money somehow to help ensure that others don't end up in the same situation.

"This struggle has taught me how important it is to stand up for human rights," he said. "I feel proud as a Canadian, and I feel proud of what we've been able to achieve."

Arar's case has become one of the best-known examples of what is known as extraordinary rendition, a covert U.S. practice of sending terrorism suspects to other countries for detention and interrogation. Often those countries have more relaxed rules regarding the use of torture than the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0123669

U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have told Canadian officials that Arar will remain on the U.S. watch list because of information about him obtained independently by American authorities. Arar's wife and children are also on the list, and all are banned from flying into or over U.S. territories.

Canada's minister of public safety, Stockwell Day, reviewed the confidential U.S. file and said that it contained "nothing new" that would justify continuing to treat Arar as a terrorism suspect.

Arar tried to sue American officials and agencies over his detention and deportation, but the U.S. District Court of Appeals dismissed his suit last February, ruling that the action was protected on national security grounds. Arar is appealing the decision.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

In New Batch Of 9/11 Calls, Confusion And Courage (NYT)

By Jim Dwyer

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

The city yesterday released 19 recordings of telephone calls made to 911 operators from the World Trade Center on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001.

While the calls included a rich example of the valor of the day, they also showed that the emergency response agencies worked as separate fiefdoms, with callers having to tell their stories multiple times as they were transferred from police operators to fire dispatchers or to Emergency Medical Service.

And no one in the 911 system passed along what could have been a life-saving order that had been issued by fire chiefs on the scene: to evacuate the buildings.

Among the recordings was a phone call from the lobby of the south tower by a building employee, trying to get medical help for people who had been injured. The employee, Larry Boisseau, called 911 about six minutes before the building collapsed. In a calm voice, he gave explicit instructions to the operator.

“Yes, 2 World Trade Center, we have injured people in the lobby of the building, they need medical attention,” Mr. Boisseau said. “They’re on the south side of the building. However, they’re not going to be able to come in that way. They’ll have to figure another way in here. Because we’ve got debris all over the outside of the building.”

Mr. Boisseau worked as a fire safety director for O.C.S. Security. As with just about everyone dialing 911 for help, after he explained the situation once, the first operator, a police department employee, tried to transfer his call to a dispatcher with the emergency medical service, a fire department employee.

While all calls come into the Police Department, the city has separate dispatchers for police, fire and medical response. Each agency has its own computer system, and they are not integrated.

As Mr. Boisseau waited on the line, the emergency medical phone rang and rang. Finally, the police operator stated the obvious: “E.M.S. is not picking up.”

Mr. Boisseau replied, “O.K., well, maybe you can keep trying. I gave you my information. I kind of got to get going. This is my job, fire safety.”

The operator signed off, wishing him luck. Mr. Boisseau, 36, died in the collapse of the tower.

The 19 recordings — said by city officials to be the last that will be made public — were released in response to requests made five years ago by The New York Times under the Freedom of Information Act. Both the Police and Fire Departments denied the requests, and The Times sued the city. In 2005, the state’s highest court ordered that the tapes be made public, with the voices of civilian callers edited out. Last March, the Fire Department released its tapes. City officials initially maintained that the Police Department’s portions of the tapes were not covered by the court order.

Most of the tapes released yesterday were electronically edited to block the callers’ voices. The full content of Mr. Boisseau’s call was released because he was working as a fire safety officer, city officials said.

City Releases New 9/11 Emergency Calls... "EMS Is Not Picking Up" (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

Seven minutes before the World Trade Center’s south tower collapsed, Larry Boisseau called a 911 operator from the lobby, asking for help for injured people. He stayed on the line while the phone to paramedics rang about a dozen times.

“EMS is not picking up,” the operator told Boisseau, 36, of Freehold, N.J., according to a tape of new 911 calls from Sept. 11 that were released by the city Friday.

"OK," Boisseau said, exasperated. "Maybe you can keep trying. ... I kind of gotta get going. This is my job. Fire safety." The call, less than three minutes long, was one of 19 the city released Friday following a lawsuit filed by The New York Times and some victims' families.

Boisseau, fire safety director for OCS Security, was one of two victims identified on the calls because he was on the job. The other victim was Melissa Doi, whose call was made public because it was played at the trial of Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui.

The rest of the calls released Friday only played the operator's side of the conversation, and recalled eerie tableaus presented in earlier released tapes: operators trying to calm down callers trapped on the 84th floor, the 89th floor, the 93rd floor, the 105th floor. Some operators became exasperated, and others weren't sure how to advise trapped callers.

"He wants to know what to do," one police operator asked a colleague after taking the call of someone on the 105th floor of the south tower. "Should he break the windows?" Boisseau called a police operator at 9:52 a.m.

"Two World Trade Center. We have injured people in the lobby of the building. They need medical attention," he said calmly.

"They're not going to be able to come in that way," he added. "We've got debris all over the outside of the building.

"Hold on, sir, OK?" the operator asks. "OK," he said.

In the background, another voice can be heard. "The Pentagon's on fire, too. I don't know if that's true." Boisseau says, "Wow," while the phone for paramedics continues to ring.

The director later describes the exact location of the burning south tower — "It's between Liberty Street and Church Street" — before eventually signing off. The operator wishes him "good luck" three minutes before the building collapses.

In recent years, the city has released hours of emergency calls that were made amid the chaos of Sept. 11. In March, the city released transcripts of 130 calls from people trapped in the towers, including only the voices of operators and other public employees.

In August, more than 1,600 previously undisclosed calls were released. And a year earlier, thousands of pages of emergency workers' oral histories and radio transmissions were made public.

The New York Times and families of Sept. 11 victims sued the city for access to the emergency calls and firefighters' oral histories. Attorneys said they wanted to find out what happened in the towers after two hijacked jetliners crashed into them and what dispatchers told workers and rescuers in and around the buildings.

The latest calls were made first to police operators; 15 of them were later transferred to the Fire Department.

Boisseau, Doi and five other trade center victims could eventually be identified on the calls, city officials said. The complete recordings of the five victims who weren't identified were sent to their families, who could later decide to make the other side of the calls public.

In Katrina's Wake: Where Is The Money? (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

In August, 2005, Hurricane Katrina flattened two bridges, one for cars, one for trains, that span the two miles of water separating this city of 8,000 from the town of Pass Christian. Sixteen months later, the automobile bridge remains little more than pilings. The railroad bridge is busy with trains.

The difference: The still-wrecked bridge is owned by the U.S. government. The other is owned by railroad giant CSX Corp. of Jacksonville, Fla. Within weeks of Katrina's landfall, CSX dispatched construction crews to fix the freight line; six months later, the bridge reopened. Even a partial reopening of the road bridge, part of U.S. Highway 90, is at least five months away.

"It shows the difference between the private sector and the public sector," says Harold "Buz" Olsen, chief administrative officer of Bay St. Louis, who displays a photograph of the train bridge in the city council chambers as a reminder. "By the time CSX was done with their bridge, we were just getting around to letting the contract on ours."

It's been almost 17 months since Hurricane Katrina pounded coastal Mississippi and southeast Louisiana, and about a year since Congress authorized the bulk of its rebuilding aid for the region. More than four months have passed since President Bush visited New Orleans on the anniversary of the storm and extolled the "amazing" reconstruction effort.

But a review of the devastated region shows that rebuilding is in a deep stall. Tens of thousands of residents remain displaced as authorities dither over how to disburse housing assistance. Many crucial infrastructure projects have yet to start. Of the tens of billions appropriated by Congress, half remains unspent.

There are many culprits. Among them: the size of the disaster, which continues to overwhelm agencies charged with rebuilding; the crush of competing bureaucracies, which has delayed many projects including the Bay St. Louis bridge; and weak local leadership.

In addition, many reconstruction efforts are ensnarled in spools of red tape spawned by a bevy of old and new government procedures. A prime example: an obscure set of 30-year-old Congressional rules designed to combat corruption known as the Stafford Act.

According to the White House, the federal government has provided $110 billion for the Gulf Coast region. But nowhere near that amount of actual cash has been made available. The total is spread over five states and covers damage done by three separate storms. Some of it consists of loans. A chunk comes from government insurance payouts that ultimately derived from premiums paid by homeowners themselves.

Of $42 billion given to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the agency has spent only $25 billion, federal records show. Most of that went to temporary housing, debris removal and emergency operations in the early days of the disaster. It has spent more than $4 billion on administrative costs.

Louisiana says the Army Corps of Engineers has spent only about $1.3 billion of the $5.8 billion it received to repair the levees in and around New Orleans. Only about $1.7 billion of the $17 billion received by the Department of Housing and Urban Development has made its way to the streets, the agency says.

In New Orleans, officials say they have received only about 14% of the estimated $900 million in reconstruction money they estimate is needed to fix the ruined city. "We have lots of meetings," says Cynthia Sylvain-Lear, the city's liaison with FEMA.

The state and federal anti-corruption regulations offer a glimpse as to why reconstruction efforts are going so slowly.

The White House has kept in force a set of rules known as the Stafford Act. Under its guidance, rebuilding funds must be accompanied by a 10% match from local governments, on the theory that localities won't misspend if their money is also on the line. Similarly, FEMA will cover only 75% of a project's cost until the job is complete.

The requirement has delayed projects while cash-strapped towns in two of the U.S.'s poorest states try to rustle up financing.

Meanwhile, both Louisiana and Mississippi have been so keen to burnish their images that they created their own set of lumbering regulatory bureaus and antifraud audit shops. The Stafford Act has been waived in the past -- it didn't apply to Manhattan in September 2001 or South Florida following Hurricane Andrew in 1992 -- but it remains in place along the Gulf. President Bush dropped the Act for a time for certain projects, such as emergency repairs and debris removal, only to reinstate it later.

The region's reputation for corruption is one reason why. Influence peddling on the coast has a long history, from 1930s Louisiana Gov. Huey Long to Edwin Edwards, a three-term governor currently serving a 10-year prison sentence. Recently, Mississippi was named the most corrupt state in the nation by Corporate Crime Reporter, a Washington, D.C., publication.

"The question is not whether Congress should provide for those in need, but whether state and local officials who have been derelict in their duty should be trusted with that money," Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican, wrote in a 2005 letter to then-House Speaker Dennis Hastert. "Their record during Hurricane Katrina and the long history of public corruption in Louisiana convinces me that that they should not."

The result of this vigorous policing: In Louisiana, projects to rebuild a hospital along the western coast, a school-board building in suburban New Orleans and a prison south of the city remain suspended, the state says, as locals hunt for matching cash.

Meanwhile, a $7.5 billion pot intended for washed-out homeowners sits virtually untouched as applicants are forced to run a gauntlet of requirements, this time imposed by Louisiana. To prevent false claims, applicants must attend two personal meetings with state bureaucrats, provide fingerprint verification and mug shots, as well as supporting documentation, including letters from insurance companies and banks.

To date, Road Home, as the program is called, has drawn nearly 100,000 applicants. As of this week, it had disbursed only 258 grants for a total of $14.4 million. Mississippi, which operates a similar but far less restrictive grant program, has distributed $665 million to 11,827 homeowners.

In January 2006, Alan Rubin, a retired businessman, applied to Road Home on behalf of his elderlyparents, whose $200,000 house in New Orleans's fashionable Lakeview neighborhood took on 12 feet of water. They didn't have flood insurance.

After completing a 40-question questionnaire, Mr. Rubin had a four-hour interview with a screener in September, he recalls. Ten weeks later, a state-contracted appraiser visited the property. Eleven months after the initial application, the state came back with a compensation figure: $550.

Mr. Rubin complained to his local newspaper, the Time-Picayune, which chronicled his experience in late December. The day the story was published, Mr. Rubin received a call from an employee with ICF International Inc., the Arlington, Va., company that manages Road Home under a $750 million contract. He says the employee blamed a computer error -- his parents were in fact entitled to $150,000.

Carol Hector-Harris, a spokeswoman for ICF, declines to discuss Mr. Rubin's case other than to say the family "is very satisfied at this point." Mr. Rubin qualifies that: He's still waiting for the check. "I'm told that it's somewhere in the process."

Andy Kopplin, executive director of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which promulgated rules governing the Road Home grants and other federal money pots, defends his state's antifraud procedures. "The subtext in Washington was, 'We couldn't trust folks in Louisiana to spend the rebuilding money wisely,'" Mr. Kopplin says. "One man's red tape is another man's accountability."

At the federal level, Bush administration officials defend their rules. "Some people see the Stafford Act as overly cumbersome, but the provisions of the act are there for a reason, and that reason is to ensure that taxpayer money is spent properly," says Taylor Beery, director of policy for Donald Powell, the administration's rebuilding czar, in a written statement.

Running against the tide is Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu, a Democrat, who has promised to try rejiggering Stafford Act rules to make them more flexible. She's now chairman of a Senate committee overseeing reconstruction. "I'm not saying we don't need oversight -- I'm saying we need common-sense oversight," Ms. Landrieu says.

There have been many complaints about misspending in Katrina's aftermath, but most finger the federal government, not state and local agencies. In October, Louisiana sued FEMA, contending that the federal agency had tried dunning Baton Rouge for $61 million in improper or undocumented expenses. Last month, the Government Accountability Office said FEMA had misspent nearly $1 billion in recovery money since Katrina struck. Local examples of fraud have been on a much smaller scale.

Aaron Walker, a FEMA spokesman, declines to comment on the lawsuit, but says in general, "we acknowledge there are business practices we can improve on." Mr. Walker also says the agency disputes the GAO's accounting.

It is in the small towns along the Mississippi Gulf Coast where the constipated spending system is most apparent. Bay St. Louis, a town once dotted with ancient oaks and antebellum homes, remains a museum of disaster. The city lost virtually its entire underground sewer system and much of its gas grid. It needs $100,000 in street signs and nearly $4 million in secondary road repairs.

Antifraud rules have slowed tasks as basic as ditch digging. Hurricane Katrina silted in most of Bay St. Louis's ditches, which once drained the town's streets. They were later filled with debris by cleanup crews.

In late 2005, the city hired an engineering firm to survey the ditch network and work up a cost estimate in the form of a "project worksheet," a FEMA requirement. The estimated cost to clean and regrade the ditches: $3.2 million. Bay St. Louis scrounged $320,000 as part of its obligations under the Stafford Act. After three months, FEMA blessed the project.

But before work could start, the city had to send the engineering report to the Mississippi Emergency Management Agency, which reviewed the job. State approval took a month. It took three more months to solicit bids and award the contract. Work started in mid-August 2006.

After the first crew started, the state began a full audit of the project. "They call it testing," says Les Fillingame, recovery director for Bay St. Louis. The oversight called for scrutinizing each individual invoice associated with the work. In the case of the ditch mucking, that included hundreds of bills known as "load tickets," paperwork that tallied each truck load of debris. Each load ticket passed through four levels of state bureaucracy before being approved for payment.

Sitting in his office, Mr. Fillingame pulled down a ditch-mucking file, four inches thick, from his bookshelf, and let it land on his desk with a thump. "That's every load ticket," he says.

Interspersed with the paperwork scrutiny were surprise inspections. Mr. Fillingame says the state and FEMA dropped in on ditch crews to ensure there was no featherbedding.

Start to finish, it took just over a year to complete a job that involved only about a month of actual shovel work. It's a process that will be repeated at least 56 more times; Bay St. Louis has that many projects on the drawing board, most of them more complex than ditch clearing.

Michael Womack, executive director of the Mississippi Emergency Management Agency, says the process is necessary. "The governor -- he knows what the perception is outside the state of Mississippi," Mr. Womack says. "It's a perception that there's a huge amount of corruption in local government."

Mr. Womack estimates that the state's freshly minted antifraud regime could soak up $100 million in reconstruction aid. "There are lots of contractors that are trying to rip the government off. Are we preventing $100 million in fraud? Unfortunately, I think that's the case."

Adding to the burdens of dealing with antifraud regulations, Bay St. Louis must also deal with an army of sometimes impenetrable federal agencies. The $50 million reconstruction of Beach Drive, the city's long-admired main drag, has yet to start, even though it has the attention of the state highway department, the state attorney general's office, the federal highway commission, FEMA and the Army Corps.

The street can't be rebuilt until an associated seawall and the adjacent pier are reconstructed. FEMA calculates the pier alone will cost exactly $1,370,256.22.

To the surprise of locals, the Corps didn't request a congressional appropriation until November, more than a year after the storm. Spokesman Patrick Robbins says the project was submitted to Congress as part of a package of other jobs, following agency policy.

"So here we are: The whole rebuilding of downtown Bay St. Louis is contingent on this seawall, and we don't even know if it'll be funded," says Mr. Fillingame. As for the nearby unfinished auto bridge, rebuilding was slowed by labor shortages, the need for public hearings and some local squabbles.

As he piloted his mud-spattered truck down what remains of Beach Road, Bay St. Louis Mayor Eddie Favre pointed out local landmarks. There's the once-gracious home of local Congressman Gene Taylor, now a slab of buckled concrete. Bouncing over the rutted berm, recently graveled by the state, more than a year after the storm, Mr. Favre passed his own homesite, also little more than slab. He now lives in a trailer near City Hall.

In the aftermath of Katrina, Mr. Favre promised constituents that until the city was rebuilt, he would forgo long pants and instead wear shorts, just as he had the day Katrina hit. Now on his fifth pair, and facing his second chilly winter, the mayor concedes he may have spoken rashly.

"At this rate, it looks like I'll be buried in my shorts," Mr. Favre says.

Judge Puts Settlement On Katrina In Question (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

A federal judge in Mississippi, citing the need for more information, has rejected — at least temporarily — a settlement by State Farm Insurance that was expected to provide several hundred million dollars to help policyholders rebuild homes destroyed by Hurricane Katrina 17 months ago.

In an eight-page order, Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court in Gulfport, Miss., said he was rejecting the agreement because it did not provide enough information for him to conclude that it was “fair, just, balanced and reasonable.”

State Farm said last night that it had expected the agreement to be approved and that it now looked forward to addressing the judge’s concerns.

The lead trial lawyer in the case, Richard F. Scruggs, and Mississippi officials also expected court approval.

Last night, Mr. Scruggs and Jim Hood, the attorney general of Mississippi, said they were optimistic that the agreement would be revived. Mr. Hood said he was confident that State Farm would “fix the things that need to be fixed.”

In the agreement, State Farm said it would pay at least $130 million to policyholders and participants in the negotiations and said costs to the insurer could increase by another $600 million. The State Farm settlement was expected to be a model for other insurers to use in seeking settlements, which would help jump-start the lagging recovery of Mississippi’s coast.

The dispute with State Farm and other insurance companies centered on the insurers’ refusal, as stated in their policies, to pay for damage from the heavy flooding — driven by the high winds of Hurricane Katrina — that swept over the Mississippi coast on Aug. 29, 2005. Some insurers refused not only to pay for flood damage, but declined to pay for harm to houses that had been battered by wind and waters.

Even so, the insurers paid $5.3 billion for wind damage to more than 330,000 homes in Mississippi and $10.3 billion for nearly a million homes in Louisiana. The rejected settlement did not include homeowners in Louisiana.

The settlement, which was announced on Tuesday, was twofold. One part settled 640 lawsuits arising from the hurricane for $80 million; the other required State Farm to reopen up to 35,000 damage claims that state officials and trial lawyers said had been underpaid. In that part, State Farm had agreed to pay at least $50 million.

Judge Senter’s order dealt exclusively with the second part, the reopening of the damage claims. It was not clear whether the settlement of the 640 lawsuits would proceed. But during the negotiations, participants said that State Farm had refused to settle unless both the lawsuits and the 35,000 damage claims were parts of one agreement.

A spokesman for State Farm, Phil Supple, said yesterday that the two elements were separate. But he would not respond to questions seeking to clarify the linkage and whether the entire agreement might be scuttled if the judge’s concerns about the 35,000 damage claims could not be resolved. In an interview, Mr. Scruggs said he expected the settlement of the 640 lawsuits to stand, partly because State Farm has already paid the first installment.

"We're going to start dispersing those settlement funds next week," Mr. Scruggs said.

As part of the overall settlement, Mr. Hood, the Mississippi attorney general, agreed to drop a criminal investigation into State Farm's handling of hurricane damage claims and to remove the company from a civil lawsuit accusing it and other insurers of treating policyholders unfairly.

Mr. Hood said he was continuing the lawsuit against other insurers. On Thursday he urged other insurance companies to follow State Farm's lead, to settle hundreds of other lawsuits and to reopen thousands of storm damage claims.

In rejecting the agreement, Judge Senter raised concerns about a lack of detail on how much money policyholders might receive. He noted that State Farm had agreed to pay at least $50 million for reopened claims. But, he said, "there is no way I can ascertain how this sum compares to the total claims" of the approximately 35,000 homeowners, nor "how thinly this large sum may be spread."

He said he was also troubled about the potential unfairness of an arbitration process intended by the negotiators to provide an appeals process for homeowners who requested that their claims be re-evaluated. He said that under the agreement, arbitration hearings were to be limited to two hours and that there was no apparent provision for legal representation for homeowners.

Judge Senter said the agreement also failed to provide information on what the lawyers had done to justify an agreed-upon payment of up to $20 million in relation to reopening the 35,000 damage claims. The lawyers are to receive another $26 million for settling the 640 lawsuits.

Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond School of Law, said he thought Judge Senter was being "extraordinarily careful to attempt to protect the interests of all the homeowners."

Professor Tobias said he did not think the settlement "was all over," but, he added: "A lot of work has to be done to satisfy this judge."

Court Rejects Deal From State Farm On Katrina Claims (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

A federal judge in Mississippi Friday rejected a proposed settlement aimed at helping to speed the Gulf Coast recovery after Hurricane Katrina.

The judge's ruling threw into uncertainty a plan that would have required State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., the nation's largest home insurer, to pay a total of at least $50 million to homeowners who suffered damage in the 2005 storm.

In the proposed settlement, the court was asked to create a class of 35,000 State Farm customers in coastal Mississippi counties who could ask the Bloomington, Ill., company to review their Katrina claims. State Farm would then decide whether to offer more money for the claims, while customers could accept State Farm's offer or take their cases to arbitration. The class wouldn't have included people who had filed suit against State Farm, though they could have opted in.

But U.S. District Court Judge L.T. Senter raised a number of objections in his ruling about the procedure and other issues related to the case. "In the absence of substantially more information than I now have before me, I am unable to say, even preliminarily, that the proposed settlement establishes a procedure that is fair, just, balanced, or reasonable," the judge found.

Judge Senter did, however, note that the motion to create the class could be renewed if the plaintiffs could address his concerns and show that it would be in the best interests of those who would be in the class.

A State Farm spokesman said, "We are looking forward to addressing Judge Senter's concerns. We believe given the opportunity, he will come to view the proposed settlement as fair, just, balanced and reasonable."

The Scruggs Katrina Group, a group of attorneys who would have represented the class, said: "Our efforts and attentions will be placed on satisfying his questions and requirements."

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood said, "I am confident that Judge Senter will make the plaintiffs and State Farm fix the problems."

State Farm had separately agreed to pay about $80 million to 640 Mississippi homeowners who also suffered damage in Katrina. Judge Senter's ruling didn't concern that agreement.

Judge Rebuffs Katrina Insurance Settlement (CNN)

CNN.com, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123675

GULFPORT, Mississippi (CNN) -- A federal judge Friday rejected a proposed settlement agreement involving nearly 35,000 homeowners affected by Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. District Judge L. T. Senter Jr. said the bargain between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. and the Mississippi attorney general did not establish "a procedure that is fair, just, balanced or reasonable."

But Senter left the door open for a new settlement agreement, rejecting the proposal "without prejudice."

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood said Tuesday, when the proposed class-action settlement was announced, that it could mean up to $500 million in payments to property owners in coastal Mississippi who were dissatisfied with their insurance payouts after Katrina.

The settlement, Hood said, resolved the civil lawsuit he filed against State Farm on behalf of the company's Mississippi clients and ended a criminal investigation of State Farm's claim-handling practices.

But, Senter wrote in his opinion, "In the absence of substantially more information than I now have before me, I am unable to say, even preliminarily, that the proposed settlement establishes a procedure that is fair, just, balanced or reasonable."

In response to Senter's ruling, State Farm issued a statement saying, "We look forward to addressing Judge Senter's concerns." It added that it believed Senter might be persuaded to change his mind.

The Scruggs Katrina Group, which represents hundreds of State Farm policyholders and is participating in the settlement, pointed out in a statement on its Web site that while Senter refused to grant preliminary approval, "he made clear that the plaintiff's lawyers are 'in a position to address the concerns expressed in (his) opinion.'"

Hood issued a statement saying that while his office did not negotiate the terms of the proposal, he did have "reservations about some of the terms."

"Nevertheless, I knew that Judge Senter would make sure that the class was a fair procedure for all," he said. "I am confident that Judge Senter will make the plaintiffs and State Farm fix the problems he has raised in his order."Judge spells out his objections

As part of the proposal, State Farm had agreed to change its claim-handling practices. It also agreed to re-evaluate Katrina claims using different adjusters and engineers for clients who filed claims but did not sue the company. The company agreed to make new offers; in case of disputes, binding arbitration would be used.

Senter detailed numerous items of concern in the proposed settlement, including the fact that neither Hood nor State Farm has provided any information for him to determine how many policyholders were within the proposed class, or how many fall within the five payment ranges based on the damage they sustained from Katrina.

And while State Farm has agreed to pay at least $50 million, "there is no way I can ascertain how this sum compares to the total claims of the members of the total class," the judge wrote.

Homeowners are allowed to opt out of the class action, but Senter said the settlement does not make opting out easy.

"It appears to me that a lay person confronted with this claims procedure will likely be unable to participate effectively without the assistance of counsel," he wrote.

Although State Farm pledged to re-evaluate Katrina claims, the settlement agreement provides for no oversight of that process and allows State Farm "a substantial measure of control."

"There is no evidence that State Farm will evaluate the class members' claims in any way different from the way these claims have already been evaluated," Senter wrote.Company previously denied 'slab case' claims

In the so-called "slab cases" -- where homeowners were left with only a slab -- State Farm was required to offer the owners at least 50 percent of their policy limits, Hood said.

The company previously had denied those claims, maintaining the destruction came from water and that it was unable to find any separate wind damage, which was covered under its policies, the Biloxi Sun-Herald has reported.

Senter said he was "struck," however, that under the agreement, even policyholders left with only a slab or pilings are not guaranteed any payment, noting State Farm's offer could be offset by policy limits of other insurance.

"Under the proposed agreement, the insured owner of a property worth $100,000 who insured the property against $50,000 in wind damage and $50,000 in flood damage, and who has collected his flood insurance benefits, would not be entitled to any recovery even if only a slab remained," the judge wrote.

Senter also disagreed with the binding arbitration portion of the settlement. Under the agreement, the arbitrator's decision would be final -- even if it is lower than State Farm's offer -- with no appeal process.

The judge pointed out that under binding arbitration, property owners would give up a variety of rights, including that of due process, and potential legal action.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Defies Lawmakers To Solve Iraq (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Declaring "I'm the decision maker," President Bush yesterday challenged congressional efforts to formally condemn his Iraq plan, while Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates warned that a proposed Senate resolution criticizing the deployment of additional troops would embolden the enemy.

"Any indication of flagging will in the United States gives encouragement to those folks," Gates told reporters at the Pentagon. "I'm sure that that's not the intent behind the resolutions, but I think it may be the effect."

Bush consulted with Gates and Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who will head U.S. forces in Iraq, at an early-morning meeting at the White House. Speaking with reporters afterward, the president complained that lawmakers "are condemning a plan before it's even had a chance to work. And they have an obligation and a serious responsibility, therefore, to put up their own plan as to what would work."

Bush later met with House Republicans at a retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore and, according to two Republicans present, mocked the Senate by telling the House members that he found it "ironic" that senators would oppose his plan to dispatch 21,500 more troops to Iraq but praise and unanimously confirm Petraeus, who helped design it.

Democrats responded angrily to Gates's comments, which were similar to what Petraeus said at his Tuesday hearing before his confirmation yesterday. "The American people will rightly dismiss these accusations as a desperate attempt by the administration to support a failed policy that is not worthy of the sacrifice of our men and women in uniform," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) disputed Bush's suggestion that the Democrats have not come up with a plan. Speaking at the Brookings Institution, he said his party was united around the proposition that the United States should shift more responsibility to the Iraqis, begin a "phased redeployment" of troops and initiate more aggressive regional diplomacy to stabilize Iraq.

Yesterday's administration comments were part of a White House campaign to try to keep Republican lawmakers from signing on to any resolution that criticizes the president's new strategy in Iraq. By keeping down the number of Republican defections, the administration hopes to make any vote appear highly partisan and to buy Bush's new plan more time.

With Bush's leverage on Capitol Hill at a low, the White House appears to be relying heavily on GOP leaders to orchestrate the opposition to two resolutions condemning the troop buildup, according to lawmakers, lobbyists and administration officials. White House lobbyists and senior officials at the National Security Council are continuing to meet with lawmakers, but a number of senators said they did not perceive the lobbying as particularly aggressive. The strategy, as they described it, is to muddy the waters with a number of competing resolutions that could siphon support from a strong message of disapproval for the president's plan.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday approved a resolution opposing the introduction of the additional troops, calling for more diplomacy and a regional peace effort, and demanding that U.S. troops be deployed away from urban sectarian hotbeds to guard Iraq's borders, hunt down terrorists and train Iraqi security forces. Bush defied Congress yesterday to come up with an alternative to his Iraq strategy, but advocates say the committee's resolution amounts to one.

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) has offered a similar resolution, while also calling for measurable benchmarks in Iraq. Warner's resolution includes language accepting Bush's constitutional powers as commander in chief, leaves rhetorical room for some additional troop deployments and treats the fight with Sunni extremists in Anbar province as a matter separate from the sectarian violence in Baghdad.

GOP leaders, meanwhile, are coalescing around a resolution drafted by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that would establish strict benchmarks for the Iraqi government and the Bush administration to meet, without criticizing the president's plan. The leaders may also offer a simple resolution of support for Bush, saying the president's plan should be given a chance.

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said that the administration would still like GOP leaders to block any vote but that at this point even some of the most ardent Republican conservatives need some way to voice their skepticism on the record. The best the White House can hope for is what Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) called a "smorgasbord" of resolutions that splits both parties and pulls senators in multiple directions.

Like other GOP lawmakers, McConnell said time is running out for the president. "I think everybody knows what the consequences are. The president doesn't have a stronger supporter in the Senate than the person you're looking at, but I repeat, this is the last chance for the Iraqis to step up and demonstrate this government can function," he said. "The message to the Iraqi government could not be more clear."

Administration officials say they realize their position on the Hill is precarious. Many Republicans blame the war in Iraq for their electoral debacle last November, and if the situation does not improve soon, the administration will be faced with massive defections within the GOP -- not only on nonbinding resolutions but perhaps also on bills that limit the president's ability to prosecute the war.

But several administration officials said they felt they had a good week, with Petraeus making an effective case for more time at his confirmation hearing Tuesday and only one Republican, Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), defecting when the Foreign Relations Committee approved the resolution against additional troops on Wednesday.

"No one is under any illusion that we are going to win over many Democrats or turn around the country. What we need to do is stabilize Republicans," said one senior White House official who was not authorized to speak on the record. While many Republicans are very anxious to vent their displeasure with the situation in Iraq, Republican stalwarts still seem reluctant to part with the president.

"I think he made the case in the State of the Union message . . . that this is the best that he and his military commanders can come up, so give us a chance," said Sen. Robert F. Bennett (R-Utah). "If you are going to say no, you better have an alternative."

Bush Assertive On Iraq Strategy (BBC)

BBC.com, January 26, 2007

US President George W Bush has made it clear he will ignore any attempt by the US Congress to question his sending 20,000 extra troops to Iraq.

Mr Bush - who faces tough opposition in Washington to his new Iraq strategy - said he was the decision-maker and would not rethink his plans.

He spoke after the Senate unanimously backed Lt Gen David Petraeus as the new US commander in Iraq.

Meanwhile House Speaker Nancy Pelosi arrived in Iraq on a surprise visit.

Ms Pelosi, a Democrat and vocal critic of Mr Bush's plan to send more troops, held talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Mr Maliki assured Ms Pelosi that Iraq intended "to assume security missions currently handled by US-led forces in Iraq", a statement from the prime minister's office said.

Ms Pelosi told journalists the meeting with Mr Maliki gave her "a greater understanding of the others' point of view".

US Defence Secretary Robert Gates meanwhile has suggested Congressional resolutions opposing Mr Bush's troops plan "embolden[s] the enemy".

The Senate is due to debate a number of non-binding resolutions next week, some of them sharply critical of the surge.

'Decision-maker'

In a news conference after Gen Petraeus' confirmation, Mr Bush accused opponents of his strategy of "condemning a plan before it's even had a chance to work".

"I'm the decision-maker," he told senior military advisers during a meeting at the White House, the Associated Press news agency reported.

Mr Bush said that he had authorised US forces in Iraq to target Iranian agents there.

"If somebody's trying to harm our troops, or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, we will stop them," he said.

Gen Petraeus, who has spent two of the last four years in Iraq, replaces Gen George Casey.

A career soldier, he graduated from the West Point military academy in 1974 and was commissioned in the infantry.

He has served in Europe and the Middle East and was commander of the 101st Airborne Division during the invasion of Iraq.

Speaking to the Senate armed forces committee on Tuesday, Gen Petraeus backed Mr Bush's plan to deploy additional troops, but warned that the task in Iraq was a tough one.

"The situation in Iraq is dire. The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard," he said.

"But hard is not hopeless."

Mr Bush wants to commit more than 21,500 additional troops, mainly to violence-hit Baghdad, in an effort to improve security and end sectarian clashes.

But his plan continues to face considerable opposition both from Democrats and members of his own Republican party, who want an earlier transfer of security to Iraqi leaders.

Gates Warns Congress On Iraq Opposition (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said yesterday that Congress' push to oppose President Bush's troop increase in Iraq "emboldens the enemy" and undercuts the commanders in the field.

Facing the prospect of a no-confidence vote in the Senate next week, Mr. Bush called for Congress to give his plan "a chance to work" before ruling it out. But opposition continues to build, with high-profile Republicans and Democrats who previously supported his stance announcing their opposition yesterday, saying the goal of a stable Iraq may be out of reach now.

Meanwhile, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Rep. John P. Murtha, the prominent anti-war Pennsylvania Democrat, made a surprise trip to Baghdad yesterday, boosting Congress' profile as an equal branch in the decision-making process as the debate continues in Washington.

Mr. Bush and administration officials are trying to earn enough time to prove that his plan to increase troops by 4,000 Marines in the Anbar province and more than 17,000 soldiers in Baghdad can work. Mr. Gates said Democrats' plan to vote on a nonbinding resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan would send the wrong signal.

"A resolution that, in effect, says that the general going out to take command of the arena shouldn't have the resources he thinks he needs to be successful certainly emboldens the enemy and our adversaries," he said in his first press conference.

"Any indication of flagging will in the United States gives encouragement to those folks. And I'm sure that that's not the intent behind the resolutions, but I think it may be the effect," Mr. Gates said.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, called Mr. Gates' statement "a desperate attempt" to bolster the president's policy.

Mr. Bush and other administration officials have counted on the fact that all sides in the debate agree that victory is necessary. The president referred to that in his State of the Union address this week and again yesterday after a meeting with Mr. Gates and Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who was confirmed by the Senate yesterday to be the top commander in Iraq.

But members of Congress are increasingly talking about a vision of victory that is different from Mr. Bush's picture of an Iraq that can "govern, sustain and defend itself."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer yesterday endorsed a phased withdrawal within six months. He deemed it an "alternative path" that, he said, "will not necessarily lead to the Iraq we would have liked to see at the onset of this war."

The Maryland Democrat, who had been among the highest-ranking Democratic supporters when Mr. Bush went to war, said yesterday he would not have voted for the war knowing what he does now.

He said Mr. Bush botched decisions throughout the war and there is no indication that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can follow through on the benchmarks Mr. Bush and Congress all agree he must meet.

Mr. Hoyer said that in addition to the no-confidence resolutions that will come up for a vote in the Senate next week and in the House later, the House may consider a "revised authorization for the use of military force in Iraq that more accurately reflects the mission of our troops on the ground." That would allow lawmakers to pare down the full grant of authority they issued in the 2002 vote that allowed Mr. Bush to go to war.

Also yesterday, former New York Gov. George E. Pataki, a potential Republican presidential candidate, announced his opposition to the troop surge, saying that Iraqi leaders have not proved they are ready to shoulder responsibility for democracy and that U.S. troops should instead focus on fighting al Qaeda.

"Let's continue to hope, but let's not put our troops in harm's way simply on the basis of that hope," he said.

Most prominent potential candidates have supported Mr. Bush's call for more troops; but in a speech at Georgetown University, the three-term governor raised the possibility of a victory that falls short of the president's vision.

"A functioning democracy throughout Iraq is not essential to our achieving a military victory over al Qaeda in Iraq," Mr. Pataki said. "And I share the doubt of many that 20,000 additional troops alone will assure a successful democracy."

Kennedy Vows To Get A Vote On Iraq "One Way Or The Other" (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, January 26, 2007

When the Senate takes up a resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to add more troops to Iraq, there will be more at stake than a non- binding measure, leading Democrats said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0123679

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said if Republicans stand in the way of an up-or-down vote on such a resolution, the resulting cloture vote would, in effect, be a referendum on the war.

"We're going to get a vote one way or the other," Kennedy said in the Capitol.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday passed, largely along party lines, a resolution opposing Bush's surge plan. It was sponsored by committee chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.). However, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said this might not be the measure that the full Senate will eventually vote on.

He indicated that a compromise could be forged between the language of the so-called "Biden resolution," which many Democrats favor, and a proposal spearheaded by Sens. John Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine).

"We're working on having a resolution that we can vote on, and of course it'll be a mixture of what Warner has and what we have," Reid told reporters. "And so I don't think there will be two competing resolutions."

At the end of the debate, Reid said, the American people will see that "a majority of the United States Senate opposes the president's escalation in Iraq, without any question."

Reid also suggested that a vote against such a resolution could have political consequences for Republicans.

"I don't know if we'll get 60 votes [necessary to overcome a filibuster]," Reid said. "But I'll tell you one thing: There are 21 Republicans up for reelection this time. If they think this is going to be a soft vote for them, they've got another thing coming."

In their joint press conference, Reid and Kennedy also blasted Republicans for standing in the way of an amendment-free minimum wage bill.

"What is it, Mr. Republican, that you cannot stand about hardworking Americans at the lower end of the economic ladder?" Kennedy asked.

Reid added that, since the last minimum wage increase 10 years ago, members of Congress raised their own pay $30,000.

"I don't know how to describe this other than disgraceful," Reid said.

Pelosi, Maliki Discuss Timing Of Drawdown (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 26 -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), visiting Baghdad on Friday in her new capacity as House speaker, that he would like to see 50,000 U.S. troops leave by the end of the year, Iraqi officials said.

Pelosi's primary concern in meeting Maliki appeared to be to determine how soon he thought the United States could withdraw its soldiers from Iraq, said Ali Dabbagh, the prime minister's spokesman.

The U.S. military, reversing earlier statements, acknowledged Friday that four of five soldiers killed last Saturday had been abducted before being executed. The abductions followed a brazen attack on a government building in the southern city of Karbala.

Military officials earlier this week had dissuaded The Washington Post from reporting an account of the abductions, saying it was inaccurate. The account had been provided by Iraqi officials and witnesses.

Pelosi, a critic of the Bush administration's policy in Iraq, told the prime minister that she and fellow Democrats are eager to see a prompt transition of authority, Maliki's office said in a statement.

"The prime minister assured them that they could speed up the withdrawal of the troops if the equipment and training of the national forces could be speeded up," Dabbagh said Friday night in an interview.

Pelosi's visit occurs as the Bush administration is sending an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, where sectarian violence continues, impunity is widespread and the government struggles to provide basic services.

"The purpose of our trip was fact-finding, and we're in the process of doing that," Pelosi told Iraqi television reporters.

The military's statement Friday, issued following the release of an Associated Press report on the Karbala attack, provides this account of the killings:

The assailants traveled in at least five sport-utility vehicles and wore what looked like U.S. military uniforms, which allowed them to approach the building without raising suspicion. The fighters, armed with U.S.-type weapons, attacked a group of American soldiers inside with grenades and rifles. One U.S. soldier was killed.

The assailants captured four others. Several miles away at a checkpoint, the convoy drew the suspicion of Iraqi police, who followed the vehicles. The pursuit prompted the attackers to abandon five SUVs before they escaped.

Iraqi police found the bodies of two American soldiers handcuffed together in the back of one of the vehicles; both had been shot in the head. Another soldier, also shot, was found dead on the ground. A fourth soldier, who also had been shot in the head, died en route to a hospital.

"The precision of the attack, the equipment used and the possible use of explosives to destroy the military vehicles in the compound suggests that the attack was well rehearsed prior to execution," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a military spokesman.

Also Friday, the military said a Marine died fighting in Anbar province, in western Iraq, one of the most dangerous parts of the country.

Friday morning, a bomb left in a plastic bag detonated in the Souq al-Ghazil pet market, in a heavily Shiite area of central Baghdad, killing at least 16 people and injuring more than 35, Iraqi officials said.

Pelosi Meets Maliki In Baghdad Visit (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — House Speaker Nancy Pelosi led a group of U.S. lawmakers on a visit here Friday to discuss President Bush's troop buildup plan and other efforts to reduce sectarian violence with U.S. and Iraqi officials.

During a meeting with Pelosi, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said his government was determined to fight armed militants with "full power," according to a statement from the Iraqi government.

The prime minister also described details of the plan to secure Baghdad, which will include operations that will target anyone breaking the law regardless of sectarian affiliation, the statement said. Maliki told Pelosi that Iraqi security forces were ready to take over crucial security missions from U.S. forces, the statement said.

Pelosi (D-San Francisco) reportedly voiced support for Iraq's "democratic experiment" and vowed to push for the speedy transfer of security duties from U.S. to Iraqi forces long demanded by the Shiite-dominated government.

On Iraqi TV, Pelosi said she and Maliki "came out of the meeting with a greater understanding, I think, of each other's point of view."

She said the congressional delegation is "fact finding and we are in the course of doing that."

"We came here also to convey to our troops the appreciation of the American people for what they're doing."

Meanwhile, violence continued to take a toll on Iraqi civilians and U.S. troops.

Bomb blasts and shootings in the capital killed at least 38 and injured 72 during the Muslim day of worship. A U.S. Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 6 died Friday of combat wounds while operating in Al Anbar province, the military said.

Since the 2003 invasion, 3,067 U.S. troops have been killed, according to icasualties.org.

Police in Baghdad found the bodies of at least 17 men, including the corpse of a Sadr City man later identified as a taxi driver. His family, worried about his disappearance had come to the Yarmouk Hospital several times over the last week. His body was discovered this week in west Baghdad, headless and mangled by wild dogs. His parents identified the body from the clothes, hospital officials said.

Gunmen attacking a ranking police official south of the capital killed a woman in a passing vehicle.

Police discovered the bodies of three men, wearing military uniforms, floating in the Tigris River near the southern Iraq town of Suwayrah. The men had been blindfolded, handcuffed and shot several times in the head and chest.

Tribal clashes with sectarian overtones erupted in a village north of Kut. The fighting between rival Shiite and Sunni clans left four dead, police said.

In the north, a suicide bomber struck a Shiite mosque near the city of Mosul, killing one and injuring three worshipers emerging from Friday prayers.

Police in the Kirkuk area found two unidentified bodies of men who had died of gunshot wounds.

House Speaker Pelosi Visits Iraq (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) - House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Rep. John Murtha, both vocal war critics, were in the Iraqi capital Friday at the head of a delegation of House members on a fact-finding mission as the White House and Congress dueled over the expansion of U.S. forces in Iraq.

The Pelosi delegation visited the heavily fortified Green Zone, site of the American Embassy, and met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"We come out of the meeting with a greater understanding of the others' point of view," Pelosi, D-Calif., said, in brief remarks after the meeting.

She said the delegation also came "to convey to our troops the appreciation of the American people for what they're doing, to applaud their patriotism."

DOJ_NMG_0123681

Pelosi has been a sharp critic of the Bush administration's conduct of the war and has led a drive in Congress against sending 21,500 more troops as part of a new security crackdown in Baghdad.

In Washington on Friday, President Bush challenged skeptical lawmakers not to prematurely condemn his buildup, saying "I'm the decision-maker."

Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat and Vietnam veteran, has been a longtime critic of the war.

In Islamabad on Friday, visiting U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State John Gastright confirmed that a congressional delegation led by Pelosi would visit Pakistan and meet with President Pervez Musharraf. The dates of the trip have not been made public.

Democrats Try To Increase Leverage Over Iraq Policy (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — Representative Steny H. Hoyer, the House majority leader, said Friday that Congress might consider legislation revising the authorization it gave President Bush in 2002 to use military force in Iraq.

Mr. Hoyer set out a road map for the House to exercise more control over Iraq strategy, as he and other Democratic leaders continued on Friday to exert pressure against the president's plan to send in an additional 21,500 troops.

Senator Harry Reid, the majority leader, moved on Friday to force a debate on a resolution opposing the troop increase that had been offered by Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, and Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska.

But Mr. Reid said that he also expected debate on other similar resolutions. Ultimately, he said, he expects the Senate to come together behind one resolution when the debate begins the week after next, with broad bipartisan opposition to the president's plan.

Public opinion, he predicted, will compel many Republicans to support a resolution opposing the troop increase.

"Twenty-one Republicans are up for re-election this time," Mr. Reid said. "If they think this is going to be a soft vote for them, they've got another think coming."

At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates warned Congress against passing any such resolution, saying it "emboldens the enemy and our adversaries."

"I'm sure that's not the intent behind the resolutions," he said, "but I think it may be the effect."

President Bush told reporters on Friday that he had proposed the increase "in that I'm the decision maker, and I had to come up with a way forward that precluded disaster."

"I've listened a lot to members of Congress," he added, speaking at a meeting at the White House with Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, whom the Senate confirmed Friday as the new commander in Iraq. "I've listened carefully to their suggestions. I have picked the plan that I think is most likely to succeed, because I understand, like many in Congress understand, success is very important for the security of the country."

In a speech to the Brookings Institution, Mr. Hoyer predicted that the House would follow the Senate's lead in backing a resolution against the troop increase, with broad support from Republicans.

Several committees in the House would then convene hearings on the war, he said. To follow that, the House might try to exercise more control over Iraq strategy in legislation regarding spending for the Defense or State Department. Another option, he said, would be a revised authorization for the use of military force in Iraq "that more accurately reflects the mission of our troops on the ground."

Some Republicans as well as Democrats have said that the resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq, passed in October 2002, was not intended to allow American troops to police a civil war, as some lawmakers now say is the case.

Mr. Hoyer said in his speech that he would not have supported the resolution allowing the president to go to war "had I known then what I know now: that the United States of America could and would prosecute a war and manage a nation-building effort in such an incompetent, arrogant, unplanned and unsuccessful manner."

Mr. Hoyer also called for requiring the president to certify to Congress that the government of the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, was meeting the benchmarks Mr. Bush said he had set. He also called for greater international involvement in securing Iraq, and peace talks like the ones held in Dayton, Ohio, in 1995 that ended the Bosnian war.

"The president's so-called new strategy is really little more than stay the course," Mr. Hoyer said, adding that it "places far more confidence in the leadership of Prime Minister Maliki than his record of competence and cooperation merits."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Friday with other members of Congress, including the chairmen of the armed services, foreign affairs, and intelligence committees, as well as Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, a leading Democratic critic of the war.

In a statement after her visit, Ms. Pelosi said that she had traveled to Iraq to thank the troops and to express support for them, “as well as our hope that they will come home safely and soon.”

In meetings with the prime minister and other senior American and Iraqi officials, the statement said, “we stressed our belief that it is well past time for the Iraqis to take primary responsibility for the security of their nation.” American forces, Ms. Pelosi said, “should quickly begin to transition from a combat role to one focused on training, counterterrorism, force protection and controlling Iraq’s borders.”

Mr. Maliki’s office released a statement after the meeting saying that the prime minister had “confirmed the resolution of the Iraqi government to challenge the terrorist groups with the full power” of its military force and the political system.

The prime minister also emphasized that Iraqi forces “are ready” to assume responsibility for the country’s security.

Rebuke Of Bush's War Plan Gathers More Steam (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — Another Republican senator said Friday that he would back the symbolic push to oppose President Bush's plans to increase troop levels in Iraq, further evidence of the growing division within the GOP over the unpopular plan.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, a recently announced presidential candidate who once staunchly supported Bush's foreign policy, became the seventh Republican senator to line up behind a nonbinding rebuke of the troop proposal.

Brownback said he favored a measure sponsored by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that expresses disagreement with the president's plan and advocates a less central role for the U.S. military in stopping sectarian violence in Iraq.

Along with Warner and Brownback, three other Republicans and several Democrats have said they favor the resolution.

A more strongly worded resolution opposing the troop plan says, "It is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq."

It is sponsored by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.). Also backing it is Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine).

Administration officials have dismissed the notion that either resolution would affect decisions on Iraq, and Bush on Friday reiterated his commitment to proceed with his plan.

"I'm the decision-maker," Bush said after meeting with Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus in the Oval Office shortly after the Senate unanimously confirmed him to take command of U.S. forces in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates also criticized the congressional efforts to oppose the Bush plan.

"It's pretty clear that a resolution that, in effect, says that the general going out to take command of the arena shouldn't have the resources he thinks he needs to be successful, certainly emboldens the enemy," Gates told reporters. "It seems pretty straightforward that any indication of flagging will in the United States gives encouragement to those folks."

As the haggling intensified in Washington over the Senate's intentions, two of Capitol Hill's most vocal critics of the administration's policies in Iraq — House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) — met in Baghdad with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

"We stressed our belief that it is well past time for the Iraqis to take primary responsibility for the security of their nation," Pelosi said in a statement issued by her Washington office. "The delegation's view is that American forces should quickly begin to transition from a combat role to one focused on training, counter-terrorism, force protection and controlling Iraq's borders."

Brownback's decision to support Warner's resolution came as Democratic and Republican Senate leaders continued to negotiate over the timing of a much-anticipated debate on the plan unveiled by the president in a nationally televised speech this month.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he anticipates a compromise between the two measures.

But Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said Friday that he was working on less confrontational alternatives that he hopes to be able to offer when the debate begins on the pending resolutions, perhaps as soon as next week.

Several other GOP senators — including John McCain of Arizona, a leading champion of Bush's plan and a presidential contender — have expressed interest in resolutions that would call for specific benchmarks to measure the cooperation of the Iraqi government.

McConnell said he believed that he could build support for "something that makes it abundantly clear to the Iraqis that this is it," and that the U.S. expected them to assume a significantly larger role in cracking down on sectarian violence.

"If we're going to do a resolution at all, I think that's the one part that could conceivably be helpful," McConnell said.

Pataki Opposes More Troops Unless Iraqis Do Their Part (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0123683

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 —Former Gov. George E. Pataki of New York, a Republican who has steadfastly supported President Bush's Iraq policies, said on Friday that he would oppose Mr. Bush's plan for sending more troops to Baghdad unless Iraqi leaders took clearer steps to build a nonsectarian government.

In a speech at Georgetown University, Mr. Pataki, who is considering a run for president, said the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has failed to provide security to all its citizens and left the impression that it favors Shiites in their escalating sectarian conflict with Sunnis.

"Before the United States government puts more troops in harm's way in Baghdad, we must have confidence that the Maliki government will be an active partner" in building a unity government, Mr. Pataki said.

"If they want Americans to continue to die in defense of their government, if they want Americans to continue to pour tens of billions of dollars into their people's schools, services and security, we must first demand action on their part," he said, referring to Iraqi leaders.

"Prime Minister Maliki must show that his government will be part of the solution and not, as many have feared, part of the problem."

With his remarks, Mr. Pataki appeared to distance himself not only from the president, but also from the three men often named as the leading Republican candidates to replace him: John McCain of Arizona, one of the Senate's most vocal supporters of the troop increase, as well as former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York, and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who both have gone on record supporting it.

But Senators Sam Brownback of Kansas, who has announced a presidential run, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who is considering a run, have denounced the planned troop increase.

Mr. Pataki presented his views as a "bridge" between "factions pointing fingers," a reference, his aides said, to lawmakers in Washington who support the president's Iraq strategy and those who support withdrawal.

Mr. Pataki's son Teddy is an officer in the Marines, but he has not been sent to Iraq.

The speech, Mr. Pataki's second since leaving office last month after 12 years in Albany and his first on foreign policy, comes as he considers whether to enter what is fast becoming a crowded field of contenders for the Republican presidential nomination for 2008.

The speech reflected the political challenges that he and other potential Republican presidential candidates face in responding to President Bush's call for more troops in a war that many polls show to be increasingly unpopular.

Mr. Pataki has previously defended the president's Iraq policies, asserting that Iraq was a central front in the war on terrorism.

At a news conference in October 2003, Mr. Pataki said, "It's far better to be fighting that war against Al Qaeda terrorists with our soldiers and sailors and marines and Air Force on the streets of Baghdad than with our firefighters and police officers on the streets of Brooklyn."

On Friday, Mr. Pataki argued that it was possible for the United States to withdraw troops from Baghdad and still achieve what he described as America's top priority in Iraq: to deny Al Qaeda and other Islamic extremists the kind of safe haven they had in Afghanistan.

He said that if the Maliki government fails to undertake efforts to form a nonsectarian government, then America should "withdraw our troops from all areas where the war is essentially a civil one between Sunni and Shia or between Shia factions."

"We should withdraw to bases in Iraq, Kuwait and other parts of the Middle East that allow us to win our global strategic objective of defeating violent insurgents and denying them victory, safe havens or training and recruitment bases," he said. "No victory for Al Qaeda. No new bases from which to organize or plan new attacks against America or the West. No safe havens in Iraq or elsewhere. And no U.S. troops deployed in the middle of sectarian Shia/Sunni strife."

He also said the Maliki government should demonstrate a willingness to disarm Shiite militia groups, including the Mahdi Army. In the past, Mr. Maliki has been accused of being too reluctant to crack down on the Mahdi Army, whose leader, Moktada al-Sadr, has been an important part of his political coalition.

"If Maliki will not fight for Iraq, then we must limit our fight to the goal of defeating the global insurgents in Iraq, leaving the Iraqi government to deal with the sectarian violence of Baghdad," Mr. Pataki said.

Gates Working To Accelerate Deployment (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123684

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said yesterday that he was working to accelerate the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, suggesting that the influx of American troops is no longer contingent upon the Iraqi government fulfilling its commitments for Baghdad security operations.

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, confirmed yesterday by the Senate as the senior U.S. commander in Iraq, testified this week that he needs all of the troops -- and possibly more -- for the mission to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. "As long as he feels he needs them, they're all going to flow," Gates told reporters at his first Pentagon news conference.

"We are going to see if the timetable for the dispatch of the brigades can be accelerated," Gates said, although he added that logistical hurdles may prevent speeding up the movement for all or some of the troops.

The U.S. troop increases now underway in both Iraq and Afghanistan reflect a deliberate effort to "create an environment in which the commanders feel open to requesting what they think they need," Gates said, suggesting that in the past U.S. commanders have not felt comfortable asking for reinforcements. Still, he said, "there is no blank check," and requests for more troops will be vetted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff before being presented to him and President Bush for a decision.

In congressional testimony and statements earlier this month, Gates had suggested that the flow of additional U.S. troops to Iraq would be dependent upon the Iraqi government meeting specific pledges -- such as sending three more Iraqi army brigades to Baghdad and lifting restrictions on U.S. military operations targeting certain Baghdad districts or individuals.

"The timetable for the introduction of additional U.S. forces will provide ample opportunity early on and before many of the additional U.S. troops actually arrive in Iraq to evaluate the progress of this endeavor and whether the Iraqis are fulfilling their commitments to us," he said at a White House news conference earlier this month.

Yesterday's statements made it clear that any decision on withholding troops would be left to Petraeus, who has said he favors moving the troops to Iraq as quickly as possible.

Gates defended the man Petraeus will replace, outgoing U.S. commander Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who is under fire from some in Congress for failures of strategy in Iraq. Gates nominated Casey to become the Army's next chief of staff, with a confirmation hearing scheduled for Feb. 1. But Casey has since faced harsh criticism from some senators, including John McCain (R-Ariz.), who says he plans to vote against Casey.

"If it's clear that generals have made serious mistakes, specific mistakes . . . they should be held accountable," Gates said. "I'm not convinced that has happened in this case."

He said Casey "has responded to the changing circumstances" by reversing a plan for a substantial troop drawdown in Iraq in 2006 after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra unleashed widespread sectarian violence.

Moreover, he said the performance of Casey and other officers must be viewed "in the context of the decisions made by the civilian superiors of officers and how the battlefield they faced was shaped by those decisions. . . . I think he deserves this position."

On upcoming U.S. and Iraqi military operations to secure Baghdad, Gates said that while they could lead to increased U.S. troop casualties, another possibility is that many of the Shiite militia and other fighters "will go to ground in the hope that they can just outwait us and filter back once we're gone." To address that concern, he said the goal was for U.S. forces to help drive the violence in Baghdad down to the point where it "would be entirely manageable by the Iraqi army that would be there for a protracted period of time."

Gates declined to comment on the results of recent U.S. airstrikes to target terrorists in Somalia, saying only that U.S. forces would seek to kill or capture members of al-Qaeda and other groups that attack the United States.

Reserved Seats, And Tone, As A New Defense Chief Meets The Press (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates held his first Pentagon press conference on Friday, and it was nothing like those of his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Over his six years in office, Mr. Rumsfeld's briefings became something like a long-running Broadway variety show, as entertaining as they were familiar.

Mr. Rumsfeld invariably stood behind the lectern in the Pentagon briefing room, often on live television, gleefully sparring with reporters, challenging the premises of their questions, and usually frustrating all efforts to elicit hard information.

Mr. Gates seemed to go out of his way to do things differently. Reporters were escorted to his personal conference room on the Pentagon's third floor, which prevented the proceedings from being televised live, though television cameras still recorded it for later broadcast. Seats around the table were reserved for some news organizations, while the rest of the roughly 30 reporters and cameramen who attended were told by press aides to stand in the corner.

Mr. Gates opened the session by explaining why he was shunning the Pentagon briefing room. “I would prefer a more informal setting than the dais and the big sign behind me and so on,” he said.

The crowded conference room was an arrangement that, he acknowledged, “probably cramps some of you.”

For the next half-hour, Mr. Gates answered questions. Very often the substance of his replies was not unlike what Mr. Rumsfeld might have said. Like his predecessor, he even challenged the premise of a question or two. But his answers were generally more concise and free of scoffing, teasing or smirking.

“I have no idea,” Mr. Gates said in response to a question about the number of Iranian operatives in Iraq. If posed to Mr. Rumsfeld, such a question might have prompted a long discourse about “known knowns” and “known unknowns” and “unknown unknowns,” the subtext of which was that the press was slightly ridiculous for even asking.

Nor were there any quotes as memorable as Mr. Rumsfeld’s riposte that “stuff happens,” when asked at a 2003 briefing about looting in Baghdad.

But, by the end, Mr. Gates seemed happy with how his first formal meeting with the Pentagon press corps had gone, even while some reporters grumbled about not being able to sit down. “Maybe do this where there’s more room next time,” he said, standing up to leave.

Defense Chief Shows He's No Rumsfeld (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — If there was any question that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates would go to almost any length to demonstrate he was the anti-Rumsfeld, he dispelled it Friday.

In his first-ever Pentagon news conference, Gates' manner and method could not have been more different than those of his controversial predecessor — starting with the room.

Donald H. Rumsfeld made the Pentagon briefing room so much his own, Gates has evidently decided he has no intention of using it. Instead, Gates met the media in his private dining room, seating reporters and himself around a large conference table.

And the answers he offered could not have been more dissimilar to Rumsfeld's.

Stylistically, Gates refrained from scoffing at reporters, from restating their questions on more favorable terms and from challenging the premises of inquiries. He avoided any metaphysical lectures or expositions on the electricity supply of North Korea. Instead, he took the questions as they came, working his way through 32 of them, quickly and concisely.

Substantively, there were some sharp differences. Indeed, Gates came close to blaming Rumsfeld for many of the problems in Iraq.

The new Defense chief offered strong words of support for the nomination of Gen. George W. Casey Jr. to become the next Army chief of staff and said Casey was not to blame for the problems of Iraq. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has criticized Casey's leadership of the war and said he would vote against the general's nomination. Asked if commanders should be held accountable for Iraq, Gates seemed — almost — to throw Rumsfeld under the bus.

"I think that one has to look at this in the context of the decisions made by the civilian superiors of officers and how the battlefield they face was shaped by those decisions," Gates said.

Rumsfeld always insisted in his news conferences that his commanders were free to ask for more forces. But military planners had said privately that Rumsfeld created an atmosphere where such requests were unwelcome. On Friday, Gates took pains to demonstrate that he was listening to his military commanders. Although he would not say whether he might send more than 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, he said military commanders could ask for more.

"What we have done, I hope, is create an environment in which the commanders feel open to requesting what they think they need," Gates said.

During a Senate hearing this week, a slight strategy difference seemed to emerge between Gates and the man he recommended to become the top commander in Iraq, Gen. David H. Petraeus. Gates said on Jan. 12 that some of the additional forces on their way to Baghdad might end up not being needed. But Petraeus said Tuesday that he would not know if the strategy was working until all the forces were in place.

Gates did not completely back off Friday but stated emphatically that Petraeus would get the troops he wanted, and said the department was looking to get them to Baghdad sooner than spring. "As long as he feels he needs them," Gates said, "they're all going to flow."

Members of Congress often accused Rumsfeld of painting an overly rosy picture of the situation in Iraq. Here again, Gates pledged to be a different kind of defense secretary.

"My hope is to establish a record with the Hill going forward, regardless of what may have been the case in the past, where we have a reputation for candor and for saying — calling things exactly as they are, for good or for bad," Gates said.

But like Rumsfeld, Gates could not avoid some trouble at his news conference. Gates took a swipe at the pending congressional resolutions opposing the troop increase, saying the movement "certainly emboldens the enemy and our adversaries."

That provoked Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who frequently issued statements after Rumsfeld news conferences, to say that Gates' comment was "a desperate attempt by the administration to support a failed policy."

Just like old times.

Lethal-Force Order Justified, Bush Says (WP)

By Dafna Linzer, Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

President Bush yesterday defended a Pentagon program to kill or capture Iranian operatives inside Iraq, saying that U.S. troops would use all necessary measures to protect themselves and Iraqi civilians from harm.

"It makes sense that if somebody's trying to harm our troops, or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, that we will stop them," Bush said in response to a question about the program, the details of which were first reported in yesterday's Washington Post.

But Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said U.S. troops would not cross Iraq's border with Iran under the program, and the president said he is still committed to resolving the dispute over Iran's nuclear program diplomatically.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said that U.S. troops must defend themselves in Iraq but that the president needs congressional approval for any program that could "escalate this conflict" with Iran. Reid said Bush should be engaged in direct diplomacy with Iran and other countries in the region to avoid a widening conflict, rather than "sending battle carrier groups" to sit off the Iranian coast.

Last fall, Bush gave the military secret authorization to kill or capture members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, including members of a Guard unit known as the Quds Force, and any Iranian intelligence operatives suspected of arming or supporting Shiite militias in Iraq.

The policy is based on the theory that Tehran will back down from its nuclear ambitions if the United States hits it hard in Iraq and elsewhere, creating a sense of vulnerability among Iranian leaders. But the policy has attracted some influential skeptics inside the Bush administration and the intelligence community who are concerned that Iran could respond with escalation. The director of the CIA, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, counseled the president to consider that Iran could undertake its own program to kill or kidnap U.S. personnel in Iraq or neighboring Afghanistan.

Bush said it is "not accurate" he wants to widen a confrontation with Iran. "We're going to continue to protect ourselves in Iraq and at the same time work to solve their problems with Iran diplomatically, and I believe we can succeed. The choice is the Iranian government's choice," he said at a news conference.

The president said his administration is already making good progress on the diplomatic front, citing a U.N. Security Council resolution that calls on Iran to halt much of its nuclear program and return to negotiations. Iran has rejected that.

Yesterday, the director of the U.N. inspection agency that is monitoring Iran's nuclear program said Tehran plans to significantly expand its nuclear program in the coming months to begin producing large quantities of uranium. Iranian officials say they intend to produce only low-enriched uranium suitable for fueling a nuclear energy program. But the same technology can also produce bomb-grade uranium. Bush said yesterday that the Iranian government plans to build nuclear weapons, though his administration has never offered proof.

In Tehran, the chairman of the parliament's National Security and Foreign Policy Commission, Alaeddin Boroujerdi, said Bush's policy amounts to "terrorist" action that violates international law.

"Such a measure illustrates the failure of the U.S.'s new strategy in Iraq, because it has had no effect in quelling unrests and restoring calm and order and has instead roused intensified reactions in Iraq," Boroujerdi told the Iranian Fars News Agency.

At a Pentagon news conference yesterday, Gates told reporters that U.S. troops were not "simply going to stand by and let people bring sophisticated IEDs into the country that can disable an Abrams tank and give them a free pass." Gates was referring to roadside bombs, or "improvised explosive devices," that U.S. officials have said are built with components brought into Iraq from Iran.

"But as we've said before, we think we can handle this inside the borders of Iraq, he said.

Gates did not discuss the program's rules of engagement but said that U.S. military targeting of Iranians or any foreign fighters is limited to those who pose a threat to U.S. troops, adding that such practice is not new. "Our forces are authorized to go after those who are trying to kill them," he said. "We are trying to uproot these networks that are planting IEDs that are causing 70 percent of our casualties," he said, adding that "if you are in Iraq and are trying to kill our troops, then you should consider yourself a target."

Gates said he thought yesterday's article in The Post contained "a number of inaccuracies," but he declined to offer examples.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, said yesterday on ABC's "Good Morning America" that U.S. troops had "found some members of the Quds Force operating within Iraq," and, "We have found weapons within Iraq. . . . We found mortars. We have found detonation wire. So, it's clear . . . either through training or providing weapons systems, they are involved here in Iraq."

Two weeks ago, U.S. forces detained five Iranians during a raid on an Iranian government office in Kurdish northern Iraq. Officials said the office was linked to the Revolutionary Guard.

But Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, a Kurd, contended that the Iranians were working in an Iraq-government-approved liaison office and that the office was set up to become a diplomatic consulate. U.S. officials said they planned to release a report in the coming days detailing the activities of the detained Iranians and their ties to the violence in Iraq.

Bush said yesterday that the United States had no quarrel with the Iranian people, just with the leaders who "end up isolating their people and ends up denying the Iranian people their true place in the world."

In New York yesterday, the U.N. General Assembly adopted a resolution condemning the Iranian government's official denial of the Holocaust and condemning a conference in Tehran last month that questioned whether Nazis murdered millions of Jews. The resolution was drafted by the Bush administration and co-sponsored by more than 100 U.N. members.

Bush Defends Moving Against Iranians Who Help Shiites Attack U.S.-Led Forces In Iraq (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti, David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — President Bush and his senior aides on Friday justified American actions against Iranian operatives inside Iraq as necessary to protect American troops and Iraqis, and said they would continue as long as Tehran kept up what they called its support for Shiites involved in sectarian attacks.

“If somebody is trying to harm our troops and stop them from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, we will stop them,” President Bush told reporters at the White House.

President Bush decided several months ago to allow American troops to make targets of select Iranian operatives inside Iraq whom military officials have accused of helping militants build sophisticated and powerful roadside bombs. He and other officials faced repeated questioning about the policy, which was disclosed in recent weeks, after The Washington Post published articles on Friday exploring Iran’s regional influence and the administration’s approaches to containing it.

Several administration officials, including Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, said that President Bush had given the military no new authorities to carry out the offensive, and that the Pentagon had long had permission to capture or kill foreign operatives thought to be aiding attacks against American troops.

Officials said there was no blanket authority to take action against Iranian agents, only Iranian agents thought to be directly involved in planning or carrying out attacks against American and allied forces. That is a different standard than applied to foreign fighters of Al Qaeda in Iraq, they said.

“If you are on the wire diagram as an Al Qaeda operative, you can be targeted just for reading the newspaper in your living room. These guys are not in that position,” said one senior Defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The official said there was debate within the administration about whether to become even more aggressive toward Iranians in Iraq. Already, the arrests of Iranians have caused tensions between American and Iraqi officials, as well as heightening the strains between Tehran and Washington. Meanwhile, some lawmakers have expressed concerns that the administration might even strike militarily into Iranian territory just as Congress considers resolutions denouncing Mr. Bush’s war strategy for Iraq.

“You have to balance it,” this official said. “While you want to take care of the situation, you don’t want to cause an international incident where you provoke Iran.”

The White House has not issued a presidential finding authorizing covert action against Iranians inside of Iraq or authorized any military actions inside Iran, officials said.

President Bush kicked off a campaign of escalated rhetoric against Iran during a televised address to the nation on Jan. 10. For months, officials from across the Bush administration have accused Iran of supplying Shiite militias with high-tech explosives and training them to carry out attacks with roadside bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0123688

Administration officials have thus far provided little detailed public evidence to support these claims. Officials said that Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador in Baghdad, is planning a news conference for Wednesday during which he will present a dossier of Iran's efforts to fuel sectarian violence in Iraq.

Part of Mr. Khalilzad's presentation, officials said, will be to show evidence found during a December raid on a compound of the Iranian-backed Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri.

The officials said that among the evidence that would be presented were photographs, documents and a color-coded wall map that were seized in the raid detailing which Sunni neighborhoods in Baghdad would be targets for attack.

Some leading Democrats, including the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Joseph R. Biden Jr., and the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, John D. Rockefeller IV, have criticized the Bush administration for building a case against Iran when American intelligence agencies still have a murky understanding of Iran's intentions in the Middle East.

Last week, Mr. Rockefeller said that the White House campaign was unnervingly similar to Bush administration rhetoric in the months before the Iraq war.

Some Middle East specialists point out that an effort to move against Iranian agents could backfire and prompt Iran to strike back against America troops.

"It's going to be a bumpy road inside Iraq because it puts U.S. forces at risk and because Ahmadinejad will be more confrontational," said Patrick Clawson, an Iran expert at the Washington Institute for Near East policy, referring to Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Military commanders in Baghdad say they have documented a rise in the number of sophisticated roadside bombs using "shaped charges" — a type of weapon that officials believe are imported from Iran. Military statistics show that the number of coalition troops killed by these weapons jumped dramatically during the last four months of 2006.

It was late last year, officials in Washington said, that Mr. Bush signed off on a more aggressive military offensive inside Iraq to counter Iranian influence. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice confirmed the policy change in an interview on Jan. 12. An article in The Washington Post on Friday reported new details about how the policy was being carried out, including some that the administration said were inaccurate, without elaborating.

One person briefed on the Bush administration strategy said officials in Washington believed that by giving assistance to radical Shiite militants in organizations like the Mahdi Army, Iran was hoping to split off hard-line elements within these organizations and make them more beholden to Tehran.

By moving against Iranians inside Iraq, the Bush administration hopes it can persuade them to stop their efforts to create rifts among Shiites and to provide aid in attacks against American troops, the person said, requesting anonymity because the briefing he had received was not intended to be made public.

"The Iranian government needs to know that whether it's the Quds Force or any other kind of Iranian organization, we are not going to tolerate American soldiers being targeted in that fashion," said R. Nicholas Burns, a top State Department official. He was referring to a section of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards Corps.

Bush Defends New Policy On Iranians In Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush staunchly defended a tough new administration policy on Iran that is drawing criticism at home and causing anxiety abroad, arguing Friday that it was only sensible for U.S. troops to move aggressively against Iranians who endangered them in Iraq.

Bush, appearing with military advisors at the White House, said the policy was not meant to spread U.S. wars in Iraq and Afghanistan into Iran, but asserted that U.S. troops had the right to seek out agents from Tehran, which he has accused of supporting Iraqi militants.

"It just make sense that if somebody is trying to harm our troops or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent civilians in Iraq, that we will stop them," Bush said.

The administration announced two weeks ago, as part of its new strategy on Iraq, that it would move more forcefully against Iranian and Syrian agents in Iraq. The White House also then moved Navy warships and fighter jets into the Persian Gulf in a display of determination to maintain its influence in the region.

The new push has been welcomed by some Sunni Arab countries that are worried about the rising influence of predominantly Shiite Iran, as well as by members of U.S. Congress from both parties who are nervous about the prospect that Tehran may acquire a nuclear weapon and possibly use it to threaten Israel.

But the aggressive approach has been unsettling to Shiite Arabs and Kurdish leaders in Iraq, as well as to others in the United States and Europe, who fear that the confrontational words and moves could escalate into military confrontation at a time when the Middle East is already torn by sectarian strife.

The administration's tougher stance has raised questions on how far the United States plans to go to confront or control the estimated thousands of Iranians in Iraq, who include not only military and intelligence agents but also humanitarian workers, pilgrims and businesspeople.

Bush said suggestions that the administration wanted to widen its military campaign into Iran were "just not accurate." He added that he would work to settle differences with Iran diplomatically. "And I believe we can succeed," he said.

The president was joined in his warning to Tehran by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and other administration officials, who were asked about a report that U.S. forces were given special orders to kill or capture Iranians found in Iraq. Administration officials said that U.S. forces had authority to do whatever was necessary to defend themselves in Iraq, but did not confirm the Washington Post report about special orders.

Gates said it was his "impression" that U.S. troops always had the authority to go after Iranian agents who were helping construct bombs in Iraq. He said U.S. forces would go after anyone trying to kill them by any means, including distributing parts to build the roadside bombs known as improvised explosive devices.

"We are trying to uproot these networks that are planting IEDs that are causing 70% of our casualties," he said. "And if you're in Iraq and trying to kill our troops, then you should consider yourself a target."

Gates reiterated that he believed Iranian military involvement could be countered in Iraq, without crossing the border. He agreed that Iran could be dealt with diplomatically, but said Americans were making clear that they would take the necessary steps to preserve "stability" in the Persian Gulf.

Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the White House National Security Council, also discussed the administration stance on Iran.

"If our troops get actionable intelligence that agents are going to cause our troops or Iraqi citizens harm, they're going to take whatever force protections that are necessary," he said.

Bush first outlined his harsher stance toward Iran on Jan. 10 as he unveiled a new strategy to address the deteriorating situation in Iraq. The latest administration policy has caused anxiety among Iraqi Kurdish and Shiite Arab leaders, who want to form closer ties with their larger and more industrialized neighbor, and fear they would be the losers in any conflict between the United States and Iran.

Iraqi political leaders say that the U.S. policy on Iran has strengthened the United States' ties to Sunni Arab countries — including Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and the smaller Gulf states — but has caused strains between those countries and Iraq.

Many of its Sunni Muslim neighbors consider Iraq a country controlled by the Shiite Muslim sect and have formed only limited diplomatic relations with Baghdad nearly four years after the U.S.-led invasion, Iraqi officials have complained.

The new Bush administration policy also has drawn criticism from U.S. lawmakers, including Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.), chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

A former top aide for Middle East policy in the Clinton White House has told Congress that the policy on Iran stands to fail, as has Bush's approach toward Iraq, and ignite wider conflict in the region.

Robert Malley, director for the Middle East program at the Brussels-based International Crisis Group, said that while the administration has refused direct talks with Iran and Syria, it has combined military threats toward Tehran with an attempt to build an anti-Iranian coalition of Sunni Arab governments.

"This approach runs the risk of promoting internecine conflict and, possibly, all-out and unwinnable civil wars in Lebanon and Palestine — yet another series of catastrophes in the making," Malley told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Tuesday.

Some observers said the new policy reflected not only a U.S. desire to reassert itself at a moment of growing Iranian influence in the region, but also represented an attempt to solicit support at home for the administration's approach at a time when the White House is trying to shore up its sagging popularity.

Toby Dodge of the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies said the confrontational U.S. tone toward Iran was likely to appeal to many in Congress.

"This is a way to explain to the U.S. public that Iran is partly to blame for Iraq's problems," he said. "It's a way to rally public opinion and forge some kind of consensus."

But Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, said that those who see a political motive in the new policy "just don't know what they're talking about."

Bush Denies Preparing Attack Against Iran (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

George W. Bush on Friday sought to deny widespread rumours his administration was preparing some kind of military action against Iran. Mr Bush confirmed a report in Friday's Washington Post that he had authorised US troops to shoot and kill Iranian operatives in Iraq, but denied this was a prelude to stronger action.

"We believe we can solve our problems with Iran diplomatically," said the US president. "It makes sense that if somebody is trying to harm our troops, or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, that we will stop them."

But the US president's relatively emollient comments are unlikely to quell speculation about the reasons behind the recent escalation of White House rhetoric towards Iran. In his prime time address on the "new way forward in Iraq" two weeks ago, Mr Bush pledged to "interrupt the flow of support [for extremists in Iraq] from Iran and Syria...We will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

In his State of the Union address to the joint houses of Congress on Tuesday, he lumped Iran with al-Qaeda. "It has also become clear that we face an escalating danger from Shia extremists who...take direction from the regime in Iran. The Shia and Sunni extremists are different faces of the same totalitarian threat."

Last week, Mr Bush ordered a second US aircraft carrier to the Gulf and the deployment of more Patriot missiles in US military bases there. Richard Haass, former head of policy planning at the State Department in the first Bush administration, said the US president was leaving both the diplomatic and military option open.

"You could interpret Bush's recent actions towards Iran in two ways – either he is increasing pressure on the regime in order to soften it up for talks over its uranium enrichment plans, or this is classic gunboat diplomacy in which the US is preparing for some kind of punitive action," said Mr Haass. "My guess is that Mr Bush's actions leave room for either scenario and the Bush administration remains divided over which to pursue."

Both Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, and Bob Gates, secretary of defence, are thought to be pushing the White House to open talks with Iranian, having softened it up with the recent application of United Nations-approved economic sanctions on Iran and the beefing up of US naval forces off the Iranian coast.

"The Bush administration believes that Iran sees the US as a kind of paper tiger, and this is Washington's answer to that," said Afshin Molavi, at the New America Foundation in Washington. "The danger to this strategy is that it carries the risk of accidentally leading into some kind of military confrontation."

However, others in the Bush administration, notably Dick Cheney, who last year warned Iran that it would face "meaningful consequences" if it continued to foment violence in Iraq, are thought to be arguing for the military option.

This interpretation is put forward by leading Democratic lawmakers on Capitol Hill, who have sought – but not received – assurances that the Bush administration has no plans to extend its military operations in Iraq across the border to Iran.

Meanwhile, in a short statement to commemorate International Holocaust Day on Friday, Iran was the only country Mr Bush cited by name: "Remembering the victims, heroes, and lessons of the Holocaust is particularly important today as Holocaust denial continues, urged on by the Iranian regime, which perversely seeks to call into question the historical fact of the Nazis' campaign of mass murder," he said.

Daffy Does Doom (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

Dick Durbin went to the floor of the Senate on Thursday night to denounce the vice president as "delusional."

It was shocking, and Senator Durbin should be ashamed of himself.

Delusional is far too mild a word to describe Dick Cheney. Delusional doesn't begin to capture the profound, transcendental one-flew-over daftness of the man.

Has anyone in the history of the United States ever been so singularly wrong and misguided about such phenomenally important events and continued to insist he's right in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary?

It requires an exquisite kind of lunacy to spend hundreds of billions destroying America's reputation in the world, exhausting the U.S. military, failing to catch Osama, enhancing Iran's power in the Middle East and sending American kids to train and arm Iraqi forces so they can work against American interests.

Only someone with an inspired alienation from reality could, under the guise of exorcising the trauma of Vietnam, replicate the trauma of Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0123691

You must have a real talent for derangement to stay wrong every step of the way, to remain in complete denial about Iraq's civil war, to have a total misunderstanding of Arab culture, to be completely oblivious to the American mood and to be absolutely blind to how democracy works.

In a democracy, when you run a campaign that panders to homophobia by attacking gay marriage and then your lesbian daughter writes a book about politics and decides to have a baby with her partner, you cannot tell Wolf Blitzer he's "out of line" when he gingerly raises the hypocrisy of your position.

Mr. Cheney acts more like a member of the James gang than the Jefferson gang. Asked by Wolf what would happen if the Senate passed a resolution critical of The Surge, Scary Cheney rumbled, "It won't stop us."

Such an exercise in democracy, he noted, would be "detrimental from the standpoint of the troops."

Americans learned an important lesson from Vietnam about supporting the troops even when they did not support the war. From media organizations to Hollywood celebrities and lawmakers on both sides, everyone backs our troops.

It is W. and Vice who learned no lessons from Vietnam, probably because they worked so hard to avoid going. They rush into a war halfway around the world for no reason and with no foresight about the culture or the inevitable insurgency, and then assert that any criticism of their fumbling management of Iraq and Afghanistan is tantamount to criticizing the troops. Quel demagoguery.

"Bottom line," Vice told Wolf, "is that we've had enormous successes, and we will continue to have enormous successes." The biggest threat, he said, is that Americans may not "have the stomach for the fight."

He should stop casting aspersions on the American stomach. We've had the stomach for more than 3,000 American deaths in a war sold as a cakewalk.

If W. were not so obsessed with being seen as tough, Mr. Cheney could not influence him with such tripe.

They are perpetually guided by the wrong part of the body. They are consumed by the fear of looking as if they don't have guts, when they should be compelled by the desire to look as if they have brains.

After offering Congress an olive branch in the State of the Union, the president resumed mindless swaggering. Asked yesterday why he was ratcheting up despite the resolutions, W. replied, "In that I'm the decision maker, I had to come up with a way forward that precluded disaster." (Or preordained it.)

The reality of Iraq, as The Times's brilliant John Burns described it to Charlie Rose this week, is that a messy endgame could be far worse than Vietnam, leading to "a civil war on a scale with bloodshed that will absolutely dwarf what we're seeing now," and a "wider conflagration, with all kinds of implications for the world's flow of oil, for the state of Israel. What happens to King Abdullah in Jordan if there's complete chaos in the region?"

Mr. Cheney has turned his perversity into foreign policy.

He assumes that the more people think he's crazy, the saner he must be. In Dr. No's nutty world-view, anti-Americanism is a compliment. The proof that America is right is that everyone thinks it isn't.

He sees himself as a prophet in the wilderness because he thinks anyone in the wilderness must be a prophet.

To borrow one of his many dismissive words, it's hogwash.

Senate OKs Petraeus To Lead Troops In Iraq (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

The Senate yesterday voted unanimously to confirm the nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to command U.S. troops in Iraq at a time when President Bush is building up American forces there.

Gen. Petraeus' 81-0 approval was in contrast to the widespread public and congressional opposition to Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Congress is moving toward votes in coming weeks on nonbinding resolutions opposing the troop buildup.

In testimony to Congress this week, Gen. Petraeus said the situation in Iraq is "dire" but said he believed Mr. Bush's strategy would work -- assuming the Iraqi government provided additional troops and helped crack down on militias.

Gen. Petraeus, who will replace Army Gen. George W. Casey. is just one of the new faces Mr. Bush is bringing to his team of top military and diplomatic officials in Iraq and the Middle East. He has already replaced Donald H. Rumsfeld with Robert M. Gates as defense secretary, and is changing the top military commander in the Middle East and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Gen. Petraeus, 54, has served two previous yearlong tours in Iraq as commander of the 101st Airborne Division during the invasion in March 2003 and as commander of the training program for the Iraqi army in 2004-05.

Following the Nov. 7 elections, Mr. Bush announced he would change his strategy in Iraq, including deployments of the additional troops.

DOJ_NMG_0123692

"We'll now have our very best general in charge of the operations in Iraq," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. "If it can't be done under Gen. Petraeus, then it cannot be done at all. We ought to give him a chance to succeed."

Tuesday, the Senate Armed Services Committee plans to hear from Navy Adm. William Fallon, Mr. Bush's pick to replace Gen. John Abizaid as the top commander in the Middle East. Gen. Casey, nominated to be the next Army chief of staff, is expected to testify on Feb. 1.

U.S. Plan For Iraqi Force Surprises Senator (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new top U.S. commander in Iraq, told Congress that he might supplement efforts to secure Baghdad using the Iraqi Facilities Protection Service, a 150,000-man force that guards Iraqi government agencies. But that service is widely considered unreliable, and elements were described in July by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as "more dangerous than the militias," according to Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.).

"The prime minister said he wanted to get rid of the FPS as fast as possible," Reed said this week, recalling his meeting with Maliki in Baghdad last summer. There are "bad elements" in FPS units that "are carrying out murders and kidnappings . . . [and] attacking the infrastructure that they are supposedly protecting," Reed said in his trip report about what Maliki had told him. "Because of the FPS," Reed wrote, Maliki said that "some governmental ministries' guards are more dangerous than the militias."

The FPS was formed in 2003 by order of L. Paul Bremer, then administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority, to protect the 27 Iraqi ministries and their facilities throughout Iraq. Each minister, who generally represents one of Iraq's political parties, has his or her own FPS unit, whose armed members wear military uniforms.

The Iraq Study Group described FPS members as having "questionable loyalties and capabilities." It quoted an unnamed senior U.S. official as saying that they are "incompetent, dysfunctional and subversive," with some serving the manpower needs of sectarian party militias and death squads.

Reed said in an interview that, with security being the main concern of President Bush in pressing for additional U.S. troops in Baghdad, he was "surprised" that Petraeus would describe FPS units, also known as ministerial security forces, as assisting in the protection of the city. The Senate confirmed Petraeus yesterday as the new top U.S. commander in Iraq.

"There are tens of thousands of contract security forces and ministerial security forces that do, in fact, guard facilities and secure institutions, and so forth," Petraeus said in testimony earlier this week, "that our forces -- coalition or Iraqi forces -- would otherwise have to guard and secure."

When Reed responded that he was "shocked" that the FPS was mentioned in those terms -- because Maliki had told him "that some of these ministerial forces are worse than the insurgents" -- Petraeus replied: "Some, indeed." Later, in answer to a question, the Army general acknowledged that "some of those ministerial forces are part of the problem instead of part of the solution."

Maliki was not the only official who spoke to Reed in July regarding concerns about the FPS. Army Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq, described the FPS members, along with about 8,700 personal security guards provided to Iraqi political figures, as among "the proliferation of armed groups . . . [presenting] a serious challenge to stability." Dempsey said the Iraqi Defense Ministry paid the salaries of the personal security details "but has no control over them." Each of the 275 members of Iraq's Council of Representatives, as its national assembly is called, is entitled to 20 guards, many of whom are chosen from within their families.

Dempsey was particularly critical of the FPS, saying: "They have a reputation for gross misconduct." He specified as "particularly notorious" the FPS units associated with the ministries of transportation and health, both under the control of associates of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The FPS units employed by those ministries are "a source of funding and jobs for the Mahdi Army," Sadr's militia, according to the Iraq Study Group report.

Dempsey told Reed last summer that the FPS and the personal security details "should be reformed" and "outfitted with different uniforms to distinguish them from the police and clearly identify them." More recently, Dempsey told reporters that the FPS should be brought under the control of Iraq's Interior Ministry this year.

In Basra, Reed was told by Maj. Gen. John Cooper, commander of the British troops in that area, that the FPS was "a major problem." In Fallujah, members of the Marine Expeditionary Force said that when they retook the hospital in Ramadi, local leaders insisted "that the FPS be barred from returning because of their corruption and unreliability."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), upon returning from a brief trip to Iraq this month, announced that she will introduce legislation that would require -- as a condition of continued funding -- certification that the FPS and the private security contractors for the Iraqis are free of sectarian and militia influence.

"Instead of cutting funding to American troops, cut the funding to the Iraqi forces and to the security forces . . . that we pay for to protect the members of this government," Clinton said last week on the PBS's "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer." "We have to do something to get their attention in order to force them to deal with the political and the economic and the diplomatic pieces of the puzzle that confront us," she added.

Military Confirms 4 Soldiers Were Abducted During Attack In Karbala (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — Four American soldiers were abducted during a sophisticated sneak attack last week in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, the U.S. military confirmed Friday. It said three were shot to death and a fourth was mortally wounded with a gunshot to the head when they were found in a neighboring province, far from the compound where they were captured.

Two of the four were handcuffed together in the back seat of an SUV near the southern Iraqi town of Mahawil. A third dead soldier was on the ground nearby. The fourth soldier died on the way to the hospital, the military said in a statement issued late Friday that confirmed details reported by The Associated Press earlier.

On Jan. 20, the day of the raid on a security meeting in Karbala, the military said five soldiers were killed repelling the attack.

The brazen assault, 50 miles south of Baghdad, was conducted by nine to 12 militants posing as an American security team, according to two senior U.S. military officials as well as Iraqi officials. They traveled in black GMC Suburban vehicles — the type used by U.S. government convoys — had American weapons, wore new U.S. military combat fatigues, and spoke English, according to Iraqi and U.S. military officials.

None of the American or Iraqi officials would allow use of their names because of the sensitive nature of the information.

The confirmation has emerged after nearly a week of inquiries. The U.S. military in Baghdad initially did not respond to repeated requests for comment on reports that began emerging from Iraqi government and military officials on the abduction and a major breakdown in security at Karbala site.

Within hours of the AP report that four of the five dead soldiers had been abducted and found dead or dying about 25 miles to the east of Karbala, the military issued a long account of what took place.

It said, "Two soldiers were found handcuffed together in the back of one of the SUVs. Both had suffered gunshot wounds and were dead. A third soldier was found shot and dead on the ground. Nearby, the fourth soldier was still alive, despite a gunshot wound to the head."

The mortally wounded soldier was rushed to the hospital by Iraqi police but died on the way, the military said.

The military also said Iraqi police had found "five SUVs, U.S. Army-type combat uniforms, boots, radios and a non-U.S. made rifle" near Mahawil, in neighboring Babil province.

"The precision of the attack, the equipment used and the possible use of explosives to destroy the military vehicles in the compound suggests that the attack was well rehearsed prior to execution," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, spokesman for Multi-National Division-Baghdad.

"The attackers went straight to where Americans were located in the provincial government facility, bypassing the Iraqi police in the compound," said Bleichwehl. "We are looking at all the evidence to determine who or what was responsible for the breakdown in security at the compound and the perpetration of the assault."

The Karbala raid, as explained by the Iraqi and American officials, began after nightfall at about 6 p.m. on Jan. 20, while American military officers were meeting with their Iraqi counterparts on the main floor of the Provisional Joint Coordination Center in Karbala.

Iraqi officials said the approaching convoy of black GMC Suburbans was waved through an Iraqi checkpoint at the edge of Karbala. The Iraqi soldiers believed it to be American because of the type of vehicles, the distinctive camouflage American uniforms and the fact that they spoke English. One Iraqi official said the leader of the assault team was blond, but no other official confirmed that.

A top Iraqi security official for Karbala province told the AP that the Iraqi guards at the checkpoint radioed ahead to the compound to alert their compatriots that the convoy was on its way.

Iraqi officials said the attackers' convoy divided upon arrival, with some vehicles parking at the back of the main building where the meeting was taking place, others parked in front.

DOJ_NMG_0123694

The attackers threw a grenade and opened fire with automatic rifles as they grabbed two soldiers inside the compound. Then the guerrilla assault team jumped on top of an armored U.S. Humvee and captured two more soldiers, the U.S. military officials said.

One U.S. soldier was killed in the melee at the compound, and three were wounded.

The attackers captured four soldiers and fled with them and the computer east toward Mahawil, the U.S. military officials said.

The Iraqi officials said the four were captured alive and shot just before the vehicles were abandoned.

Police who became suspicious when the convoy of attackers and their American captives did not stop at a roadblock chased the vehicles and found the bodies, the gear and the abandoned SUVs.

Three days afterward, the U.S. military in Baghdad announced the arrest of four suspects in the attack and said they had been detained on a tip from a Karbala resident. No further information was released about the suspects.

The Defense Department has released the names of troops killed last Saturday but clearly identified only one as being killed because of the sneak attack.

Capt. Brian S. Freeman, 31, of Temecula, Calif., "died of wounds suffered when his meeting area came under attack by mortar and small arms fire." Freeman was assigned to the 412th Civil Affairs Battalion, Whitehall, Ohio.

The only other troops killed that day in that region of Iraq were four Army soldiers said to have been "ambushed while conducting dismounted operations" in Karbala.

The four were identified as 1st Lt. Jacob N. Fritz, 25, of Verdon, Neb.; Spc. Johnathan B. Chism, 22, of Gonzales, La.; Pfc. Shawn P. Falter, 25, of Cortland, N.Y., and Pvt. Johnathon M. Millican, 20, of Trafford, Ala. All were with the 2nd Battalion, 377th Parachute Field Artillery Regiment, 4th Brigade Combat Team, 25th Infantry Division, of Fort Richardson, Alaska.

Military Provides Details Of Slain Soldiers' Abduction (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — Four of the five U.S. soldiers killed in a sophisticated attack in southern Iraq last week were shot after they were captured, handcuffed and driven miles away by gunmen who appeared to have detailed information about their target, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Friday.

"The attackers went straight to where the Americans were located in the provincial government facility, bypassing the Iraqi police in the compound," Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Baghdad, said in a statement. "We are looking at all the evidence to determine who or what was responsible for the breakdown in security at the compound and the perpetration of the assault."

The U.S. military said last week that five soldiers in Karbala died fending off the Jan. 20 attack on a provincial security building, but details of what happened were not released.

However, hours after an Associated Press report cited unnamed U.S. and Iraqi sources in recounting the attack and killings, the military Friday issued a detailed statement on the incident that said the four soldiers were found dead or dying in a neighboring province south of Baghdad.

The account of the attack provided by the military suggests both a breakdown of security in the relatively safe southern province as well as increased skill on the part of armed groups.

"The precision of the attack, the equipment used and the possible use of explosives to destroy the military vehicles in the compound suggests that the attack was well rehearsed prior to execution," Bleichwehl said.

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers were at a provincial security headquarters discussing safety for pilgrims participating in an annual religious ceremony when the gunmen — dressed in U.S. Army-style combat uniforms and driving at least five sport utility vehicles — made their way past checkpoints and stormed the building about 5 p.m.

"The armed militants wore American-looking uniforms and carried U.S.-type weapons convincing Iraqi checkpoints to allow their passage," the statement said.

Once they were inside the compound, fighting broke out between the gunmen, estimated at no more than a dozen, and U.S. soldiers. Small-arms fire erupted and grenades exploded. One soldier was killed and three were wounded by a hand grenade thrown into the main office, which includes the headquarters of the provincial police chief.

"The Iraqis in the meeting were not harmed or even touched," an Iraqi military official said.

Explosions damaged several U.S. Humvees, disabling the vehicles and forcing the soldiers to take cover. The attackers pulled back, the statement said, taking four U.S. soldiers with them.

DOJ_NMG_0123695

According to U.S. and Iraqi officials, not only did the gunmen manage to enter the building, they took the captured soldiers from Karbala dozens of miles to Babil province, confidently driving past at least one checkpoint.

"The vehicles did not stop at checkpoints, they drove right through them," said an Iraqi military officer, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The military said suspicious Iraqi police officers pursued them. Iraqi security officials said American and local forces surrounded the area and established a curfew.

Residents heard gunfire and saw flares light up the sky as Iraqi forces, including members of Hillah's Scorpion Brigades, searched the area.

The Iraqi police eventually found the captured U.S. soldiers, dead or dying, as well as five abandoned SUVs, U.S. Army uniforms, boots, radios and sophisticated machine guns near the Sunni towns of Mahawil and Albu Alwan in northern Babil province.

"Two soldiers were found handcuffed together in the back of one of the SUVs," the U.S. military statement said. "Both had suffered gunshot wounds and were dead. A third soldier was found shot and dead on the ground. Nearby, the fourth soldier was still alive, despite a gunshot wound to the head."

The soldier died as Iraqi police took him to a nearby hospital.

Karbala Gov. Aqil Khazali, saying he had been briefed by a U.S. official, said the intense search may have pressed the insurgents to execute the captured soldiers.

"They were killed by the criminals near Hillah in Babil province after being encircled and surrounded by the American and Iraqi forces," Khazali said.

Suicide Bomb Erases A Fading Vestige Of Joy In Baghdad (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 26 — There used to be two great joys on Fridays for Iraqis in Baghdad: browsing the ancient bookshops, and exploring the Ghazil animal market, home to an extraordinary array of creatures.

One by one, though, the storied booksellers on Mutanabi Street have seen business fade away, the customers fearful of crowded places.

The animal market, too, has suffered, having been reduced to a shell of its lively former self. When a bomb exploded there on Friday, killing 15 people and wounding 50, it was the third such attack since June.

In the chaos after the blast, snakes slithered through bloody streets where animal carcasses were jumbled with human remains. Exotic birds flew off as rescue workers tried to aid the wounded.

“We were standing in the middle of the market, looking at the birds, and suddenly there was a massive explosion,” said a man who gave his name as Qusay, and who liked to scout for rare pigeons to breed. Both his legs were broken by the explosion. He said he was taken to the hospital, where he found doctors with no supplies trying to treat ghastly wounds.

His family took him home, he said in a telephone interview, because they thought they could treat him better themselves.

The attack was about more than taking lives, residents said. It was about taking life from the living.

Remarkably, the market was still frequented by Sunnis and Shiites, even after months of sectarian clashes. But fewer and fewer people have been showing up since the June bombing. Before that first attack, merchants and regular customers said, the market had carried on mostly as it had for centuries, despite the war, poverty and the general lawlessness on the streets.

The animal dealers would arrive early in the day and set up stalls along Jamhuriya Street.

The Bedouin would come in from the desert with scorpions and snakes and spiders, selling the venom for medicines. Merchants would bring in exotic animals, monkeys, foxes and even wolves, simply to attract a crowd so they could sell their more mundane animals, like chicken, sheep, dogs and goldfish.

The sellers would do just about anything to get attention.

Small birds were often painted bright colors to attract children, and fish were put in ornate glass jars to show off their brilliant colors. Men gathered in alleys to watch dog and cock fights. Tea and snacks were sold by wandering merchants.

Birds were a big draw, with rare pigeons being particularly popular.

One vendor, an Egyptian, according to witnesses, once put a chicken on a metal box and began rhythmically clapping. The chicken hopped from one foot to another, and the Egyptian claimed it was the world’s only dancing chicken.

But the crowd discovered a hot stone under the metal. Iraq has long been a rough place and the customers, who did not appreciate the trick, beat the man badly.

On Fridays, the day of rest, large crowds went to look at the animals before going to the mosque.

DOJ_NMG_0123696

Nearly everyone here can remember a morning spent in this way.

"I used to breed birds, it's a hobby of mine and I used to buy and sell pigeons," Dorid Abu Assad said in a telephone interview. "Every Friday we would go to the market to try and find some rare kinds of pigeons. It was fun to go there and be with all the people."

But he stopped going just before the attack in June, fearing a bombing. In that attack, 4 people were killed and 50 wounded in twin bombings. Then last month, militants launched a mortar into the market, killing 3 and wounding 28.

The animal sellers tried to go on, but by this Friday, residents said, the market was badly diminished. Most of the more exotic animals could no longer be found, and the sellers who came were mainly just trying to scrape by marketing chickens, sheep and small birds.

The bomber disguised himself as just another bird merchant, selling pigeons, witnesses said. As the crowd leaned in for a better look at his pigeon box, he walked away and set off the bomb.

Although it is impossible to know who exactly was responsible, the bombing fits a pattern of attacks by Sunni extremists that have picked up in intensity as Shiites prepare to celebrate Ashura, one of their holiest days.

The violence on Friday was not confined to the animal market. The area around Haifa Street, an important commercial strip, was again racked despite an effort by American and Iraqi soldiers to rid the area of militants. A suicide bomber attacked an Iraqi Army checkpoint in the neighborhood, killing two people and wounding 14, according to an Iraqi official, who said it was unclear how many casualties were soldiers.

There were 27 bodies recovered on the streets of the city, most showing signs of torture. The American military announced the death of a marine in fighting in the Sunni Arab Anbar Province.

The animal market was empty and sad. The police had sealed off the area, and the fire department had washed the blood from the streets.

The sidewalk was charred black and the splintered cages in the shops down the narrow alleyways sat empty. For this day, at least, the tumult of the bazaar had been quieted, its life drained away.

Pet Market Bomb Kills 15 Persons (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A bomb hidden in a box of pigeons exploded yesterday as shoppers gathered around, tearing through a busy pet and livestock market and littering the blood-soaked pavement with human remains and animal carcasses.

Nationwide, at least 62 persons, including a U.S. Marine, were killed or found dead.

The attack occurred while House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, both vocal war critics, were in Iraq on a surprise visit.

After meeting Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki, Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, said they hoped their trip would "convey to our troops the appreciation of the American people for what they're doing, to applaud their patriotism."

The attack at the animal market shattered the calm as Baghdad residents strolled past stalls where sellers were peddling birds, dogs, cats, sheep, goats and exotic animals such as snakes and monkeys.

No one claimed responsibility for the bombing, which police and hospital officials said killed 15 persons and wounded 66. Suspicion fell on Sunni insurgents because the market sits near a predominantly Shi'ite neighborhood on the east bank of the Tigris River that divides Baghdad.

It was the latest in a series of attacks on busy commercial targets in the capital as insurgents apparently sought to maximize bloodshed ahead of a U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown.

The explosion struck the Souq al-Ghazl at about 10 a.m., one of the busiest times for the animal vendors and an hour before the start of a four-hour vehicle ban that is imposed every Friday to prevent car bombs from striking mosques during weekly Islamic prayers.

The bomb detonated in the part of the market that specializes in birds; other areas are reserved for fish, dogs or other animals.

The bomber arrived with an egg carton containing pigeons for sale, but it exploded after he walked away to get a drink, striking potential buyers gathered around the box, according to police and witnesses.

Attacks elsewhere left at least 46 persons dead, including 38 bullet-riddled bodies found mostly in Baghdad. The body of a Shi'ite boxer who had been kidnapped days ago also was found in central Baghdad, with wounds on his neck indicating he had been hanged, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0123697

A Marine was killed in fighting in the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, west of Baghdad, the military said, raising the number of U.S. service members who have died since the war began to at least 3,070, according to an Associated Press count.

Happy Scene In Baghdad Turns Grim As Blast Upends Animal Market (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Zeena Kareem

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — The police officer warned them to spread out. Now was not the time to cluster around one another so closely. But he didn't press too hard before he moved along. In this time of war and misery, police officer Sabah Shayal admitted, it heartened him to see so many people gathering on a gleaming Friday morning for one of the capital's most celebrated treats, the Ghazel pet and livestock flea market.

Winter's cool glazed the sunshine. In bags, boxes and carts, poor young men brought the pigeons, parakeets, dogs, cats, tropical fish, scorpions, monkeys and snakes to sell to families shopping for pets. In pickup trucks, they brought top-grade roosters, goats and sheep they raised in the yards of their homes in the Sadr City district to sell to farmers. Parents brought their children to delight in the festival of creatures.

"I told them groups and large gatherings are targeted," Shayal said. "They told me, 'Don't worry. We're selling pets. No one will target us.' "

Two hours later, after a bomb or two hidden in a box ripped through the market, killing 15 people and wounding 51, Shayal returned to survey the grotesque scene. The bodies were piled on the carcasses of dead animals.

"The birds were roasted," he said. "There were piles of flesh."

Shayal and other officers tried to keep the bystanders away from the victims until ambulances arrived. Bomb victims often suffer internal injuries, and people trying to help by dragging them into taxicabs to speed them to the hospital often wind up killing them, he said. "I tried to keep them away," he said.

"They kept coming closer."

An official at Baghdad's Kindi Hospital said most of those killed were younger than 25. Ball bearings packed into the explosive device magnified the carnage and damage. One of the dead was a boy of 10.

Many of those injured lost years of hard work raising the animals.

"We sell special pigeons that we raise ourselves," said Fuad Ahmed, a 16-year-old who suffered shrapnel wounds to his head and shoulder. "We sell a pair for about $50. They all flew away in the explosion."

As usual, the attack carried sectarian overtones. Most of Ghazel's vendors are poor young Shiite Muslim men from eastern Baghdad.

Witnesses described members of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's militia helping secure the bomb scene. "They kept the way clear for the ambulances," said Falah Mehdi, a 35-year-old animal lover who visits the market every other week. "They pushed the people away fearing that another explosion would take place."

Police cleared the scene of debris and bloody remains.

Shayal had begun to leave when he saw something that astounded him.

"The funny thing is, that after some minutes, things went back to normal," he said. "The kids of 13 or 14 years old started to bring their boxes and begin setting up their stalls and selling their animals."

Sheiks Help Curb Violence In Iraq's West, U.S. Says (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

RAMADI, Iraq -- Before tribal sheiks aligned themselves with U.S. forces in the violent deserts of western Iraq, the number of people willing to become police officers in the city of Ramadi -- the epicenter of the fight against the insurgent group known as al-Qaeda in Iraq -- might not have filled a single police pickup.

"Last March was zero," said Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, the Marine commander in western Iraq, referring to the number of men recruited that month.

With the help of a confederation of about 50 Sunni Muslim tribal sheiks, the U.S. military recruited more than 800 police officers in December and is on track to do the same this month. Officers credit the sheiks' cooperation for the diminishing violence in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province.

DOJ_NMG_0123698

"I don't want to paint too rosy a picture, but if you compare this to what it was seven or eight months ago, there is not a place in this city that al-Qaeda controls," said Lt. Col. James Lechner, deputy commander of the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, in Ramadi.

But some Iraqi politicians and Anbar residents who oppose the U.S. presence describe the confederation, known as the Awakening, as a divisive group that pits tribes against each other, uses police officers as armed guards to protect tribal territory, and harnesses American support to consolidate its power.

Fasal al-Gaood, a tribal sheik and former Anbar governor who was seen as an ally of the Americans during his term in office, said the group has been given more authority than it deserves. Gaood, who has survived several assassination attempts, said he was worried that insurgent infiltrators might lurk inside the rapidly growing police force.

"Many of those sheiks are actually following two tracks," he said, speaking from his current home in Jordan. "On the one hand, they say, 'We support the council.' But they're not playing a direct role in it, because at the same time they also have connections with other organizations that are outside the law."

Lechner conceded that "insurgent infiltration is undoubtedly an issue" but said in an e-mail that the U.S. military relies on a computer database to check whether recruits have a history of known insurgent activity. They are also "vetted and vouched for by family members and tribal leaders," he said.

Saleh al-Mutlak, parliamentary leader of the secular Sunni party known as the Iraqi National Dialogue Front, described the confederation of Sunni sheiks as a "very dangerous movement" that is assuming official powers in the absence of a functioning government. "They wanted political cover from our front, but we said no," he said. "We don't mind that they fight al-Qaeda, but any movement should be official, and not tribal, because it will only divide the tribes."

To some degree, the U.S. cooperation with the tribal sheiks is a relationship of last resort. The fighting in Anbar has been among the fiercest in the country since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Of the more than 3,000 U.S. service members killed in Iraq, 875 died in the province, roughly the size of North Carolina. Dozens of schools and hospitals are closed, and basic services such as electricity and telephones are woefully inadequate. The Americans live at Camp Ramadi amid a desolate expanse of mud: Smoke rises from the burn pit, and crows perch on trash and twisted metal along dirt roads.

This month, the confederation and U.S. officials held what they called the first Ramadi reconstruction conference in the compound of the leader of the Awakening, Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi. The American soldiers parked their Humvees in a gravel lot near some camels and a flock of sheep and left their combat boots on the porch as a sign of respect for the sheiks.

Inside a marble-clad conference hall, Zilmer, the Marine commander, surveyed a carpeted room filled with dozens of men in black-and-gold robes, checkered headdresses and pinstriped suits and pronounced them a "very, very impressive collection of the leadership of Ramadi and al-Anbar province." As if to underscore the local antagonism toward the sheiks, a missile crashed outside the wall of the compound, briefly interrupting Sattar's speech.

The military says it has found a welcome ally in the tribal sheiks. U.S. commanders trace the formation of the Awakening to Aug. 21 last year, when Abu Ali Jassim, a sheik who had encouraged his kinsmen to join the provincial security forces, was killed by members of al-Qaeda in Iraq. Instead of turning over the body to be buried, al-Qaeda hid it in a field, violating Islamic tenets calling for a swift burial, said Maj. Thomas A. Shoffner, operations officer for the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division.

"As soon as they did that, the local tribesmen absolutely turned on al-Qaeda," he said.

Military commanders say the newly determined sheiks encouraged kinsmen to join the police force in part because of a U.S. decision to allow the recruits to patrol their home territories.

Between July and December, the number of roadside bombings and incidents involving indirect fire, such as mortar attacks, dropped by about 50 percent in Ramadi, according to the U.S. military. Many al-Qaeda fighters lived in the suburbs of Ramadi and attacked in the city. But "the sheiks have sent their men out there and secured that," Lechner said.

In some ways, the confederation is also a last resort for the sheiks, some of whom say they have not received adequate protection or services from the Shiite Muslim-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Baghdad.

"Since the occupation in 2003 and up until now, we have received no help from the government to save Ramadi from the insurgents," said Mahmood al-Jarbou, whose tribe is part of the confederation. "Many of our tribesmen were killed, especially those who were willing to volunteer for army or police service. Because of that, we found it was necessary to form this council."

Maliki's aides say he supports the tribal organization, meets with its leaders and supports efforts to form a similar organization in Diyala province, another insurgent stronghold. An official in Maliki's government played down concerns about the confederation. "Obviously some people see this as a threat, but when compared to other threats, this is a rather benign one," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of government protocol.

Mahmood Farhan, sheik of Ramadi's large Albu Chlaib tribe, opposes the confederation. Its members "are creating their own militias to control the province," he said, adding: "Up until now, they have not created anything good for the city. They are only protecting their own areas and protecting the occupiers." Farhan supports attacks against American troops.

More than one observer questioned the motives of the Awakening's leader, Sattar of the Albu Risha tribe, a man reputed to have amassed a fortune as part of a criminal network that robbed travelers on the desert highways of Anbar. The Awakening's members "are a group of gangsters," said Hussein al-Maadhidi, a journalist who lives in Haditha.

An adviser to Sattar, Hikmet Sulaiman, denied that Sattar had been a highway bandit, saying, "He comes from a rich family, and he made himself . . . a quite good business in Iraq, Jordan and Dubai." Sulaiman did not answer an e-mail asking what the business was, but he said that Sattar has paid about $600,000 of his own money into the Awakening and that "thousands are now following him with their lives" because of his strong reputation.

The U.S. military's reliance on the tribal sheiks recalls the British occupation of Iraq in the early 20th century. The British courted the sheiks with funding and made them responsible for ensuring order and collecting revenue, historian Phebe Marr wrote in "The Modern History of Iraq."

"The policy was efficient and economical, reducing the need for highly paid British staff in the countryside, but ultimately it strengthened the hold of the sheiks over their tribesmen and their land," Marr wrote. The policy came to be regarded as "certainly one of the most lasting and problematic legacies" of British rule.

Gaood, once involved with the Awakening, said the movement is not the solution to Ramadi's problems. "If we try to rely on strictly tribal forces and tribal figures, this would be like taking Iraq back to the days of the Middle Ages," he said.

One Iraqi political scientist in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said he saw the confederation as an example of the widespread push in Iraq for greater regional control in areas such as the Shiite south and the Kurdish north, catalyzed by a weakened central government.

But aligning with the Americans can be dangerous in the heartland of the Sunni insurgency. As Lechner put it: "They've come out of the closet, so to speak. There's no going back now."

Abu Ghraib Officer Faces Court-Martial (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

HAGERSTOWN, Md., Jan. 26 -- The only U.S. military officer charged with a crime in the Abu Ghraib scandal will be court-martialed on eight charges, including cruelty and maltreatment of prisoners, the Army said Friday.

Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, a 50-year-old reservist from Virginia who ran the interrogation center at the Iraqi prison, was accused of failing to exert his authority as the place descended into chaos, with prisoners stripped naked, photographed in humiliating poses and intimidated by snarling dogs. He was also charged with lying to investigators.

Jordan has not been accused of personally torturing or humiliating prisoners and was not pictured in any of the photos that embarrassed the Pentagon and shocked the world.

Maj. Gen. Guy C. Swann, commander of the Military District of Washington, decided that Jordan must stand trial, said Col. Jim Yonts, an Army spokesman.

Jordan was charged in April with 12 offenses. Swann dismissed four charges after Jordan was given an Article 32 hearing, the military equivalent of a civilian preliminary hearing, in October.

Besides cruelty and maltreatment, the charges include disobeying a superior officer, willful dereliction of duty and making false statements. The charges carry a total maximum prison term of 22 years.

Jordan's military lawyers did not immediately return phone calls.

At his October hearing, Jordan said he had no operational control over interrogations and spent much of his time trying to improve the deplorable living conditions of soldiers.

The government alleges that Jordan's actions or inaction subjected detainees to forced nudity and intimidation by dogs. He also is accused of lying to investigators in denying that he saw any abuse.

Eleven other U.S. soldiers -- all from the enlisted ranks -- have been convicted in the Abu Ghraib scandal, with former Cpl. Charles A. Graner Jr. receiving the harshest sentence, a 10-year prison term. A general and other officers have received reprimands or demotions that ended or blighted their careers.

Since he was charged in April, Jordan has been on active duty with the Intelligence and Security Command at Fort Belvoir, Va.

Diverse Voices To Denounce Iraq Troop Plan (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0123700

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Tens of thousands of demonstrators from across the country are expected to converge in Washington today to urge the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq as President Bush is proposing to send more troops in an effort to stabilize the country.

They plan to rally on the Mall, march around the north side of the Capitol and send a strong message to the government.

The event, which authorities said could draw 100,000 people, starts with a rally at 11 a.m. Among those expected to address the crowd are Jane Fonda, Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon and Jesse Jackson.

The march, organized by the group United for Peace and Justice, is scheduled to start at 1 p.m.

It will proceed eastward toward the Capitol along Constitution Avenue, head south on First Street NE, then make a U-turn and retrace the route before passing the western front of the Capitol and returning to the Mall along Fourth Street SW.

Police and protesters said there will probably be "feeder" marches to the Mall before the rally, from Dupont Circle and McPherson Square. Metro said that its normal Saturday schedule will be in place but that eight-car trains would be put in service if necessary.

U.S. Capitol Police officers said that road closures will go into effect around the Capitol during the march.

The event is expected to draw groups of many stripes. The chart for the assembly site shows sections reserved for veterans and labor, gay and peace organizations, in addition to others dedicated to opposing global warming, nuclear arms and torture and a group called End Israeli Occupation of Palestine. In addition, at least one group is protesting the protest.

Some of the demonstrators began gearing up yesterday.

Amid frigid temperatures and a biting wind, the women-run peace organization CodePink and the group Iraqi Voices for Peace held a rally at noon on the Mall in front of the Capitol.

With songs and speeches, the groups unveiled an installation of several thousand shoes in and around a clear plastic bin, which they said symbolize Iraqi civilians who have died since the war began. The shoes bear tags with names that the protesters said are those of Iraqis killed in the war, along with a few details of their deaths.

"We don't talk enough about the suffering and the pain that the Iraqis are experiencing," Jodie Evans, co-founder of CodePink, said on the Mall yesterday. "We do a lot of talking. But when you visually see a pair of shoes with a tag on it that says, 'So and so, aged 3, died in a bombing in Fallujah,' it becomes very real for you, the cost of this war."

Evans said the shoe installation, which she said the group used during last year's election campaign, was inspired by the display of concentration camp victims' shoes at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. "I remembered how powerfully it affected me," she said.

In Arab culture, shoes can be a sensitive issue, said Aseel Albanna, a District architect, Baghdad native and co-founder of Iraqi Voices for Peace. The improper display of the bottoms of shoes can be impolite, and shoes are traditionally left at the threshold of a house upon entering.

But in this case, she said on the Mall yesterday, symbolism is more important than tradition.

The groups cited a study by Johns Hopkins University last year that estimated that almost 655,000 civilian deaths in Iraq have occurred as a result of the war. President Bush had placed that number at 30,000, and a British-based group research group at about 50,000.

"We were surprised" at the study's findings, said Shannon C. Doocy, a Hopkins research associate who co-authored the study. "I don't think anyone intended the war to have this large of a consequence."

Fifty to 100 members of the Washington chapter of the conservative organization FreeRepublic.com plan to rally near the U.S. Navy Memorial to oppose the march and the participation of Jane Fonda, the chapter said. The actress has long been the object of conservative ire for her support of North Vietnam during the Vietnam War.

"These groups are the ones that are acting as the political arm of the terrorists overseas to help bring about America's defeat in the war on terror," said Kristinn Taylor of FreeRepublic.com.

Active Troops To Protest Iraq War (AJC/AP)

By Larry Margasak, Associated Press

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 27, 2007

A small number of active military troops will take part in today's rally in Washington against the Iraq war, co-founders of an active-duty protest group say.

One of the founders of Appeal for Redress, Navy Petty Officer Jonathan Hutto, said he plans to speak at the protest on the National Mall. Hutto, 29, who is originally from Atlanta, is a sailor aboard the aircraft carrier USS Theodore Roosevelt, currently at Norfolk, Va.

DOJ_NMG_0123701

United For Peace and Justice, an anti-war coalition of 1,400 organizations, said the protest could draw tens of thousands of demonstrators in all.

Hutto and Liam Madden, a Marine sergeant who received his discharge Jan. 20, founded Appeal for Redress, an organization of 1,200 active-duty personnel and veterans who favor a U.S. withdrawal from Iraq.

Hutto said 60 percent of the members have taken part in Iraq operations. He said he was aboard the Roosevelt off Iraq from September 2005 through March 2006. Madden said he was in Iraq's Anbar province from September 2004 to February 2005.

Hutto estimated that more than a dozen individuals on active duty would attend today.

Cynthia O. Smith, a Defense Department spokeswoman, said members of the armed forces can speak out, subject to several restrictions.

They must "not do so in uniform, and must make clear that they do not speak on behalf of their military unit, service or the Department of Defense, unless they are authorized to do so," she said.

Madden, whose specialty was setting up communications systems, and Hutto, who was in the carrier's public information office, said they have not been threatened or harassed by their commanders.

Hutto, said active-duty personnel he speaks with "see a separation between the global war on terrorism and the war in Iraq. They don't see the connection."

"When we're sitting having chow, and CNN is saying so many more were killed, the look on people's faces is, 'How much longer?' "

Hutto said more than 200 officers have signed on to his organization.

Police Brace For Anti-war Activists On Capitol Hill (WT)

By Matthew Cella, Daniel Taylor

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

Police are expecting thousands of demonstrators to converge at the U.S. Capitol today for a rally and march protesting the war in Iraq.

Lt. Scott Fear, a U.S. Park Police spokesman, said police will institute rolling road closures as demonstrators march in the area around the Capitol beginning at 1 p.m.

He said a full contingent of officers will be deployed in cruisers, on foot, on horseback and on motorcycles for what is expected to be one of the largest protests since the war began in March 2003.

"We don't expect any problems," Lt. Fear said. "We did meet with the organizers. They all say it's going to be a peaceful event."

National Park Service officials said the umbrella protest group United for Peace and Justice has a permit to set up a stage on the Mall at Third Street Northwest for an 11 a.m. rally. The group claims to represent a coalition of more than 1,300 local and national activist groups.

According to the group's Web site, www.unitedforpeace.org, confirmed speakers include celebrities Susan Sarandon, Tim Robbins, Danny Glover, Jane Fonda and the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

Park service officials issued a permit for a 1 p.m. march from the rally site that will move north along Third Street to Constitution Avenue and proceed halfway around the Capitol. Marchers will turn east on Constitution Avenue past the Capitol to First Street Northeast and turn south past the Supreme Court to East Capitol Street.

Marchers will then turn around and head north on First Street Northeaston the west side of the street, then march west on Constitution Avenue and south on First Street Northwest to the west lawn of the Capitol.

Rally organizers say they hope for a crowd upward of 300,000 people and that weather could be a critical factor in how many people show up. The National Weather Service forecasts a mostly sunny day with temperatures near 50 degrees.

Lt. Fear said officials expect a number of smaller, feeder marches to join the main group on the Mall.

The group Code Pink is expected to hold a rally at the Navy Memorial, at Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue Northwest at 10 a.m. before meeting up with the main protest group on the Mall. Activists supporting the war have a demonstration planned at the same location later in the day.

Lt. Fear said a group of anarchists is also expected to meet the main rally from Dupont Circle.

Metropolitan Police say they will be supporting Park Police efforts but have not planned any additional road closures or restrictions. Police spokesman Quentin Peterson said there were no plans to activate the department's Joint Operations Command Center or the city's network of downtown surveillance cameras used to monitor big events.

War Opponents Take Aim At Coleman (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON - As demonstrators prepared for an anti-war rally today in Washington, groups opposed to the war in Iraq announced that they're targeting Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., as part of a national campaign to stop the troop increase proposed by President Bush.

Monday, a group of Iraq veterans is scheduled to appear at a St. Paul press conference to pressure Coleman to vote for a resolution that would oppose sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Coleman, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, voted against the resolution on Wednesday. But it passed, and Coleman will vote on it again when it hits the Senate floor.

"This vote makes it painfully clear that Senator Coleman is joining President Bush in ignoring the safety of our troops and the opinions of top military leaders, the Iraq Study Group and the American people," said Moira Mack of Americans Against Escalation in Iraq.

Anti-war groups plan to target Coleman and eight other Senate Republicans: Richard Lugar of Indiana, George Voinovich of Ohio, Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, Judd Gregg and John Sununu of New Hampshire, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John Warner of Virginia.

Starting in St. Paul, the veterans are planning a two-day, seven-state tour to make the case for the resolution sponsored by Sens. Joe Biden, D-Del., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb. The veterans are associated with VoteVets.org, a founding partner of Americans Against Escalation in Iraq.

Coleman has been in the national spotlight since Jan. 10, when he announced his opposition to Bush's request. But Coleman has made a distinction between sending more troops to Baghdad and sending them to Anbar Province.

Friday, Coleman spokesman Tom Steward said that Coleman "continues to oppose the troop surge in Baghdad" but that the Biden-Hagel resolution "is overreaching and also expresses opposition to reinforcing troops in the Anbar Province where our troops are winning against a terrorist insurgency."

A New War, And A New Kind Of Generation Gap (PHI)

By Jeff Gammage

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 27, 2007

When David Kalkstein protests the Iraq war at demonstrations in South Jersey, he notices that most of the people around him share his hair color: gray.

Few young people show up.

"We're lucky if we get one or two," he said. "And sometimes we get zero."

As thousands of antiwar activists descend on the National Mall in Washington today, leaders of local peace groups are asking an updated version of a Vietnam War-era question: Where have all the young men gone? And the young women, too?

It's not that they support the war - a national Election Day poll found 62 percent of them opposed. And teenagers and young adults are selfless in community service. Yet at protests, the people carrying signs are often middle-age or retired.

It's the inverse of the 1960s, when U.S. campuses erupted in protest, sometimes in flames, over the war in Southeast Asia.

Kalkstein, 67, an organizer with the South Jersey Campaign for Peace and Justice, has five buses headed to the capital today - and he's thrilled that 25 percent of the travelers will be college-age.

"From my experience," he said, "that's incredible."

Protest leaders say it's impossible to overstate the impact of the draft in mobilizing the earlier antiwar movement.

"We didn't choose to think about Vietnam, it was thrust upon us," said Robert Smith, 56, staff coordinator of the Brandywine Peace Community. "You had to decide. The Vietnam War made a claim on this society and every young man between 18 and 26... . The Iraq war hasn't made the same claim."

Smith went to jail for refusing to be inducted into the Army, a decision taken when he heard the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. speak in 1967, he said. Friends faced similar crossroads, their choices altering their lives.

Today's young adults, Smith said, have a different idea of "sacrifice, commitment, and even the value of activism."

It's not that no young people take part in the movement. Students at the University of Pennsylvania, among other local schools, have organized transportation to today's march. Younger activists at the American Friends Service Committee in Philadelphia are going, too.

Aimee George, 20, a globalization-studies major at Gettysburg College, will march with her campus Peace Club.

DOJ_NMG_0123703

It's a challenge to raise student awareness because "not everyone has been directly affected," she said. "Some of my friends have friends who have been deployed, so they feel it more.

"On campus, you're going to get both sides," George said. "Some people say we have to be there, and some people say we have to get out."

Historians point out that America has grown more conservative in the last 40 years, a trend reflected in its youth. In 1970, the census showed, 79 percent of college freshmen cited "developing a meaningful philosophy of life" as a top objective. In 2005, 75 percent said "being very well off financially" was important.

Peter Bredlau, chaplain at Muhlenberg College, said that after the U.S. invasion of Iraq, he helped a student form a campus antiwar group, the Alliance for Progressive Action. But the group fizzled, never able to attract more than six students.

"Being an antiwar protester, or an 'anti-' protester of any kind, just isn't a credential. You can put 'fed the homeless' on your resume," Bredlau said.

Besides, he added, "they might look back on their parents' generation and say, 'What did those protests achieve? We're still having wars.' "

To the iPod generation, standing on street corners and holding banners can seem anachronistic. Its members are more likely to voice political objections on blogs and other Internet venues. On YouTube, where anyone can post a video, there are hundreds of clips that feature antiwar themes or music.

Lovella Calica, a 25-year-old program coodinator with Iraq Veterans Against the War in Philadelphia, said some established peace groups do not resonate with younger people because they insist on "doing the same things they've always been doing."

"Young people aren't into vigils as much. I'm not. I see why people do it, and I think it's very serious and solemn," said Calica, who is going to Washington. "We have a lot of energy. We want to do things differently sometimes."

Some of her peers organize Internet "sit-ins," where a gang of friends simultaneously logs onto a conservative chatroom. "You can take that room over," Calica said. "You can use it as a soapbox."

Today's high school and college students are concerned about poverty, AIDS, global warming and famine in Darfur. Some trade vacations for volunteer missions overseas.

"Even if they're not out protesting the war, they're doing something," said Karen Porter, 59, founder of the Chester County Peace Movement.

Her group is mostly older people, some of the hardest workers being retired doctors and professors. Antiwar activity can be controversial, she noted, and young people are savvy enough to understand the implications.

"You've got to pick and choose which university, and later which employer, you want to tell," she said.

Porter, who recently joined the Gray Panthers, recalls being tear-gassed while demonstrating against the 1970 invasion of Cambodia. But college freshmen born in 1988 are too young to remember Ronald Reagan, let alone the '60s. In fact, a few years ago, several West Chester University students came seeking her advice.

"They literally said, 'We want to have a demonstration on campus. How do we do it?' " Porter said. "It was very sweet."

Smith, of the Brandywine group, has had similar experiences. The 30-year veteran of peace work was frustrated, after the Iraq war began, to be approached by young people who asked, "Are there peace groups around here?"

There are, he answered. And he encouraged them to join.

"A movement can only continue as far as there are young people," he said. "It's their future. They're going to have to make some choices."

Fonda Role Again Draws Heat (BOS)

By Bryan Bender

The Boston Globe, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Actress and long time peace activist Jane Fonda, a favorite target of right-wing attacks since the 1970s for her high-profile opposition to the Vietnam War, will rejoin the ranks of the antiwar movement today at a major rally in Washington .

The return to the spotlight for the Hollywood star derisively known as "Hanoi Jane" for going to North Vietnam at the height of the war, was seen by some activists and chroniclers of the antiwar movement as politically risky. They said her presence could be distracting in a rally that organizers hope can capitalize on congressional opposition to President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

"I wonder if the appearance of someone like Jane Fonda is going to pull attention away from other messages," said Rhys Williams, a University of Cincinnati sociologist who has chronicled American anti war movements. "If I were an organizer, I would worry how much her presence is going to be dominating the news cycle."

Though it's been decades since she posed atop a North Vietnamese anti aircraft gun, many Vietnam veterans are still angry . Fonda later apologized -- but didn't say she was sorry for fervently opposing the Vietnam War.

Her acting career survived, and Fonda left Hollywood nearly two decades ago. Though she's on record against the Iraq war, she's stayed on the sidelines of the anti war movement -- perhaps because of lingering public resentment over her highly charged propaganda visit to Hanoi.

That two-week trip in 1972 included a government-staged news conference with American POWs and a radio broadcast in which she declared the United States "will never be able to break the spirit of these people." Outraged, many Americans accused her of treason, and some fellow anti war activists said Fonda went too far.

In 1988, she apologized to veterans and their families. "I was trying to help end the killing and the war," she said on ABC's "20/20" news show , "but there were times when I was thoughtless and careless about it and I'm . . . very sorry that I hurt them."

Fonda will join a speaker's roster today that includes fellow Vietnam War-era protesters, grass-roots activists, and movie stars such as Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon, and Tim Robbins.

Fonda declined to be interviewed for this story.

At a lecture in Vancouver just weeks after the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, Fonda expressed concern that the war would damage America's "stability as a nation" and could tarnish the country's prestige. "I think the entire world is going to be united against us," she said.

But she hasn't spoken out much since then and decided not to join a cross-country bus trip with Iraq veterans protesting the war in 2005. In an interview last April on ABC's "Good Morning America," Fonda acknowledged, "I carry too much baggage."

Indeed, as news spread that she'd join this weekend's protest , conservative blogs exploded with vitriol.

"The enemies of this nation are feeling so emboldened that they are confident enough to bring Jane Fonda to a MEMORIAL for the United States Navy," the conservative website Freerepublic.com decried in an "urgent" post. Fonda "posed with our enemy [in North Vietnam] on an anti aircraft battery used to shoot down our Navy pilots."

The resentment isn't limited to political bloggers. A man who said he was a Vietnam veteran wrote an angry letter to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel after Fonda appeared at a local abortion-rights rally earlier this month. "Healing will only begin when Ms. Fonda tells the American people that she was wrong to go to Hanoi, that she was wrong to openly accuse American soldiers of murdering [Vietnamese] babies, and that she was wrong to betray the trust of those [American] POWs," Bart Arcoleo wrote.

For the architects of today's demonstration, which organizers predict could draw more than 100,000 people, the star power of Fonda and other celebrities is a way to draw national attention and hone the anti war message.

Fonda "is a natural bridge" between generations, Judith LeBlanc , co chairwoman of United for Peace and Justice, an umbrella organization of anti war, community, and religious groups . "US foreign policy is on a continuum. We need the support of those who are in Hollywood to speak their minds on the issues of the day. They play a big part in our country."

"She is perfectly entitled to speak, and it won't make a difference one way or another for public opinion," said Tom Hayden , Fonda's former husband, a onetime California state senator, and a co founder of Students for a Democratic Society. Hayden, who will also attend the rally, bristled at the suggestion that Fonda's presence would undercut the protesters' message.

"There is no Jane Fonda factor," said the Rev. Jesse Jackson , a civil rights leader who is also on the list of scheduled speakers today. "That's insulting. This is about soldiers doing three and four tours and thousands killed and wounded."

Still, participants like Keshini Ladduwahetty of the antiwar group DC for Democracy questioned whether giving Fonda a central role will do more harm than good. Ladduwahetty wrote in an e-mail that Fonda doesn't offend her, but "some people do find her a turnoff."

Meanwhile, Liam Madden of Boston, a Marine who served in Iraq in 2004 and is a co founder of the antiwar group Appeal for Redress, said Fonda's public support is a mixed blessing: She "brings attention, but in some people's eyes it lessens credibility."

Yet the political conditions surrounding the Iraq war are far different than during the Vietnam War, when it took much longer for public opinion to turn against the war , according to David Walls , an author and retired sociology professor at Sonoma State University .

"The climate has changed a lot in the last year with the congressional elections," Walls said. "Compared to the others from the far wings of left-wing politics, Fonda is a much more recognizable person and frankly a lot closer to the mainstream."

Tree Memorial To Dead Troops Becoming Forest (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0123705

FORT STEWART, Georgia (AP) -- The sergeant major calls the name, Staff Sgt. John L. Hartman Jr., as it's unveiled on a granite marker at the root of a new eastern redbud tree on Warriors Walk -- where hundreds of these living memorials have been planted to honor the wartime dead.

Hartman volunteered for a third tour in Iraq last year so an Army buddy could stay home with his newborn son. He was killed November 30 when a bomb blast tore into his Humvee.

Last week, Hartman became the 318th soldier memorialized at Warriors Walk, a grove of eastern redbuds started with 34 trees in April 2003.

Fort Stewart has planted a tree here for every member of the 3rd Infantry Division to die in the war, as well as for soldiers from other Army posts killed while serving with the division.

Jeff Fornshell, the post's ceremonies coordinator, said he wonders how many trees he'll have to plant this year. Expanded twice since its inception, Warriors Walk has room for only 72 more trees.

"Is 72 going to be enough? I hope it is," Fornshell said. "I hope we don't put any more out here. You're all the time thinking you don't want to have a new tree dedication."

Earlier this month, the 3rd Infantry began deploying its 19,000 troops for a third tour in Iraq. Hartman went separately from the division last year as an instructor training Iraqi security forces.

At least 3,058 troops have died in Iraq. Seven civilian contractors of the Defense Department also have been killed in the war. More than 10 percent are represented at Warriors Walk, which exhibits the war's cost in a way that's staggering in scale yet also intensely personal.

The trees already line both sides of two paved walkways flanking Fort Stewart's parade grounds, stretching nearly the length of three football fields. A third walkway had to be poured last year to start a new row.

Fornshell said he never expected Warriors Walk would grow so much when the first tree was planted. The 3rd Infantry lost 42 soldiers during the invasion to topple Saddam Hussein's regime. Trees honoring those soldiers were planted in single-file rows, about 13 feet apart.

But the division's second tour in 2005, when its troops faced shadowy insurgents rather than a stand-up army, proved more costly. The 3rd Infantry suffered 105 deaths, not counting those among supporting units. A second walkway of memorial redbuds had to be started.

The expansion encroached slightly on the Army post's golf course. The tree for Staff Sgt. Jens E. Schelbert was planted less than a foot from the greener grass of the teeing area for the No. 5 hole.

Birgit Smith of Holiday, Florida, has watched Warriors Walk grow during visits four times a year since her husband, Sgt. 1st Class Paul R. Smith, was killed April 4, 2003. Credited with saving dozens of American lives by holding off Iraqi forces with a machine gun before he was killed at the Baghdad airport, Smith was awarded the Medal of Honor in 2005.

"When I first returned to Fort Stewart to visit the tree, the walk seemed so far to get to Paul's tree," Smith said. "And now it seems so short because there are so many more trees."

Smith said she likes to leave a single red rose when visiting her husband's tree. At the foot of the other living memorials lie dozens of mementos -- toy soldiers, angel figurines, wind chimes, whiskey bottles, garden gnomes and laminated photos that personalize each.

Two unopened bottles of Corona Extra beer stand next to the tree dedicated to Spc. Joseph A. Lucas. Nearby, someone placed five golf balls at the tree for Staff Sgt. Chad M. Mercer. A Hawaiian lei circles the granite tree marker for Spc. Derence W. Jack.

As curator of the Fort Stewart Museum, Walter Meeks III has collected more than 400 such mementos from Warriors Walk since the war began. Some are displayed at the museum, while most are in storage.

"It's a sobering duty," Meeks said. "It's a beautiful monument, but it represents a great deal of grief and loss for the community. It's definitely not a walk in the park."

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, commander of the 3rd Infantry, knelt and touched his fingers to Hartman's granite stone after its unveiling ceremony, where Lynch praised the 39-year-old for his service.

"We routinely come to this hallowed place to remember our fallen comrades," Lynch said. "And it strengthens our resolve to continue as a nation, in their memory, to fight this global war on terrorism."

Rice Presses Allies To Boost Afghan Aid (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123706

BRUSSELS, Jan. 26 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, citing the $10.6 billion in new aid that the Bush administration proposes to give Afghanistan, pressed NATO and European allies Friday to increase their contributions of money and manpower.

Rice's push came as concern grows over the resurgence of the Taliban in southern Afghanistan, massive increases in opium production and rising tension between Afghanistan and neighboring Pakistan, where Taliban leaders and fighters have been allowed refuge.

"Nations that have made pledges of support should follow through and deliver," Rice told a meeting of NATO foreign ministers here. They had assembled at her request to address what the United States calls an urgent need to bolster the Afghan government's security and development efforts before the Taliban begins even more intensive attacks in the spring, when snows melt and mountainous border areas become more passable.

Her appeals elicited nearly universal agreement on the need for more aid, but no country made a large new offer.

NATO officials cast the meeting's outcome as positive. "We have more nations stepping up to the plate," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said after the ministers' meeting, which also drew officials from the European Union and World Bank. He gave no specific examples.

A NATO official said that Denmark and Lithuania have offered a small number of additional personnel and that the alliance hopes to receive more commitments in two weeks, when its defense ministers meet in Seville, Spain.

NATO authorities said the 33,250 NATO troops in Afghanistan represent about 85 percent of what military commanders say they need. The United States has contributed 12,000 troops to the NATO mission and has another 12,000 personnel operating in the country under independent U.S. command. The United States has said it will keep 3,200 of its troops in Afghanistan for an extra four months to provide reinforcements through the spring.

Some European ministers grumbled to reporters afterward that their countries are already making significant contributions and are overstretched by military commitments around the world. Those ministers said additional money and troops should come from countries now making few or no contributions.

Although 37 nations are providing troops, only seven provide more than 1,000, and some of those prohibit their forces from serving in the most dangerous southern provinces, where the most assistance is needed to fend off the Taliban.

France and Spain, two other major contributors, said they have no more reinforcements to offer. The German Parliament is currently engaged in a heated debate over whether to deploy six Tornado reconnaissance planes to the southern areas.

Rice defended U.S. and NATO operations in Afghanistan, saying, "The violence we are seeing is not evidence that our strategy has failed, nor that the situation will improve in our absence." She added, "It is evidence of how much we are needed."

The appeal for more assistance for the struggling government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai comes as the Bush administration is pressuring Congress for more troops and money for the war in Iraq and foreign governments are trying to raise funds to help rebuild Lebanon after the war between Hezbollah and Israel last summer.

Rice said the Bush administration will ask Congress for $8.6 billion in new funding to equip and train Afghan police and army units and an additional $2 billion for reconstruction, with the money to be parceled out over two years. If approved, the aid would represent a significant increase in U.S. funding to Afghanistan. In the five years since U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban government, the United States has provided $14.2 billion to Afghanistan in security and development aid.

In addition to pressing allies to offer more money and troops for Afghanistan, a senior U.S. official said, Washington views its new proposal as "a chance to show we're not leaving, and Iraq is not sucking up all the resources and the oxygen."

Rice Asks Allies To Increase Afghan Aid (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 27, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice asked allies Friday to intensify their efforts to keep the Taliban from retaking parts of Afghanistan, and asserted a resurgence in Taliban attacks does not mean the U.S. war strategy has failed.

Rice made her appeal a day after the Bush administration said it would ask Congress for $10.6 billion to help the embattled Afghan government. The U.S. hopes its hefty increase will serve as an incentive for other countries to boost their contributions.

Taliban forces, emboldened and rearmed, launched fierce attacks across the country beginning last spring, leading to Afghanistan's bloodiest year since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion. Crop production for illegal drugs also hit a new high in 2006, and relations worsened between Afghanistan and Pakistan, a key U.S. ally in the fight against global terrorism.

"The violence we are seeing is not evidence that our strategy has failed, nor that the situation will improve in our absence," Rice said in a written statement to NATO foreign ministers who gathered to plan for an expected Taliban military offensive in the spring. "It is evidence of how much we are needed."

Separately, the top U.S. general in Afghanistan told a Pentagon news conference that the spike in violence in Afghanistan has occurred largely because an international force has taken the offensive, not because of any Taliban initiative.

The Bush administration wants NATO allies to increase money, troops and other support for the unsteady democracy in Afghanistan. It is also working to dispel European suspicion that the United States is too busy in Iraq to pay attention to the older Afghan fight.

"Every one of us must take a hard look at what more we can do to help the Afghan people, and to support one another," Rice said.

Casualties in Afghanistan have risen sharply in recent months as the Taliban have widened military operations and suicide attacks. Some 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence in Afghanistan last year, according to numbers from Afghan, U.S. and NATO officials.

Many allies have urged the Bush administration to keep focused on Afghanistan, and some have worried that President Bush's plan for a 21,500-troop increase in Iraq will starve the Afghan mission.

Critics in Europe and elsewhere suggested that last year's show of Taliban strength was proof that the U.S. focus wavered. The offensive caught U.S. and other commanders off guard, but the Taliban have not been able to extend their military success to renewed political power.

Speaking to Pentagon reporters from Bagram, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, the senior U.S. military commander in Afghanistan, said U.S. and NATO-controlled forces are meeting more resistance partly because they're expanding operations farther into remote areas of the country to rout out insurgents.

Freakley also took issue with reports that a resurgent Taliban is on the offensive.

"It is the U.S. forces and the International Security Assistance Forces that have been on the offensive ... finding the enemy, separating enemy leaders from the population and giving reconstruction opportunities, job opportunities and extending the government of Afghanistan," he said by videoconference

"The Taliban have not achieved any of their objectives in the last year," he said, adding they failed in their attempts to retake their former stronghold, the southern city of Kandahar, and failed in their goal to topple the government of President Hamid Karzai.

Rice convened Friday's session to plan for another expected Taliban military offensive in the spring.

"If there is to be a 'spring offensive,' it must be our offensive," Rice told the group. NATO's top commander pledged on Friday to launch such an offensive against resurgent Taliban forces in the south and east of Afghanistan.

"Springtime in Afghanistan: Historically we've seen increased activity" from Taliban fighters, Gen. John Craddock told reporters at a news conference discussing NATO's International Security Assistance Force, or ISAF, in Afghanistan.

Among other issues Rice raised were the divisions within the alliance on sharing the burden in Afghanistan. Troop commitments have lagged behind U.S. expectations, partly due to doubts in some European capitals about the depth of U.S. commitment, diplomats said.

The NATO-led force is about 20 percent short of the troops levels pledged by its contributing nations.

There are about 24,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the war began in October 2001. About half are under the control of NATO, which is gradually gaining more control over operations there.

The United States is by far the largest contributor to the 34,460-member NATO force in Afghanistan, with 11,800 troops. Britain is next with 5,200.

In an interview, Afghanistan's foreign minister said NATO and Afghan government forces could halt Taliban attacks if they received "constructive participation" from Pakistan. The two neighbors have been at odds for months over their efforts to crack down on terrorists crossing the border into Afghanistan.

"My appeal to our brothers in Pakistan is to stop interfering ... to stop these powerful sectors which use terrorism as an instrument of foreign policy," said Afghan Foreign Minister Rangeen Dadfar Spanta.

He praised the U.S. aid proposal and said he was not disappointed that European offers were lower, adding, "The contribution of the Europeans is increasing."

NATO Allies Wary Of Sending More Troops To Afghanistan (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123708

BRUSSELS, Jan. 26 — America's European allies on Friday remained noncommittal about sending additional troops to Afghanistan, even as the Bush administration sought to inject new energy into the NATO mission against the Taliban by offering more American soldiers and money.

Officially, the language at a NATO meeting here on Friday reflected resolve and commitment toward Afghanistan. NATO "is stepping up its game in Afghanistan on all fronts," said Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, the alliance's secretary general. "The fact that you saw so many people from the international community sitting around the table is a strong message itself."

But beyond the sound bites, the realities that have troubled the NATO mission in Afghanistan since the 26-member trans-Atlantic alliance took command last year remained on display. France and Germany continued to limit their combat role; both countries have refused to deploy troops in the south of the country, where Taliban forces are strongest. Germany's Parliament has yet to approve a proposal to send six Tornado reconnaissance jets to the south.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Romano Prodi of Italy is battling allies in his own government who oppose the Afghan mission and want the government to set a deadline for withdrawing the country's 1,800 troops. While Mr. Prodi's government passed a measure on Friday to renew financing for Italy's troops in Afghanistan, it did so without the support of all of Mr. Prodi's coalition partners, and Italian officials said it was unlikely that Mr. Prodi could rally support for any increase in troops.

The United States sought to lead by example, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who called for the Brussels meeting in the hope of spurring more action from the Europeans, told the assembled ministers that President Bush would ask Congress for $10.6 billion in additional financial assistance for Afghanistan.

Bush administration officials said on Thursday that the Pentagon would extend the Afghan tours of 3,200 American soldiers. Ms. Rice added that beyond the extension of the tours, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates would further expand the number of American troops, "partly through extra forces."

"Every one of us must take a hard look at what more we can do to help the Afghan people," Ms. Rice said, according to a State Department statement. "We need additional forces on the ground — ready to fight. And we need to provide greater support for the development of Afghan institutions, especially its security forces."

American officials say that Taliban fighters are mounting increasingly brazen cross-border attacks from Pakistan and that they are preparing to resume attacks in the spring, as they have done every year since the American invasion deposed the Taliban in 2001.

"If there is to be a 'spring offensive,' it must be our offensive," she said. "It must be a political campaign, an economic campaign, a diplomatic campaign, and, yes, a military campaign."

But that military campaign remains about 15 percent short of what American and NATO commanders say they need on the ground to fight the Taliban.

The 3,200 American troops whose departure has been delayed would bring the American force level in Afghanistan to around 24,000. About half of those are part of the NATO mission in Afghanistan, while the other half are engaged in American-led counterterrorism operations. About 20,000 soldiers from other NATO countries are also deployed in Afghanistan.

Britain has the second-largest contingent of soldiers in Afghanistan, with 6,000 troops.

NATO said Friday that an alliance airstrike destroyed a Taliban command post in southern Afghanistan, killing a man suspected of being a senior militant leader. Also on Friday, a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the offices of an aid group in Helmand Province, wounding a policeman and two others.

American and NATO officials are now pinning their hopes for troop increases on a meeting of NATO defense ministers in Seville, Spain, next month. Mr. de Hoop Scheffer, the NATO secretary general, said he was "relatively optimistic" that more troops would be forthcoming.

"Everybody understands that it's vital that we achieve our goals this year," said Richard A. Boucher, the assistant secretary of state for South and Central Asian affairs.

Afghan Lawmaker Is Killed

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 26 — An Afghan lawmaker was shot to death on Friday while he was walking from his home to a mosque for Friday Prayer, officials said.

The lawmaker, Maulvi Mohammad Islam Mohammadi, 67, was from the northern province of Samangan. The reason for the killing was unclear, and no one immediately claimed responsibility, but there were fears among legislators that the attack might have been politically motivated.

According to election law, when a member of Parliament dies the candidate who had the next-highest vote tally becomes the successor.

"It is a danger signal for the Afghan members of Parliament if the political competition causes the terror" for lawmakers, said Fawzia Kofi, the deputy speaker of Parliament.

2 Soldiers Reprimanded For Assaults (LAT)

By Kevin Sack

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

The Army announced Friday night that it had given administrative reprimands to two Special Forces soldiers for assaulting detainees held at a base in eastern Afghanistan in 2003 and for failing to report the death of one detainee.

However, the U.S. Army Special Forces Command absolved the soldiers of any wrongdoing in the deaths of two detainees: an 18-year-old Afghan army recruit named Jamal Naseer who died after interrogation at the base in Gardez, and Wakil Mohammed, a woodcutter from the village of Wazi who was shot in the face during a search operation.

The command said in a statement that Army investigators had determined that a Special Forces soldier shot and killed Mohammed in self-defense.

Afghan witnesses dispute that Mohammed posed any threat to the soldier; they said he was pleading, without the help of a translator, not to be shot.

Both deaths were concealed from superiors until they were revealed by The Times beginning in 2004.

The statement from Special Forces Command in Ft. Bragg, N.C., did not name the soldiers who had been disciplined, nor did it provide details about which death led to the disciplinary action for failure to report.

Both detainees died in March 2003 while in the custody of a team of soldiers from the 20th Special Forces Group of the Alabama National Guard.

The team was led by Chief Warrant Officer Kenneth C. Waller, who continues to work full time for the 20th Group headquarters and is currently serving in East Africa.

Numerous Afghans who saw Naseer's body just before and after he died at the Gardez firebase described it as horribly bruised and swollen, showing signs of severe beatings and blunt trauma. But the Special Forces statement said that "all other allegations, to include voluntary manslaughter and aggravated assault of detainee Jamal Naseer, were found to be unsubstantiated."

A number of other Afghans taken prisoner by the same Special Forces unit reported that they were kicked, punched and forced to maintain stress positions. Some of those allegations were supported by doctors who examined the detainees after they were moved from the Special Forces compound.

A lengthy investigation by the Army's Criminal Investigation Command, which concluded two weeks ago, found probable cause to believe that the two soldiers had committed assault. The statement released Friday characterized the offense as "slapping detainees."

The two soldiers each received a "General Officer Memorandum of Reprimand" — an administrative punishment delivered without a criminal hearing. One Special Forces officer, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss internal military matters, described that penalty as "a high-level slap on the wrist" that typically prevents an officer from advancing up the ranks.

"It's an indication that they didn't think it warranted a court-martial or even nonjudicial punishment," said Hy Rothstein, a professor at the Naval Post Graduate School.

Maj. James O. Gregory, a spokesman for Special Forces Command, said the command "takes all allegations of abuse seriously, ensuring that they are thoroughly investigated and appropriate action is taken."

Afghan Lawmaker Is Gunned Down In Kabul (LAT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — An Afghan lawmaker who oversaw the destruction of two massive 1,500-year-old Buddha statues in March 2001 was gunned down here on his way to Friday prayers, police said.

Mawlawi Mohammed Islam Mohammedi was the former Taliban regime's governor of Bamian province when the 5th century Buddha statues carved from the living rock were blasted with dynamite and artillery.

A gunman dressed as a construction worker shot and killed Mohammedi and wounded one of his two bodyguards with an AK-47 assault rifle before fleeing, said Zulmai Khan, Kabul's deputy police chief. The attacker's motive was unknown.

Mohammedi was elected in 2005 to represent the northern province of Samangan in Afghanistan's parliament. He had said he could not be held responsible for the destruction of the world-famous landmarks, which the Taliban said it considered idolatrous and anti-Muslim.

The slaying came a day after a NATO airstrike destroyed a Taliban command post in southern Helmand province. The alliance said a senior militant leader was killed but did not identify him.

DOJ_NMG_0123710

NATO's commander in Afghanistan said Friday that a battalion of U.S. troops would be sent to the insurgency-plagued south. Gen. David Richards said a battalion with the 10th Mountain Division would be dispatched to Kandahar to serve as a reserve force. A battalion can include as many as 1,200 troops.

Also on Friday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice asked allies to intensify their efforts to keep the Taliban from retaking parts of Afghanistan.

Rice, in Brussels, made her appeal a day after the Bush administration said it would ask Congress for $10.6 billion to help the Afghan government.

The administration wants North Atlantic Treaty Organization allies to increase contributions of money, troops and other support for the unsteady democracy in Afghanistan. It also is working to dispel European suspicion that the United States is too busy in Iraq to pay attention to the Afghan fight.

Halliburton 4Q Profit Declines 40 Pct (AP)

By John Porretto

AP, January 26, 2007

Oil industry services provider Halliburton Co. was upbeat Friday despite a 40 percent decline in fourth-quarter profit, citing heavy demand for its oilfield equipment and personnel and predicting more of the same for 2007.

Earnings fell to $658 million, or 64 cents per share, compared with $1.1 billion, or $1.04 per share, during the same period a year ago. But the prior-year results included $540 million of income, or 51 cents per share, that came from a tax benefit.

Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial were looking for earnings of 61 cents per share.

In a conference call with analysts, Halliburton Chairman and Chief Executive Dave Lesar offered a positive outlook for this year, saying customers have indicated strong demand for oil-field services despite sliding natural gas prices.

Some industry analysts were concerned by the potential for a slowdown in North American natural gas drilling in the first part of 2007. A relatively mild winter so far has weakened demand for natural gas as a heating source, which analysts say could lead to bloated inventories.

"If U.S. gas producers begin to cut back on their drilling budgets, the service companies will feel the impact almost immediately," Bear Stearns analyst Robin Shoemaker said in a research note this week.

Halliburton's energy services group, its largest division, provides a variety of services to oil and gas companies, including drilling the wells and managing the reservoirs once they're tapped. The energy services group posted record revenue of $3.5 billion in the fourth quarter due to heavy exploration and production.

"We believe any weather-related impact on the price of natural gas will be short-lived and, if the situation occurs, will be self-correcting as activities would slow temporarily, allowing gas inventories to normalize," Lesar said.

A Halliburton competitor, Schlumberger Ltd., also provided an upbeat outlook when it reported 2006 financial results last week, forecasting "high growth" through the end of this decade and into the next. Schlumberger's fourth-quarter profit soared 71 percent to $1.13 billion on revenue of $5.35 billion, the company said.

Halliburton's quarterly revenue rose 8 percent to $6.02 billion from $5.57 billion in the previous year, topping analysts' estimates of $5.9 billion. Gains at the energy services group were partially offset by lower revenue at Halliburton's engineering, construction and government-services arms, known as KBR Inc.

KBR, which Halliburton is spinning off, is the Army's contractor for providing food and shelter to the military in Iraq and Afghanistan _ a distinction that's kept it and Halliburton under Congress' microscope in recent years. Democrats have been critical of the dealings, claiming KBR benefited from ties with Vice President Dick Cheney, who once led Halliburton.

In November, KBR agreed to pay $8 million to settle six-year old claims it overcharged the Army for construction and other support services in the Balkans.

KBR reported revenue of $2.5 billion for the most-recent quarter, down from $2.7 million in the year-ago period _ a decline the company attributed in part to decreased activity on government projects for the U.S. military.

KBR had its initial public offering in November, raising $508 million, the company said. Lesar said he expects the separation of the two companies to be completed in the next three months. Halliburton still owns an 81 percent stake in KBR.

For the year, Halliburton said its net income was $2.3 billion, or $2.23 per share, down from $2.4 billion, or $2.27 a share, in 2005. Still, the 2006 result handily beat the consensus Wall Street estimate of $2.14 a share.

Full-year revenue rose to $22.6 billion from $20.2 billion in 2005.

Lesar said the company's balance sheet had never been stronger, ending 2006 with $4.4 billion in cash, an increase of nearly $2 billion from the start of last year. As such, he said, the company has increased its capital-expenditures budget by 40 percent for 2007. The company will focus that growth in foreign markets such as the Middle East, Africa and Asia, the company said.

Shares of Halliburton fell 59 cents, or 1.98 percent, to close at $29.15 on the New York Stock Exchange. KBR shares rose 20 cents to finish at $23.45.

Halliburton shares have traded in a 52-week range of $26.33 to $41.99; KBR's comparable trading range is $20.50 to $27.63.

Halliburton's Net Falls 40% On Income-Tax Provision (WSJ)

By Jonathan Vuocolo

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

Halliburton Co.'s fourth-quarter net fell 40%, hurt by a provision for income taxes. KBR Inc., which was partially spun off from Halliburton in November, saw net income decline 23%.

Halliburton, the Houston provider of products and services to the petroleum and energy industries, saw net income fall to $658 million, or 64 cents a share, from $1.1 billion, or $1.04 a share, a year earlier. Provision for income taxes was $343 million, while the company realized a $381 million benefit for income taxes a year earlier. Operating income for the quarter rose 36% to $1.04 billion from $766 million.

Revenue rose 8% to $6.02 billion from $5.57 billion, helped by Halliburton's energy-services group but partially offset by lower revenue at KBR, mostly due to decreased activity on government services projects for the U.S. military.

Halliburton, which owns 81% of KBR, expects to complete the separation of KBR from Halliburton within the next three months. KBR was partially spun off in a $17-a-share initial public offering that raised $508 million.

In a Halliburton-KBR joint conference call with analysts, Halliburton Chief Executive David Lesar said a "splitoff" transaction, where investors can trade their Halliburton shares for KBR shares, "has advantages," given the current strength of KBR's stock price. The splitoff would allow Halliburton to buy back stock, an ongoing goal for the company, he said. But he added that "no decision has been made," and that a straight spinoff, in the form of a dividend to shareholders, has its own merits.

Separately, KBR said net income fell to $43 million, or 28 cents a share, from $56 million, or 41 cents a share, a year earlier, hurt by weaker performance in its government and infrastructure business.

Houston-based KBR, an engineering, construction-management and facilities operations company and majority owner of the Devonport Royal Dockyard, said revenue fell 8% to $2.51 billion from $2.72 billion a year earlier. Government and infrastructure revenue fell 14% to $1.82 billion, while energy and chemicals revenue rose 16% to $687 million.

KBR CEO Bill Utt said in the conference call that the company is evaluating "inquiries" to purchase its 51% share in the dockyard. Media reports earlier this month said British defense contractor BAE Systems PLC and U.S. private equity firm Carlyle Group LP may be teaming up to make an offer. Mr. Utt said the company's revenue from operations in Iraq will get a "modest" boost from an increase in U.S. troops, partially reversing several years of decline. But the U.S. Defense Department is changing the way it buys services in a new effort to save money and avoid the type of controversy that has plagued a series of Halliburton troop-support contracts.

The Pentagon is reviewing all of its services contracts worth more than $1 billion. The department also has added new training for its contracting professionals, and it is preparing a series of reports on service purchasing practices across the military services. A new contract should be announced by the end of the first quarter, Mr. Utt said, with three contractors splitting the work.

Among other changes, the Defense Department wants to move away from its past habit of holding a single competition for years of subsequent work. This practice led to serious criticism of battlefield logistics contracts awarded to KBR for troop support in the Balkans and the Middle East.

In November, KBR agreed to pay an $8 million fine to settle allegations it overcharged and double-billed the Army in 1999 and 2000 for work performed in the Balkans.

One NATO Is Not Enough (NYT)

By Joseph Núñez

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

IN international relations, leadership often involves getting allies and friends to do things they have not done but need to do. For example, one challenge facing America is to get more European countries to do heavy lifting in Afghanistan, where British, Canadian, Dutch and American troops are bearing the brunt of battles with Taliban forces. This needs to happen if NATO is to make good on its commitments in Afghanistan, which rightly have wide international support and legitimacy.

DOJ_NMG_0123712

But the larger issue stemming from that overstrained mission is that NATO is not enough. Like the one strong horse that carries load after load, NATO is getting tired of having to serve as the proxy both for the United Nations and feeble regional organizations. While I am not, of course, authorized to speak in an official capacity, I have some thoughts, based on personal experience, on how to ease NATO's burden.

The sad truth is that there will be ever more failed states requiring long-term multinational intervention. NATO should not be expected to be everywhere. While it has evolved to handle new missions beyond Europe in the 21st century, it is not a bottomless well of troops.

NATO leaders should be asking this question: What are the other regions of the world prepared to do to handle the next likely conflagrations, be they in Sudan, Fiji, Congo, Somalia, Bolivia, North Korea or Nepal? We must get much more creative about preserving stability at such fault lines. Too many interventions, like the African Union's in Darfur, are done in an ad hoc and episodic manner; little wonder they usually fail.

What we need are more permanent regional security and defense organizations, supported by major powers. It is in the basic national interest of both the local states and the big nations, never mind any high-minded values. While states may have legitimate concerns about things like sovereignty, the alternative to constructive cooperation is the wildfire of anarchy, which spreads beyond borders and burns far too many.

The efforts of powerful Western countries to aid regional organizations' efforts in humanitarian assistance, peacekeeping and nation-building — which increased after the United Nations proved, in situations like Somalia during the early 1990s, to be incapable — have been inconsistent. Many arrogant policymakers continue to argue, in effect, that "superpowers don't do windows." Many major powers continue to focus their military programs on conventional warfare. The problem is that conventional wars these days are few, while failed states are many.

Rather than rely on regional groups to coalesce on their own, the United States and its allies should work to create a minimum of six additional security and defense organizations patterned on NATO — one each for North America, South America, Africa, the Asia-Pacific region, South Asia and the Middle East. Headquarters for these organizations might be, respectively, in Colorado Springs, Brasília, Johannesburg, Beijing, New Delhi and Amman, Jordan. But troops would be trained in all states that joined.

Each of these new alliances would have to be prepared to rapidly deploy at least a brigade-level force — about 6,000 troops with ground, sea and air capacities — anywhere in its sphere of influence. They would also have to have diplomatic and economic teams to move in after the fighting and get the government and markets of the affected country restarted.

Considering the vast scope of each of these six regions, the individual contributions required from the members would be fairly meager, and the richer and more populous states could be expected to supplement the offerings of their less advantaged neighbors.

Each of these new organizations would need at least one big power as a member; this economic and military linchpin would be expected to provide the trained personnel, equipment and money to begin the enterprise. Obviously, the United States would play that role in the North American group; but it and the European and Asian powers might have to take leading roles in some alliances that were geographically distant. This shouldn't be a stumbling block: after all, NATO spans the Atlantic.

Of course, all of these new alliances would need the blessing of the United Nations secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, and their efforts would be coordinated through the organization's Department of Peacekeeping Operations. The secretary general should be expected to welcome the arrangement: it would relieve his organization of its role in centrally planning operations and creating interim forces after conventional combat stops, at which it has floundered repeatedly.

Yes, creating these new alliances will mean that many states will have to change their approach to internal security and defense. But in this age of globalization, countries will have to be as flexible and cooperative on security matters as they have been on trade pacts.

In the end, two facts will drive many states to sign up for regional security organizations: the current system is largely dysfunctional, and joining would give each member greater international standing. For now and for the future, NATO is not enough.

At Ease, Mr. President (NYT)

By Garry Wills

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WE hear constantly now about "our commander in chief." The word has become a synonym for "president." It is said that we "elect a commander in chief." It is asked whether this or that candidate is "worthy to be our commander in chief."

But the president is not our commander in chief. He certainly is not mine. I am not in the Army.

DOJ_NMG_0123713

I first cringed at the misuse in 1973, during the "Saturday Night Massacre" (as it was called). President Richard Nixon, angered at the Watergate inquiry being conducted by the special prosecutor Archibald Cox, dispatched his chief of staff, Al Haig, to arrange for Mr. Cox's firing. Mr. Haig told the attorney general, Elliot Richardson, to dismiss Mr. Cox. Mr. Richardson refused, and resigned. Then Mr. Haig told the second in line at the Justice Department, William Ruckelshaus, to fire Cox. Mr. Ruckelshaus refused, and accepted his dismissal. The third in line, Robert Bork, finally did the deed.

What struck me was what Mr. Haig told Mr. Ruckelshaus, "You know what it means when an order comes down from the commander in chief and a member of his team cannot execute it." This was as great a constitutional faux pas as Mr. Haig's later claim, when President Reagan was wounded, that "Constitutionally ... I'm in control."

President Nixon was not Mr. Ruckelshaus's commander in chief. The president is not the commander in chief of civilians. He is not even commander in chief of National Guard troops unless and until they are federalized. The Constitution is clear on this: "The president shall be commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states, when called into the actual service of the United States."

When Abraham Lincoln took actions based on military considerations, he gave himself the proper title, "commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States." That title is rarely — more like never — heard today. It is just "commander in chief," or even "commander in chief of the United States." This reflects the increasing militarization of our politics. The citizenry at large is now thought of as under military discipline. In wartime, it is true, people submit to the national leadership more than in peacetime. The executive branch takes actions in secret, unaccountable to the electorate, to hide its moves from the enemy and protect national secrets. Constitutional shortcuts are taken "for the duration." But those impositions are removed when normal life returns.

But we have not seen normal life in 66 years. The wartime discipline imposed in 1941 has never been lifted, and "the duration" has become the norm. World War II melded into the cold war, with greater secrecy than ever — more classified information, tougher security clearances. And now the cold war has modulated into the war on terrorism.

There has never been an executive branch more fetishistic about secrecy than the Bush-Cheney one. The secrecy has been used to throw a veil over detentions, "renditions," suspension of the Geneva Conventions and of habeas corpus, torture and warrantless wiretaps. We hear again the refrain so common in the other wars — If you knew what we know, you would see how justified all our actions are.

But we can never know what they know. We do not have sufficient clearance.

When Adm. William Crowe, the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, criticized the gulf war under the first President Bush, Secretary of State James Baker said that the admiral was not qualified to speak on the matter since he no longer had the clearance to read classified reports. If he is not qualified, then no ordinary citizen is. We must simply trust our lords and obey the commander in chief.

The glorification of the president as a war leader is registered in numerous and substantial executive aggrandizements; but it is symbolized in other ways that, while small in themselves, dispose the citizenry to accept those aggrandizements. We are reminded, for instance, of the expanded commander in chief status every time a modern president gets off the White House helicopter and returns the salute of marines.

That is an innovation that was begun by Ronald Reagan. Dwight Eisenhower, a real general, knew that the salute is for the uniform, and as president he was not wearing one. An exchange of salutes was out of order. (George Bush came as close as he could to wearing a uniform while president when he landed on the telegenic aircraft carrier in an Air Force flight jacket).

We used to take pride in civilian leadership of the military under the Constitution, a principle that George Washington embraced when he avoided military symbols at Mount Vernon. We are not led — or were not in the past — by caudillos.

Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan's prescient last book, "Secrecy," traced the ever-faster-growing secrecy of our government and said that it strikes at the very essence of democracy — accountability of representatives to the people. How can the people hold their representatives to account if they are denied knowledge of what they are doing? Wartime and war analogies are embraced because these justify the secrecy. The representative is accountable to citizens. Soldiers are accountable to their officer. The dynamics are different, and to blend them is to undermine the basic principles of our Constitution.

George W. Jetson's Plan For Iraq (LAT)

"We're carrying out a new strategy in Iraq … our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach. In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance for success."

"The military calls its new weapon an 'active denial system,' but that's an understatement. It's a ray gun that shoots a beam that makes people feel as if they are about to catch fire…. 'This is one of the key technologies for the future,' said Marine Col. Kirk Hymes, director of the nonlethal weapons program at Quantico, Va."

Re: Executive Directive on Weapon Development

POTUS very much enjoyed the demonstration today and wanted to thank everyone for their hard work and patriotism. He had some thoughts.

While the ray gun is impressive, POTUS was disappointed that to date it only makes people feel as if they are about to catch fire, and he wants to encourage you to keep working on it until you get it right. He expressed a preference for a ray that turns the target into a glowing red silhouette before making it disintegrate. He also feels the weapon should make a scarier sound.

POTUS was curious about where we are on the invisibility cloak. He pointed out that this was the first project he put into development when he came to the White House and, had it been available earlier, he could have used it to capture SH and OBL personally, saving thousands of lives and the Republican majority. However, he is having second feelings about calling it a cloak, which comes off as evil and French, and has directed that henceforth it be referred to as an invisibility poncho. And he again emphasized that the invisibility poncho be waterproof.

POTUS is frustrated at the continued delays in jet-pack production, a cornerstone in our plan to restore stability to Baghdad. Fix this.

POTUS is also concerned going forward that we continue to consider every possible approach, think outside the envelope, etc. Toward that end, he has designed some weapons systems [see attachment blotter.jpg (1.6 MB)] he feels are pretty cool and provide our best chance for success:

• We have smart bombs; why not smart bullets? They could be trained to tell the difference between Shiites or Sunnis and only shoot the right one, depending on the day.

• Rather than launching missiles into the air, where they are vulnerable to Chinese lasers and birds, why not launch them into the Earth, where they can travel unseen under the ground to their destination? Such UGLMs could also be equipped with a robotic arm, which, upon reaching the target, extends and electrocutes the bad guys before exploding them.

• How hard would it be to mount an automatic machine gun on a gorilla?

• We need a time machine, either based on the POTUS La-Z-Boy design or something more scientific, as long as it's done by Friday. POTUS would like to go back and warn himself about something before it's too late. The machine should be set for Dec. 28, 1963. Never mind why.

Justice Found Unprepared For Crises (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

The Justice Department, hampered by budget shortfalls and high staff turnover, is not prepared to respond quickly to terrorist attacks, hostage incidents, hurricanes and other natural disasters, said a report yesterday by the department's Office of Inspector General.

"Rapid response to critical incidents ... is an essential function of the Department of Justice," Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said in the 70-page report. "Critical incident response is also an integral part of the department's strategy for combating terrorism."

But, Mr. Fine said, the U.S. attorney's offices in the nation's 93 districts -- all of whom are responsible for developing plans to respond to major incidents -- are not adequately prepared to do so.

To improve each office's ability to respond to critical incidents, Mr. Fine said Attorney General Janet Reno directed the department in 1996 to implement the Crisis Management Coordinator (CMC) program, directing each U.S. attorney to designate an assistant U.S. attorney to coordinate development of response plans.

"We found a significant turnover in the CMC position during the nine months from October 2005 to July 2006 -- an annualized rate of 23 percent," Mr. Fine said. "This figure is significantly greater than the 6 percent turnover rate for assistant U.S. attorneys as a whole in 2005."

Mr. Fine said the high turnover rate directly affected the ability of the U.S. attorney offices nationwide to prepare for critical incidents.

According to the report, "factors beyond the control" of the U.S. attorneys affected their ability to respond to critical incidents, including continuing budget shortages that have limited the number of assistant U.S. attorneys on staff.

Mr. Fine said budget shortages over the past four years have come at a time that workloads have continued to increase. As a result, he said, the ability of assistant U.S. attorneys to complete nonprosecutorial functions, such as CMC duties, has been restricted.

Because assistant U.S. attorneys are evaluated on the number of prosecutions and not on CMC activities, Mr. Fine said they have had "less incentive" to focus on critical incident response plans.

He also said that while U.S. attorneys nationwide stepped up training in response to the September 11 attacks, their efforts have fallen off, noting that fewer than half complied with requirements to conduct annual training exercises in 2005 and 2006.

Mr. Fine also said the U.S. attorneys have not consistently completed after-action reports following exercises or actual events, or forwarded the reports to allow for lessons learned to be shared. He said better efforts have to be made to ensure the offices "are actually conducting the requisite activities."

He noted that following the September 11 attacks, the need to respond quickly and effectively to critical incidents was highlighted in both the department's anti-terrorism plan and the Department of Homeland Security's national strategy. He said the quality of that response depends, in large part, on developing and making necessary revisions and conducting "tabletop" or field exercises.

He said that while Justice Department officials had taken "important steps to improve" their preparedness to respond to critical incidents, "several areas remain in need of improvement."

During a major incident, U.S. attorneys nationwide are responsible for having a plan in place to respond. In the event of a critical incident, they are the on-scene legal decision makers for the department, responsible for facilitating coordination with federal, state and local officials.

As part of the review, Mr. Fine made seven recommendations to help the department improve the U.S. attorneys' ability to respond quickly and appropriately to critical incidents, and the department concurred with all of them.

Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys at Justice, said in a Jan. 8 letter attached to the IG's report that the department plans "to resolve and implement solutions" to the audit findings.

Agency's Readiness For Crises Faulted (BLOOM)

By Neil Roland, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — The U. S. Justice Department isn't adequately prepared to respond quickly to terrorist attacks, hurricanes and hostage situations because of budget cuts and staff turnover, an audit by the agency's inspector general found.

While the 93 U. S. attorneys around the nation stepped up training in 2004 in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, their efforts have fallen off, the report said. Fewer than half the offices complied with requirements to conduct annual training exercises in 2005 and 2006, said the report by the office headed by Inspector General Glenn Fine.

The U. S. attorneys are responsible for making on-site legal decisions and coordinating for the department with other federal, state and local officials. Justice Department officials have been lax in supervising the preparations, and some plans have been deficient for years, the 70-page report said.

The Justice Department's efforts "have regressed since June 2005," said the audit, posted Friday on the department's Web site. Agency officials "have not provided the direction and support needed to ensure" proper preparations, it said.

The Justice Department, which oversees the FBI as well as the U. S. attorneys' office, has been criticized by Congress for its responses to the 1993 Branch Davidian standoff in Texas, the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing and various hurricanes. Department officials made "serious mistakes" in the use of deadly force, coordinating between negotiators and attack planners and in collecting evidence, the report said.

The report said 78 of the 93 U. S. attorneys' offices conducted their annual training exercise in 2004. That number fell to 39 in 2004 and rose to only 45 as of November 2006, the report said. Among seven U. S. attorneys' plans that were deficient in 2003, three haven't been corrected or even reviewed, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0123716

Auditors traced the problem to budget cuts for U. S. attorneys since 2003 that have forced them to focus more on prosecutorial duties. Also, turnover among the lawyers responsible for each U. S. attorney's plans has been almost four times that of other lawyers in these offices, the report said.

A Justice Department spokesman didn't immediately respond to a request for comment Friday.

Department officials plan "to resolve and implement solutions to the" audit findings, said Michael Battle, head of the office that oversees the U. S. attorneys, in a Jan. 8 letter appended to the inspector general's report.

Clinton administration Attorney General Janet Reno directed in 1996 that each U. S. attorney's office designate a lawyer to develop a response plan to crises.

U.S. ATTORNEY APPOINTMENTS CALLED POLITICAL

WASHINGTON - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is transforming the ranks of the nation's top federal prosecutors by firing some and appointing conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle who critics say are unlikely to buck Washington.

The newly appointed U.S. attorneys all have impressive legal credentials, but most have few, if any, ties to the communities they've been appointed to serve, and some have had little experience as prosecutors.

The nine recent appointees identified by McClatchy Newspapers held high-level White House or Justice Department jobs, and most were handpicked by Gonzales under a little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act that became law in March.

With Congress now controlled by the Democrats, critics fear that in some cases Gonzales is trying to skirt the need for Senate confirmation by giving new U.S. attorneys interim appointments for indefinite terms.

Some legal scholars contend that the administration pushed for the change in the Patriot Act as part of an ongoing attempt to expand the power of the executive branch, a charge administration officials deny.

Being named a U.S. attorney "has become a prize for doing the bidding of the White House or administration," said Laurie Levenson, a former federal prosecutor.

A Justice Department spokesman called such assessments "reckless."

The appointments have troubled some current and former prosecutors, who worry that the Justice Department is tightening its control over local U.S. attorneys' offices in order to curb the prosecutors' independence.

These lawyers said federal prosecutors too close to the administration might not be willing to pursue important but controversial cases that don't fit the administration's agenda.

The selection of U.S. attorneys has always been a political process.

Traditionally, the top assistant U.S. attorney in each local office temporarily fills any vacancy while home-state senators search for preferred candidates to present to the White House for consideration.

If it takes more than four months to find a permanent successor, a judge can extend the temporary appointment or name another acting U.S. attorney.

Gonzales gained the authority to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms as a result of a change to the Patriot Act that stripped federal judges of their appointment power.

A Justice Department spokesman denied that Gonzales has sought to compromise the independence of U.S. attorneys' offices by appointing political loyalists. In some recent cases Gonzales has followed the traditional process.

"Allegations that politics inappropriately interfere with personnel decisions made about U.S. attorneys are reckless and plainly wrong," said department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

Gonzales and his aides also deny that they're trying to do an end run around the Senate. In a recent letter to two Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard Hertling said the change was sought to avoid conflicts involving federal judges' appointing officials to posts in the executive branch.

Since last March, the administration has named at least nine U.S. attorneys with administration ties. They include:

• Tim Griffin, 37, the U.S. attorney for Arkansas, who was an aide to White House political adviser Karl Rove and a spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

• Rachel Paulose, 33, the U.S. attorney for Minnesota, who served briefly as a counselor to the deputy attorney general and who, says a former boss, has been a member of the secretive, ideologically conservative Federalist Society.

• Jeff Taylor, 42, the U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C., who was an aide to Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch and worked as a counselor to Gonzales and to former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-Executive Of Computer Associates Receives Prison Sentence (NYT/AP)

By Dow Jones/ap

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

A former executive with Computer Associates who pleaded guilty to securities fraud and who prosecutors said was instrumental in the prosecution of the company's former chief executive, Sanjay Kumar, was sentenced to seven months in prison and seven months of home detention.

The executive, Ira Zar, the former chief financial officer, pleaded guilty in 2004 and has cooperated with authorities in the prosecution of Mr. Kumar and the company's former sales chief, Stephen Richards.

Mr. Zar, 45, also pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy and was sentenced by Judge I. Leo Glasser of United States District Court in Brooklyn. He was also ordered to serve two years of supervised release after the completion of his sentence. No fine was imposed and restitution will be determined at a later date.

The company, based in Islandia, N.Y., has since changed its name to CA Inc.

KB Home In Stock-options Investigation (FT)

By Doug Cameron In Chicago

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

KB Home, the fourth-largest US housebuilder, on Friday revealed that US regulators had opend a formal investigation into the stock-options backdating practices that led to the departure of its chief executive last November.

The Los Angeles-based group is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the unfolding options scandal, and the launch of a formal probe by the Securities and Exchange Commission comes as management wrestles with the impact of the slowing housing market.

The SEC launched an informal investigation into KB Home last August, and intensified the probe on January 19, according to the company, which said it was co-operating with regulators.

An internal probe by the company revealed KB Home used "incorrect measurement dates for financial reporting purposes for annual stock option grants during the period 1998-2005". The report led to the departure of Bruce Karatz, who had led the company since its initial public offering, and the dismissal of its chief legal officer, who had helped to set dates for the stock options.

Mr Karatz agreed to repay $13m to the company to cover differences in the stock price, and was replaced by Jeffrey Mezger, KB Home's chief operating officer. The company expects to complete a review of executive compensation practices next month.

The case is one of the few so far that points to the prevalence of improper backdating practices after the passage of Sarbanes-Oxley compliance and audit legislation in 2002. The law was supposed to have made it harder for executives and companies to engage in improper backdating. But the KB Home case appears to show that in some cases it persisted even after the passage of Sarbox.

While backdating is itself not illegal, falsification of company documents to make option award dates appear earlier than originally decided is a breach of securities laws.

More tha 130 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The US Justice department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are also conducting stock-options investigations.

US authorities want to know if executives, possibly with the complicity of compensation committees, auditors and company counsel, deliberately shifted the dates of options grant to dates where the company's share price was at historic lows.

Such a practice would have been designed to take advantage of a subsequent rise in the share price, immediately placing the options "in the money".

Some companies alleged to have engaged in such a practice have been sued by shareholders alleging fraud.

HP, Former VP In A Battle Over Spying Allegations (MERCN)

By Nicole C. Wong

The San Jose Mercury News, January 27, 2007

A run-of-the-mill divorce proceeding has led to allegations of corporate espionage involving Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer giant whose reputation was recently tarnished by a board-spying scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0123718

The Palo Alto computer giant is in an ugly fight against a former executive, Karl Kamb Jr., who has accused HP of having him spy on rival Dell. HP has accused Kamb of stealing HP's trade secrets. The story is complete with allegations of a hired informant, bribery and adultery. Key documents in the case, in federal court in Tyler, Texas, have been sealed and the parties were ordered Thursday by a judge not to speak to the media.

But the saga can be pieced together from documents obtained before Kamb's lawsuit was sealed.

In August 2005, Kamb's wife, as part of divorce proceedings, subpoenaed HP for information about a business Kamb had established on the side while he was employed by the Palo Alto company in Tokyo, HP said in court filings. After investigating, HP sued Kamb in November 2005 for allegedly stealing its trade secrets to start a multimillion-dollar flat-panel television business while he helped launch HP's TV line.

Accusations of spying

Last week, Kamb countersued HP for allegedly spying on him, alleging that HP had impersonated him to retrieve his personal phone records. He claimed that HP instructed him to obtain trade secrets on rival Dell's entry into the printer market.

HP spokesman Ryan Donovan declined to comment Friday beyond what the company said Wednesday, when it called Kamb's suit ``wholly without merit."

A Dell spokesman said: ``We take seriously the allegations that Dell's confidential information might have been obtained by a competitor through improper or unlawful means. We believe in vigorous but fair competition. There is no place for industrial espionage, and if we discover that we have been the victim of that we will consider all appropriate actions in response."

Kamb, who was an HP vice president of business development and strategy until fall 2005, alleged in his lawsuit that HP was concerned about Dell's 2003 entry into the lucrative printer market. In 2002, HP asked him to recruit an informant -- Katsumi Iizuka, who was president of Dell Japan until 1995 -- who could use his connections to obtain detailed information about Dell's products, costs, manufacturers and suppliers. Kamb said he turned that information over to HP.

Kamb said HP used code names in the spying operation on Dell. He included an e-mail in the suit that shows HP picked the names of famous mountains, referring to Dell as ``Everest," Lexmark as ``Whitney" and Sanyo as ``Rushmore."

The HP and Dell e-mails, according to Kamb's suit, suggest Iizuka arranged a dinner meeting in Osaka among four Dell executives and a printer company that Iizuka apparently was representing. The group planned to meet in February 2003 to discuss the launch of Dell's printer business.

Allegation of pretexting

Around Aug. 25, 2005, shortly before Kamb says he was fired, someone working for HP but posing as a T-Mobile employee called him asking for his personal identification number for his T-Mobile account, according to Kamb's suit. He refused but later found out HP had obtained his T-Mobile and Sprint phone records by using the Social Security number and billing address listed in his personnel file, he said.

Kamb's lawyer sent a letter in August 2005 to Kevin Hunsaker, HP's then-senior counsel, asking that HP stop pretexting him.

Hunsaker, who left HP last fall after pretexting surfaced in the board-spy scandal, replied in a September 2005 letter that ``no representatives of HP were involved in any of the alleged activity described in your letter."

HP's lawsuit portrays Kamb as the bad guy.

HP said in its lawsuit that Kamb was the ``ring leader" of ``a multimillion-dollar swindle" involving several other former high-level HP employees.

HP alleged that in late 2002 or early 2003, Kamb and other high-level HP executives, who were asked to find and develop new consumer electronic products for HP to sell, ``began formulating a scheme to establish their own consumer electronics enterprise," called byd:sign. They allegedly discussed their plans using HP computers and e-mail accounts.

Trade secrets

Around August 2003, HP's suit said, Kamb implied he would leave HP, so to keep him the company gave him a raise and greater responsibilities, which also gave him greater access to HP's research and development.

HP alleged that by June 2003 Kamb and his partners had developed a prototype LCD television and finalized their plans to sell them through byd:sign, using HP trade secrets and other confidential information.

HP said Kamb's ``surreptitious looting" of corporate opportunities might have continued undetected if Kamb ``had not been as disloyal and deceptive in his personal life as he was professionally."

According to HP, Kamb's wife filed for divorce around September 2004 in part for ``discord or conflict of personalities" and ``adultery."

After HP started contacting Kamb and his HP recruits in August 2005, ``they attempted to erase all evidence of their wrongdoing by permanently and irretrievably deleting information off of their HP computers," HP's suit alleged. Through the use of forensic data specialists, HP said it was able to retrieve and reconstitute some e-mails, instant messages and files, which show they ``continued scheming and planning their venture through the fall of 2003 and beyond'' while many still worked for HP.

Spokesmen for the California Attorney General's Office and the U.S. Justice Department declined to comment on whether they are looking into allegations raised by these lawsuits.

Intellectual property and trade secret attorneys said if Kamb's allegations are true, HP could plunge back into troubles with ethics.

Kamb's suit suggests ``an official policy to almost engage in CIA-type espionage of trade secrets,'' said Bradford Newman, a Palo Alto law partner who specializes in trade secret misappropriation, when told about the allegations.

Karen Kimmey, a San Francisco partner who specializes in intellectual property, said these new allegations are reminiscent of the spying on board members, employees and journalists that the company admitted to last fall.

``It has a very similar feel to the spying and overall ethical questions that have been raised, at least in the public's mind,'' Kimmey said. ``It's going to sound like more of the same.''

Nacchio Prosecutors Scolded (AP)

By Sandy Shore, Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

Judge wants evidence turned over to defense

DENVER — With a stern reminder that Joe Nacchio's trial is just weeks away, a federal judge ordered prosecutors Friday to step up efforts to provide some key evidence to the former Qwest chief executive's attorneys.

U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham set deadlines for evidence to be turned over and told attorneys to file status reports by Feb. 6.

"This case is going to be tried on March 19, folks," Nottingham said.

Nacchio, who is free on bail, is accused of selling $101 million worth of stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets.

Nacchio is charged with 42 counts, each carrying a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine, and has pleaded not guilty.

At issue in Friday's hearing was evidence that could be deemed favorable to Nacchio, which prosecutors are required by law to provide the defense.

Nacchio's attorneys have contended government attorneys have been slow to deliver some evidence, citing a report on a witness delivered two months after the interview was conducted.

"It's the witness interviews that are of concern," Nacchio attorney John Richiliano said. "It's just a very, very serious issue now."

Prosecutor Cliff Stricklin said government attorneys are still interviewing witnesses. "We're doing the best we can," he said.

Another problem stems from classified documents that defense attorneys say they need. Prosecutors said the evidence-exchange process had been slowed because some of the documents fall under the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets guidelines for viewing secret government documents.

Prosecutors said they must coordinate the documents with federal agencies that are involved.

Defense lawyers have said Nacchio believed Qwest would get hundreds of millions of dollars worth of classified government contracts that gave him hope for the company's financial future.

The Classified Information Procedures Act was enacted several decades ago to counter a strategy used by defendants charged with spying who would threaten to expose national secrets unless the charges were dropped.

In order to view the contracts and determine their relevance at trial, attorneys for both sides and the judge received Justice Department security clearances.

Separately, Nacchio also is one of several former Qwest executives accused by the Securities and Exchange Commission in a civil case alleging they orchestrated a financial fraud that forced the company to restate billions of dollars in revenue. That case is pending.

Experts say Nacchio's legal fees in both the civil and criminal cases could hit a combined $75 million, based on other high-profile corporate executive trials, The Denver Post reported Friday. Qwest bylaws require the company to pay those expenses, company spokesman Bob Toevs told the newspaper.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Will Rove Testify? (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, January 26, 2007

White House anxiety is mounting over the prospect that top officials—including deputy chief of staff Karl Rove and counselor Dan Bartlett-may be forced to provide potentially awkward testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis (Scooter) Libby.

Both Rove and Bartlett have already received trial subpoenas from Libby's defense lawyers, according to lawyers close to the case who asked not to be identified talking about sensitive matters. While that is no guarantee they will be called, the odds increased this week after Libby's lawyer, Ted Wells, laid out a defense resting on the idea that his client, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, had been made a "scapegoat" to protect Rove. Cheney is expected to provide the most crucial testimony to back up Wells's assertion, one of the lawyers close to the case said. The vice president personally penned an October 2003 note in which he wrote, "Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the other." The note, read aloud in court by Wells, implied that Libby was the one being sacrificed in an effort to clear Rove of any role in leaking the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame, wife of Iraq war critic Joe Wilson. "Wow, for all the talk about this being a White House that prides itself on loyalty and discipline, you're not seeing much of it," the lawyer said.

Libby is charged with lying about when and from whom he learned about Plame during the spring and early summer of 2003, a time when the White House was working to discredit Wilson. A former U.S. ambassador, Wilson was dispatched to Niger to investigate reports that Iraq was seeking to purchase uranium from Africa. Wilson said he told U.S. officials there was nothing to those reports. But the president later used the claim anyway in his 2003 State of the Union address, prompting Wilson to charge the administration had manipulated the intelligence about Iraq. The week after he went public, journalist Robert Novak first reported that Wilson's wife, Plame, worked for the CIA—a disclosure that prompted allegations that administration officials had "outed her" in retaliation for Wilson's criticism.

The possibility that Rove could be called to testify would bring his own role into sharper focus—and could prove important to Libby's lawyers for several reasons. Rove has said in secret testimony that, during a chat on July 11, 2003, Libby told him he learned about Plame's employment at the CIA from NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert, a legal source who asked not to be identified talking about grand jury matters told NEWSWEEK. If Rove repeats that story on the witness stand, it could back up Libby's core assertion that he honestly, if mistakenly, thought he had heard about Wilson's wife from the "Meet the Press" host—even though Russert denies he knew anything about Plame, and more than a half-dozen officials (including Cheney) have said they passed along the same information to Libby earlier than that.

But the Rove account could cut in other ways. Fitzgerald would likely argue that Libby's comment to Rove merely shows that the vice president's top aide "was even lying inside the White House," according to the legal source. Moreover, Rove is likely not eager to recount the story either. The reason? He would have to acknowledge that shortly after he had the chat with Libby, he went back to his office and had a phone conversation with Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper in which he also disclosed the fact that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. The disclosure was potentially illegal since, at the time, Plame was employed in the Directorate of Operations, the agency's covert arm. (There is no evidence that Rove or anybody else knew Plame's status at the time—and Rove has never been charged with any crime—but the possibility that White House officials were leaking classified information in an effort to discredit Wilson is what triggered the probe in the first place.)

An equally embarrassing conflict could emerge next week when former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer takes the stand. Fleischer has been one of the most mysterious figures in the case, making virtually no public comments about it since he left the White House in July 2003. In the past he has insisted he wasn't even represented by a lawyer. But it emerged during court arguments this week that Fleischer originally invoked his Fifth Amendment privileges to avoid testifying and then only agreed to do so after he was given an immunity deal by Fitzgerald—an arrangement that normally requires extensive bargaining among attorneys. Fleischer's testimony is critical to Fitzgerald's case: as the prosecutor laid out this week in his opening statement, Fleischer has said that Libby told him over a White House lunch on July 7, 2003, that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and made a point of describing this information as "hush and hush." Fitzgerald used that account to undercut Libby's grand-jury assertion that he was surprised and "taken aback" just three or four days later when, he claims, Russert told him about Wilson's wife. "You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you're giving out Monday and Tuesday of the same week," Fitzgerald said. Fleischer has also testified that Bartlett also later told him about Wilson's wife and, after hearing it from both Libby and Bartlett, the then-White House press secretary disclosed the information to NBC reporter David Gregory.

On its face, Fleischer's account seems to contradict the repeated public assertions of his immediate successor, Scott McClellan, in October 2003 that nobody at the White House was in any way involved in the leak of Plame's identity. It also potentially puts Bartlett, one of the president's senior and most trusted advisers, on the hot seat. If Bartlett backs up Fleischer, it suggests he himself played a role in passing along radioactive information that triggered a criminal investigation that has plagued the White House for more than four years. If he contradicts Fleischer, it raises questions about the credibility of a man who was President Bush's chief spokesman for the first two and a half years of his presidency. His lawyer declined to comment on what Bartlett will say.

But either way, it's not a scenario that anybody at the White House can be looking forward to.

Bush Adviser Rove Subpoenaed For Libby Trial (CNN)

CNN.com, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Two of President Bush's top advisers have been subpoenaed as possible witnesses in the trial of former White House aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a legal source familiar with the case told CNN on Friday.

It remains unclear whether either of the aides -- Karl Rove and Dan Bartlett -- will actually be called to the stand.

Libby is charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury investigating who leaked a CIA employee's identity to reporters in 2003. (Read full story)

Rove, Bush's longtime political confidant, serves as deputy chief of staff at the White House; Bartlett is a counselor to the president and the former White House communications director.

Rove and Bartlett are on a list of possible defense witnesses that includes Vice President Dick Cheney, his current chief of staff, David Addington, and a number of journalists and current and former White House officials.

Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, is fighting charges of perjury and obstruction of justice with a defense strategy that includes portraying him as someone thrown into a "meat grinder" to protect Rove.

Prosecutors are trying to portray Libby as someone who used lies and deception in his high-ranking position at the White House to try to discredit an open critic of the Bush prewar justification to invade Iraq.Inner workings of White House exposed

The first week in the trial brought a sometimes harsh light to the inner workings of the White House and other federal agencies.

On Thursday, a former top press aide to Cheney, Cathie Martin, who now is an aide to Bush, testified she was excluded from high-level talks to decide how to respond to the media during a controversy over Bush's 2003 State of the Union address.

In the speech, Bush claimed Iraq was trying to buy uranium from the African nation of Niger. Martin said Libby attended the meeting.

The uranium claim was challenged by a former ambassador, Joe Wilson, who in the months before the Iraq war, had made a fact-finding trip to Niger at the request of the CIA, where his wife worked on matters regarding weapons of mass destruction, according to court testimony. (Read full story)

Witnesses have testified Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame Wilson, apparently organized the trip, and interest in the results had been expressed by the Office of the Vice President, the State Department and the Department of Defense.

But at least initially, none of those offices apparently had much knowledge of Wilson's trip nor who arranged it, according to the testimony thus far.

Prosecution witnesses from the CIA and the State Department testified that they or their staff members tracked down details of the mission at Libby's request, and that the push to do so came at the time the former ambassador had questioned the Bush argument for going to war in Iraq.

The criminal case began with an investigation of how Valerie Wilson became widely known among journalists as being an operative of the CIA. It would be illegal to disclose the covert or classified status of such an employee.

No one has been charged with leaking her name, employment status or other classified material.

Libby is the only person to face any charges in connection with the case. He resigned his position at the White House in 2005 on the day he was indicted.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has said he continues to explore for wrongdoing, including whether Valerie Wilson's cover was blown in retaliation for her husband's public criticism of the president.Who told Libby is key to prosecution

Central to the Libby trial is whether he learned of Valerie Wilson's employment from reporters or from inside government. (Watch how the timeline is a key to the trial)

Libby has said that he first got the information from NBC reporter Tim Russert. His lawyers blame bad memory for any discrepancies in what he told investigators and a grand jury, and say he may have been distracted by urgent national security matters.

Martin, Cheney's former spokeswoman, testified Thursday that she had told Libby that Joseph Wilson is "married to a CIA agent" days before the date Libby claims he learned that information from Russert.

DOJ_NMG_0123722

She also described feeling blamed for how the White House handled a different query about the controversial Iraq-uranium assertion in the State of the Union address. The query, by television reporter Andrea Mitchell, had been handled by Libby.

Martin testified, "I was aggravated that Scooter was calling the reporters and I wasn't" during White House efforts to handle the story.

Martin is one of four witnesses for the prosecution who have testified in the first three days of the trial, which is expected to last more than a month. The judge and jury will not hear the case on Fridays.

After the defense and prosecution conclude with Martin on Monday, the next witness is expected to be former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer.

He appeared at the courthouse Thursday after defense attorney Ted Wells complained he needed more time to examine Martin's original handwritten notes she made during the uranium controversy.

There was some talk of instead taking the next prosecution witness and delaying Martin's testimony, and soon after, reporters spotted Fleischer's arrival.

Prosecutor Fitzgerald acknowledged that Wells had been given the Martin notes only a few hours before Martin was to take the stand, but he disputed whether the earlier copies were of poor quality.

"That's a bit of spin," Fitzgerald said of the complaint from Wells, and suggested he didn't believe the defense team's "notion of sitting on it a year with illegible copies."

Judge Reggie Walton, his voice rising, chided Fitzgerald and loudly said, "If he's lying, I'll punish him for it," referring to the Wells complaint.

Martin was called to the stand after Fitzgerald said only a handful of the notes would be introduced as evidence. Fleischer, who had been waiting with counsel in a holding room, departed. His appearance is now set for Monday.

Cheney Led Effort To Discredit Iraq Critic Wilson: Testimony (AFP)

AFP, January 27, 2007

A White House aide testified in court Thursday that Vice President Dick Cheney personally led the 2003 effort to discredit Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson.

Deputy White House communications director Cathie Martin was giving evidence in the politically sensitive perjury trial of former top White House aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

The prosecution has charged Libby, who was Cheney's chief of staff, with obstructing the investigation by lying about when he learned the name of Wilson's wife, Central Intelligence Agency spy Valerie Plame.

Prosecutors opened a leak probe after Plame's name appeared in the press in 2003. Revealing a CIA agent's identity can be a federal crime, although Libby is not accused of leaking Plame's name.

President George W. Bush's critics charge senior officials deliberately blew Plame's cover to punish Wilson for accusing the administration of exaggerating the threat posed by Iraq to justify an invasion.

Libby, 56, denies the charges. He could face 30 years in jail if convicted.

Martin, who in 2003 was a spokewsoman for Cheney, testified that the vice president ordered her to monitor all print and television news reports on Wilson after the former ambassador went public with his criticism.

"The vice president told me to keep track of this story," and press aides immediately "began monitoring television commentators" in addition to print reports about Wilson, she said.

Martin also testified that she clearly remembered telling both Cheney and Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA days before Libby said he first learned of it.

Martin also became the fourth US official to testify that Libby knew about Plame before he talked to a prominent television reporter on July 10, 2003, as he had maintained under oath.

Some 80 possible witnesses are listed for the trial, including Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, former White House chief of staff Andrew Card, top national security officials and more than two dozen of the capital's leading journalists.

The trial is set to resume Monday with testimony from former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer.

Libby's lawyer argued on Tuesday that his client was being made a scapegoat to save the real mastermind -- Bush's political guru Karl Rove.

"Scooter Libby was being sacrificed; Karl Rove was to be protected," attorney Ted Wells said.

Wells called Rove "the lifeblood of the Republican Party," and said that Bush aides needed to protect him at all costs.

In his book "Plan of Attack," an account of preparations for the Iraq invasion, Washington Post journalist Bob Woodward described Libby as part of the White House inner circle that played a role in virtually every major decision.

Libby Lawyers Target Fleischer's Immunity (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

Attorneys for former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr. want more information about an unusual immunity-from-prosecution deal that government lawyers gave former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer in the CIA leak case.

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald says that in early 2004, as his investigation was heating up into who revealed CIA operative Valerie Plame's name to reporters, Mr. Fleischer stepped forward with an offer to prosecutors: Promise no prosecution and he would help their case.

Mr. Fleischer acknowledged being one of the leakers, but he wouldn't say a word without a promise of immunity.

Prosecutors normally insist on an informal account of what a witness will say before agreeing to such a deal. It's known in legal circles as a proffer, and Mr. Fitzgerald said Thursday that he never got one from Mr. Fleischer, who was chief White House spokesman for the first 21/2 years of President Bush's first term.

"I didn't want to give him immunity. I did so reluctantly," Mr. Fitzgerald said in court Thursday. "I was buying a pig in a poke."

Defense attorneys are skeptical. Mr. Fleischer is expected to testify Monday against Mr. Libby, who is accused of lying and obstructing Mr. Fitzgerald's investigation. Defense attorneys are preparing court documents demanding to know exactly what Mr. Fleischer promised in exchange for immunity.

"I'm not sure we're getting the full story here," defense attorney William Jeffress said in court.

Once the deal was struck in February 2004, Mr. Fleischer revealed that he had discussed Mrs. Plame with reporters in July 2003, days before leaving his job at the White House. He also said he learned about Mrs. Plame from Mr. Libby, who was the chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

Mr. Fleischer's testimony is significant because he says he talked to Mr. Libby about Mrs. Plame days before Mr. Libby told the FBI he was surprised to learn it from a reporter.

Mr. Libby's attorneys want details about Mr. Fleischer's agreement to cast the defendant as someone who's pointing fingers to protect himself. Mr. Fitzgerald says he doesn't have to disclose his conversations with Mr. Fleischer because they weren't about specific testimony.

"It wasn't as if someone said, 'Here's what I can give you about Mr. Libby. Is that good enough? You know, will that give us immunity?' " Mr. Fitzgerald said. "That wasn't it."

The deal he made was unusual enough that Mr. Libby's defense lawyers questioned whether it could be true. They suggested that Mr. Fitzgerald got a secret summary of Mr. Fleischer's testimony -- a deal they want to discuss with jurors when Mr. Fleischer takes the stand.

Defense attorneys said they will ask U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to force Mr. Fitzgerald to reveal what Mr. Fleischer promised him. Mr. Fitzgerald told Judge Walton that no promises were made.

"We got no specifics," he said.

New Prosecution Team Takes On Duke Case (WP)

By Sylvia Adcock, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Lawyers Examine Evidence Amid Media Glare

RALEIGH, N.C. -- Six boxes and two file folders were transferred to the state attorney general's office near Capital Square here last week, and with them comes a shift in a case that has transfixed the nation.

The boxes and files contain the sum total of evidence against three former Duke University lacrosse players charged with sexually assaulting an escort service dancer at an off-campus team party last spring. In the recent months, the actions of the previous prosecutor, Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong, have taken center stage. But now that Nifong has asked to be relieved while he faced charges from the North Carolina Bar Association, including withholding evidence from defense lawyers, the focus of the case shifts to state Attorney General Roy Cooper and the two prosecutors he has chosen to evaluate the evidence.

Pressure on them will be enormous. An intense publicity campaign this month painted a sympathetic picture of the players, in Newsweek and on "60 Minutes." And the NAACP held a news conference here last week to call on prosecutors to take into account the accuser's version of events, saying it was aware of "the impact that this case can have on chilling the rights of women, particularly African Americans, to file criminal complaints of sexual violence and exploitation." The three players are white and the accuser is black, and witnesses have reportedly said they heard racist comments when the woman was leaving the house last March 13.

DOJ_NMG_0123724

Cooper and the new prosecutors -- James J. Coman and Mary D. Winstead -- declined to be interviewed. But those who know them and who have watched the case closely say the new team is not one to cave under pressure.

"I think people may be surprised," said Irving Joyner, a law professor at North Carolina Central University who has been monitoring the case for the NAACP. "They are not going to bow to public sentiment."

The transfer of the case came after some of the state's evidence appeared to unravel: In December, the director of a DNA lab testified that he and Nifong had decided to omit information showing the presence of DNA from multiple males on the accuser's vaginal and rectal swabs. Nifong dropped first-degree rape charges last month after the accuser said she was no longer certain if she had been penetrated by a penis. The three still face sexual assault and kidnapping charges that carry equally stiff sentences.

The two prosecutors Cooper chose to take on the case -- Coman and Winstead -- are part of a six-lawyer special prosecutions team that handles cases in which the county prosecutor has a conflict of interest or an appearance of one. "The reputation of that office is one of high confidence," said Stephen T. Smith, a Raleigh defense attorney. "They fight hard, and they fight fair."

Spencer Barrow, a Raleigh lawyer who went to law school with Coman and is a close friend, said Coman's first job out of law school was as the police department's attorney in Greensboro, N.C., and he quickly moved on to the prosecutor's office. He later joined the attorney general's office and was the director of the State Bureau of Investigation from 1993 until 1999.

"He's very tenacious, and he has a tremendous amount of integrity," Barrow said. "He is not going to make decisions based on publicity."

In 2004 he prosecuted the second trial of Alan Gell, on death row for a 1995 murder, after it was revealed that the original prosecutors in the state attorney general's office had withheld evidence helpful to the defense. In the second trial, Gell was acquitted and set free after nine years behind bars.

"His experience with the Gell case shows that he doesn't dismiss a case unless the evidence for innocence is extremely strong," said Joe Kennedy, a law professor at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

When the original prosecutors were taken before the state bar for their actions, Coman testified on their behalf and said the evidence -- a taped conversation in which a star witness said she had to make up a story for the police -- was not wrongfully withheld. His comments touched off a furor among defense attorneys, and Coman later said his comments were incorrect. The issue involved an interpretation of case law, and "it was an issue good minds could disagree on," said James B. Maxwell, who represented the original prosecutors in the bar proceedings.

Winstead, like Coman, is a career prosecutor. She began her career in the Wake County District Attorney's Office in Raleigh, and worked for Nifong in the Durham DA's office from 1987 until 1994 before joining the attorney general's office.

"I've known her since she was a child, and I've tried many cases with her in the DA's office in Raleigh," said longtime Raleigh lawyer Earle Purser.

"She's undoubtedly one of the most honest, straightforward lawyers I have ever seen. She can be tough, but legitimately tough."

Joyner said Winstead is "aggressive and zealous on the side of the prosecution. . . . She's no-nonsense. She gets right down to the bone and doesn't lose a lot of time on the fat."

Winstead's family is well-known to local lawyers and politicians; they run a downtown restaurant called the Mecca, where the red countertops and black-and-white floor tiles have not changed in decades. Wade Smith -- who represents Duke defendant Collin Finnerty -- is a regular and once attributed his longevity to frequent servings of black-eyed peas and rice at the Mecca.

On a day-to-day basis, Winstead and Coman will be handling the sexual assault case, advising Cooper of their progress. In coming weeks they will be examining each piece of paper in the boxes and files, first making sure it has been turned over to the defense attorneys. They also plan to hold meetings with the defense teams -- separate meetings for each of the three former lacrosse players.

"They have an obligation to look at all the evidence -- including the accuser's version of events," said one Raleigh lawyer who asked not to be identified.

Said Kennedy, "The very first action they take will be so closely scrutinized, I would expect them to take their time examining the facts."

Judge Proposes Secrecy For Columbine Depositions (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123725

DENVER, Jan. 26 (AP) — A federal judge has proposed keeping secret for 25 years the sworn statements made by the parents of the Columbine High School gunmen for a civil lawsuit settled more than three years ago.

The judge, Lewis T. Babcock of Federal District Court, suggested the plan on Friday to settle a dispute over whether the depositions should be destroyed. Chief Judge Babcock's proposal calls for them to be turned over to the National Archives and Records Administration. It was not immediately clear what would happen to them after 25 years.

The judge asked the parties in the dispute to respond to his proposal within two weeks.

The parents of the Columbine gunmen, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, gave the statements in 2003 for a civil lawsuit filed by families of victims of the April 1999 shooting near Littleton. Mr. Harris, 18, and Mr. Klebold, 17, killed 12 fellow students and a teacher before taking their own lives.

After the suit was settled, a magistrate ordered the depositions destroyed, but victims' families and others argued that the material had historical value and could contain lessons to prevent school shootings.

Brian Rohrbough, whose son, Daniel, 15, was among those killed, objected to the judge's plan. Mr. Rohrbough said that the public had a right to know, but that the government seemed to think the release of such information was "somehow going to unravel American society."

Frank Patterson, a lawyer for the Klebolds, said the depositions contained no new material.

Judge Babcock also issued an order to destroy digital copies of audiotapes and videotapes in which the gunmen discussed their attack plan. The original tapes are in the Jefferson County sheriff's custody.

Judge: Seal Columbine Papers For 25 Years (DENP)

By Howard Pankratz, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 27, 2007

The depositions that the parents of Columbine killers gave in connection with the myriad of lawsuits surrounding the April 20, 1999 massacre should be sent to the National Archives where they'd be kept under seal for at least two decades, a U.S. District Court judge suggested in Denver today.

"There would be no access to these records for 25 years by anyone," chief judge Lewis Babcock told parties who are fighting to unseal the depositions or have them reviewed by experts in hopes their contents can prevent similar school shootings.

In 2002, the parents of Columbine killer Eric Harris gave more than 16 hours of depositions in connection with a lawsuit by Columbine survivor Mark Taylor against Solvay Pharmaceuticals, maker of Luvox.

Taylor claimed that Luvox, an anti-depressant, made Harris homicidal and suicidal. However, Taylor dropped the lawsuit in February 2003 after Solvay agreed to contribute $10,000 to the American Cancer Society.

The other depositions of Harris' parents and the parents of Dylan Klebold took place over a four-day period in August 2003 in connection with a lawsuit filed by the families of five slain Columbine students. But, like the Solvay lawsuit depositions, the depositions were sealed when those families reached a settlement with the Harris and Klebold families.

The depositions have since been sitting in a highly secured evidence room at the federal courthouse awaiting a decision by Babcock about what should be done with them.

Although the families of the five slain students agreed that the depositions be kept confidential as a condition of the settlement, they believe society would be served if the settlements were made public.

Bruce Jones, the lawyer representing Mark Taylor, said that Taylor doesn't want the depositions destroyed or sealed in such a way that they'd be inaccessible to experts.

After 25 years, the National Archives would decide if the depositions are of significant social value and could release them to the public. Otherwise, they'd be destroyed, according to evidence presented at today's hearing.

Babcock said he wouldn't make a final decision until all sides had an opportunity to file written responses with him. He gave the parties a two-week deadline to file motions.

The Colorado attorney General's Office has suggested that the depositions be sent to the Colorado State Archives where a youth-violence expert could review them and issue a public report.

Endorsements-for-sale Probe Derailed (BUFFNEWS)

By ROBERT J. McCARTHY, News Political Reporter

FBI investigation targeted Independence Party chief

DOJ_NMG_0123726

The secretary of the Erie County Independence Party says he wore a wire and allowed his telephone to be tapped last year during an FBI investigation into the alleged sale of political endorsements by party Chairman Anthony L. Orsini.

But Louis P. Corrigan said the probe ended after Justice Department officials in Washington declared that the federal government lacks jurisdiction to prosecute a practice they call "slating."

Neither the FBI nor federal prosecutors would address Corrigan's claim about an investigation. But U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn said his staff reached out to the Office of Public Integrity in Washington to determine if a party official - as opposed to a public official - could be criminally charged for taking money in exchange for an endorsement.

"We were told that, since the 1970s, it's been Department of Justice policy that we do not prosecute cases where a candidate pays money to be put on a slate," Flynn said.

Corrigan, however, said he played undercover agent for much of 2006, cooperating in a probe he hoped would weed out corruption from at least a part of local politics.

"I carried a wire for the FBI all last year," Corrigan said, adding that federal agents also tapped his phone to determine whom they would target in a probe they expected to be wide-ranging.

He said federal investigators became especially interested after he talked to two potential candidates while wearing a small transmitter in his shirt pocket.

Corrigan would not reveal the names of either of the people he recorded. But after The Buffalo News independently determined that one of them was Jeffrey A. Bono, a longtime Democratic operative who unsuccessfully ran for the Assembly last May, Corrigan acknowledged that he taped Bono's conversation in the Olympic Restaurant near Buffalo Niagara International Airport last April.

He taped one other person whom he would not name, but said that person refused to give Orsini any money.

Corrigan said Bono told him he paid Orsini $2,000 in cash for the Independence endorsement. He also asked Bono to sign a document detailing the conversation that was secretly taped, which Bono acknowledged he did in an attempt to reverse the endorsement that went to Republican Michael Cole.

"I felt double-crossed by Tony and was in the heat of campaign anger," Bono said. "He had promised me the endorsement over and over again. But when the time came, he told me, "I have to go with a winner.' "

But Bono disputes the way Corrigan reads all of the document he signed.

"I didn't really like the way the thing was worded," Bono said. "But then I figured, yes, I did give him $2,000. But it was never $2,000 [in one payment]. Whenever there was a fundraiser, I bought a large ticket."

Bono, who did not know he was recorded by FBI microphones until informed by The News, said Corrigan was "pushy" about him signing the document that he said vaguely summarized the conversation.

"If the FBI was pushing him that way, I understand it now," he said. "It was a real dumb mistake."

Asked why his campaign finance reports filed with the State Board of Elections show no payments to either Orsini or the Independence Party, Bono said he filed several as reimbursements from petty cash.

But none of Bono's petty cash reimbursements list payments to either Orsini's personal committee or to the party.

Orsini, meanwhile, said the only money he ever received from Bono was through checks submitted by Democratic congressional candidate Jack Davis, for whom Bono was working at the time.

"Jeff Bono never gave me a dime," he said.

Orsini filed no campaign finance reports with the Board of Elections for the second half of 2006, a violation of election law.

Corrigan said the FBI was excited about the information it expected to glean from wired conversations and tapped telephones. But before the investigation kicked into high gear, Washington officials nixed it in late 2006 because they found nothing in federal law that made the practice illegal.

"The FBI didn't want to give up, but they were ordered off," Corrigan said. "They were very disappointed. The agent was in Washington for a week arguing with the attorney general's staff. It wasn't the FBI that wanted to quit."

Flynn said the public often fails to understand the limits of federal jurisdiction in corruption cases and that most are prosecuted in state and local courts. He said federal prosecutors cannot present a case to a grand jury without solid footing.

A Republican, Flynn acknowledged that he and Orsini discussed him serving as election lawyer for the Independence Party in 2004, before he became U.S. attorney. He said the conversation was between a private attorney seeking business and a potential client, but neither Orsini nor the party ever became his client.

"I was never paid to do legal work or give legal advice," he said. "Like any private lawyer, you seek business."

He emphasized that the decision to drop the Orsini probe in 2006 stemmed not from the 2004 conversation, but from Justice Department concern over a lack of jurisdiction.

DOJ_NMG_0123727

Orsini, who as Independence chairman can wield significant political power in Erie County, said he had no idea he was under FBI scrutiny. But he said the fact that the agency refused to advance the investigation proves there should be no question about his activities.

"The bottom line is there was nothing illegal," he said, blaming the entire episode on dissident Independence members who have unsuccessfully attempted to challenge him.

Corrigan, meanwhile, explained the FBI approached him and he cooperated after failing to elicit interest in Orsini from either the Erie County district attorney or the state attorney general. He said he believes others also cooperated with the FBI investigation.

Corrigan said the FBI remains interested in the Independence Party and maintains communication with him. Its interest follows an extensive probe in which agents assigned him a code name and tapped the phone in his bedroom to monitor certain calls, he said.

He was in the midst of arranging a meeting to be recorded, he said, when the FBI pulled out of the probe.

In addition, Corrigan said the FBI secretly photographed dozens of politicians attending a 2006 fundraiser for Orsini's personal committee. "Tony held a big fundraiser, and they were outside - hidden or whatever - taking pictures of everyone they didn't know," Corrigan said. "They brought the pictures to me to identify some of the people and to ask what their connection was."

Corrigan, 71, is a retired engineer and Mensa member who has been active in minor parties for decades. For the past year, he has waged a vicious battle with Orsini over his tactics as chairman of the party, which occupies the third line on the general election ballot and often proves crucial in determining close elections.

The Independence Party has forged a close alliance with the Erie County Democratic Party in recent years that when combined with the Democrats' enrollment advantage of 144,000 over Republicans, has helped notch a string of Democratic successes at the polls.

Orsini and Corrigan have been at odds for some time, including some court battles over disputed Independence Party votes.

Against the backdrop of that public feud, Corrigan said federal agents wanted to determine if the party endorsement could be bought and how Orsini might be involved.

Utah, N.C. Prosecutors Find No Crimes Committed With "Hounddog" (AP)

By GARY D. ROBERTSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2007

Prosecutors in two states said Friday they found nothing illegal about a movie shot in North Carolina and screened this week at Utah's Sundance Film Festival that depicts a child rape, and instead said "Hounddog" offered viewers a "good message" about child sexual abuse.

The movie has troubled some Christians, who have called for a federal investigation into whether the movie breaks federal anti-pornography laws. A state lawmaker in North Carolina also said he is drafting legislation that would require the state approve the script of any television or movie production seeking a state tax break.

But Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff, who watched the movie this week with his state's child sexual exploitation law in hand, said his concerns didn't materialize on the screen.

"None of the things on the Internet that people were saying about it were true," Shurtleff said. "Not only does it not violate the statute, I think it's a good message for people on the subject."

The opinion is shared by the district attorneys in the two North Carolina counties where "Hounddog" was filmed last summer.

Rex Gore, the Brunswick County district attorney, said prosecutors reviewed the movie in November and interviewed crew members, producers and star Dakota Fanning. The movie includes a scene depicting the rape of a 9-year-old child played the 12-year-old actress.

"I am aware that there is an outcry from some who find the content of the film disturbing and distasteful," Gore said in a statement. "However, public opinion is not the test we must apply as prosecutors; we must apply the law."

Gore said there no evidence that the scene constituted "sexual activity" under North Carolina law, so child exploitation didn't occur. Even if there was simulated sexual activity, Gore said it doesn't cross the line into obscenity so long as the film has serious artistic value or is protected speech.

The rape scene lasts a few minutes, but is not graphic. There is no nudity, the scene is very darkly lit and only Fanning's face and hand are shown.

"Hounddog" is the story of Lewellen, a free-spirit obsessed with Elvis Presley in the 1960s South who is raped by a teenager. Fanning said this week at Sundance that the rape scene isn't the focus of the movie. "It's not really happening," Fanning said. "It's a movie, and it's called acting. I'm not going through anything."

The Christian Film and Television Commission and its chairman, movieguide.org publisher Ted Baehr, had claimed "Hounddog" breaks federal child-pornography law because it "appears" to show minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct. The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights also asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate.

That outcry led state Sen. Phil Berger, R-Rockingham, to begin work on legislation that would require any film seeking North Carolina's 15 percent tax credit for television and movies to receive script approval from the state. Berger said the state should ensure its citizens aren't subsidizing what many may consider inappropriate.

It's an idea flatly rejected by those in the industry.

"Government review of any kind of speech is anathema to the fundamental tenets of American democracy and must be rejected," said Jody Frisch, spokeswoman for the Writers Guild of America.

The department that oversees the North Carolina Film Office said this week it had no information on whether the producers of "Hounddog" had received or would seek the credits.

The South Carolina Film Commission asks for a script as a part of its tax break application, along with the film's budget and production schedule. But Commissioner Jeff Monks said the office looks at the script largely to determine whether the application makes good business sense, not to check for offensive content.

For the past two decades, North Carolina has ranked as the third busiest state for filmmaking, behind California and New York. But state officials have worried recently about tax incentives offered elsewhere. And Monks suggested tinkering with its film incentives could hurt North Carolina's ability to bring projects to the state.

"There are 300 film commissions worldwide all competing for about 500 films a year," he said. "The competition has never been greater for the industry."

Mayor Says City Is Making Progress Against Violent Crime (AP)

By Mary Foster, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Two weeks after thousands marched on City Hall to protest violent crime, city officials gathered there again Friday to provide an update on their latest crime fighting efforts, including increased use of remote cameras, beefed up patrols and traffic checkpoints.

The city has identified 20 crime "hot spots" were cameras will be placed, adding to 50 already operating, Mayor Ray Nagin said. There will also be cameras providing coverage along St. Charles Avenue for next month's Mardi Gras parades, Nagin said.

The cameras are not monitored, they can, however, provide evidence for investigations since the images they record are kept in a computer.

Police have begun regular patrols in three districts, superintendent Warren Riley said. And at least one officer is walking for 1 1/2 hours a day in every district, he said.

The police have put another 60 officers on the streets three days a week, Riley said, by pulling them from administrative jobs. He's going to use federal grants to pay overtime for another 40 to 50 patrol officers. Riley is also using undercover officers to converge on scenes of violent crime.

"They'll gather information and look for suspects," Riley said. "Because they don't always flee the scene immediately."

Criminal Sheriff Marlon Gusman is providing 14 deputies to patrol the Fauborg Marigny neighborhood adjacent to the French Quarter.

The city's initiatives are in addition to plans announced Thursday by the U.S. Justice Department. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Attorney Jim Letten announced additional federal manpower and equipment being sent to the city to help police fight violent crime that increased as the city repopulates following Hurricane Katrina in August 2005.

Police are also conducting traffic stops every night, Riley said. They have resulted in over 1,600 citations, including 24 narcotics arrests, 35 people with outstanding warrants were apprehended and one person was caught with an illegal weapon.

"We do find that when we put them in areas of violent crime, things quiet down," Riley said.

A meeting with the New Orleans criminal court judges was very positive, Nagin said.

"If we bring good cases to them that are well documented they will push for maximum sentences," Nagin said.

Mother, Daughter Receive Sentences For FEMA Fraud (MR)

DOJ_NMG_0123729

Staff Report

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 27, 2007

A Jackson woman who admitted submitting 28 phony applications for assistance following Hurricane Katrina will spend more than six years in prison, while her mother will serve probation for similar offenses, a federal judge in Mobile decided this week.

U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose on Wednesday sentenced Lawanda Williams to six years and three months in prison and ordered her to pay back the $267,377 she received in fraudulent aid from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The judge also ordered her to surrender four automobiles, real estate, televisions, electronics equipment and other items she purchased with the money.

At a separate hearing Friday, DuBose sentenced the woman's mother, Hannah Williams, to three months probation.

The pair are among more than a dozen people who have pleaded guilty to FEMA fraud associated with Katrina, but the younger Williams is responsible for more money than any of the others, according to authorities.

"Ms. Williams used Hurricane Katrina and the relief efforts as an opportunity to make hundreds of thousands of dollars by lying and by stealing other people's identities," U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes said in a prepared statement. "The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force is actively working to bring to justice those who took advantage of the recovery efforts to enrich themselves."

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales created the national task force in September 2005, weeks after Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast. Chaired by the assistant attorney general for the criminal division, the task force includes representatives from the FBI, the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General and other agencies.

Hannah Williams pleaded guilty in October to making a false claim against the government. She admitted that she submitted a false disaster assistance application for an address in Grove Hill where she had not lived for more than 18 months. She received $22,904.31, according to court records.

Judge sentences couple for Ecstasy dealing

A federal judge in Mobile this week sent a man and his onetime girlfriend to prison for their participation in a giant conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine.

Senior U.S. District Judge Charles Butler Jr. on Tuesday sentenced Daniel Issac

LaPorte, 28, to 14 years in prison. He gave Leigh Ann Sciandra, 22, a 10-year sentence.

LaPorte and Sciandra were indicted in October 2005 on one count each of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute the club drug Ecstasy as well as conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine. They were among 20 area defendants ensnared in an international Ecstasy investigation known as Operation Candybox.

Investigators with the Drug Enforcement Administration said they questioned Sciandra and LaPorte in April 2005 and that both admitted to selling Ecstasy, a drug popular at all-night rave parties. That charge against both defendants was dropped as part of their plea bargains.

Bank robbery brings more than nine years in prison

Citing the defendant's lengthy criminal record, a federal judge in Mobile on Friday sentenced a Prichard man to more than nine years in prison for robbing a Regions Bank in Spanish Fort in 2005.

In handing down the prison term of nine years and two months, U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose noted that Kendrick Lamar Perkins, 27, has been arrested 10 to 12 times.

"He has a very extensive criminal history," she said.

Perkins pleaded guilty in October, admitting that he went inside the bank on the morning of Nov. 30, 2005, displayed a gun and made off with $11,835.

DuBose ordered Perkins to pay that money back, but she agreed to let him serve his sentence simultaneously with any sentence he gets from a Mobile County circuit judge on a probation revocation.

Assistant Federal Defender Chris Knight asked DuBose for leniency, noting that his client had been diagnosed with a major depressive disorder, stemming from the death of his brother in 2003.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis said that should not be a factor in sentencing.

"The death of his brother preceded this incident by several years," she said.

'ABSURD' JUDGE OUSTS 2 (NYPOST)

By Stefanie Cohen

The New York Post, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123730

An irreverent Brooklyn federal judge had to dismiss two jurors from a capital murder case yesterday after his mocking statements about the defendant's possible death sentence wound up splashed across city newspapers.

Judge Frederic Block told lawyers earlier this week that the feds' bid to have drug lord Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff - who is charged in two murder-for-hire schemes - put to death was "absurd."

The jury and the press were not in the courtroom when the judge made the unusual comments, but a copy of the public court transcript wound up in reporters' hands - and then became fodder for the following day's news cycle.

Morning talk-radio shows then picked up the story. And Assistant U.S. Attorney Caroline Pokorny complained to Block yesterday morning, as he launched a bid to discover whether the jury has been tainted.

McGriff, a legendary Queens drug kingpin, is on trial for plotting the deaths of two rivals in 2001. The judge said that, based on the jury's demeanor and the evidence presented during the initial phase of the trial, which ended yesterday, "there's no chance in the world there would be a death-penalty verdict in this case . . . This is an absurd prosecution, based upon what I have heard."

He asked Pokorny to send a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, telling him that he didn't support proceeding with the penalty phase of the trial. Federal death-penalty cases require two trials - one in which jurors decide the defendant's guilt and, if there's a conviction, a separate trial in which they say whether he should face life in prison or death.

It's unclear what impact the judge's suggestion will have on the case.

Yesterday, he admitted he'd made a mistake by allowing the comments to become public - but didn't seem to regret making them.

"Everything I said I stand by, but, unfortunately, I didn't get around to sealing [the transcript]," he said.

The judge then called the jury into the courtroom and asked whether any of the 12-member panel had seen or heard any news regarding the case.

One juror raised his hand and was dismissed.

Coincidentally, a second juror also had to be let go after recognizing someone in the gallery of the courtroom. The panel is supposed to be anonymous for its own protection.

Before letting them go for the day, Block reminded jurors to "really, really, really not read the newspapers. Stack them up, and you can read them afterward."

Va. Death Penalty Expansion Approved (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

RICHMOND, Jan. 26 -- The House of Delegates voted Friday to expand the use of the death penalty in Virginia by making accomplices and judge killers eligible for execution, virtually assuring that the measures will go to Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), who personally opposes capital punishment.

The legislation to increase the use of capital punishment, which comes at a time when other states are considering repealing the death penalty, would make accomplices to a murder and anyone who kills a judge or a court witness eligible for the death penalty. The Senate passed nearly identical versions of the bills earlier in the week.

Kaine, a Catholic, will now face his first decision on whether to expand capital punishment. He has said he will uphold the death penalty despite his personal opposition. Since taking office, he has signed four death warrants but twice delayed the execution of a murderer suspected of being mentally ill. A spokesman said Friday that Kaine has not taken a position on the bills.

Under the state's triggerman rule, enacted three decades ago, only the person who carries out a killing can be executed. Exceptions have been made over time -- such as for crimes of terrorism, murder for hire or drug conspiracy -- but the rule complicated the state's efforts to try Washington area sniper John Allen Muhammad.

Because there was disagreement about whether Muhammad or Lee Boyd Malvo fired the rifle during the 2002 spree that killed 10 people in the Washington area, prosecutors could try Muhammad on a capital offense only after they built a case using the terrorism exception. Muhammad was convicted and sentenced to death in 2003.

The revision of the triggerman law, approved 83 to 11, allows for the death penalty to be imposed if the accomplice has the same intent as the killer.

"I think it is an important step to make sure that people who participate in a capital crime will understand they will all share the ultimate punishment," said Del. C. Todd Gilbert (R-Shenandoah), sponsor of the bill.

All three death penalty bills were endorsed by the Virginia Crime Commission, a panel that advises the legislature on crime issues. Opponents of capital punishment argue that Virginia should not be expanding its death penalty when courts and lawmakers in some states, including Maryland, are considering moratoriums out of concern that it is unfairly applied. Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) said Thursday that he would work to repeal the death penalty.

"In Virginia, we seem to have an insatiable desire to expand the death penalty," said Del. Kenneth R. Plum (D-Fairfax), who voted against the bills. "It's too bad we have not caught on to what other states recognize and consider a moratorium."

Gilbert countered that the changes would bring Virginia in line with most other states that allow capital punishment, the majority of which permit execution of accomplices.

Virginia is second in the nation to Texas in executions, according to the Death Penalty Information Center. Since 1976, when the Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment, Virginia has put 98 convicts to death.

Besides the death penalty, delegates also tackled the issue of abortion Friday.

By a vote of 71 to 27, the House voted to make it a misdemeanor for someone to force, coerce or intimidate a woman into having an abortion. The crime is elevated to a felony if the woman is younger than 18. The bill now goes to the Senate, which historically has resisted abortion legislation.

After the abortion vote, House Republicans blocked a bill by Del. C. Charles Caputo (D-Fairfax) to prohibit teenagers from talking on a cellphone while driving.

The bill passed the Science and Technology Committee this week with the support of 11 Republicans, including Dels. Timothy D. Hugo (Fairfax) and Jackson H. Miller (Manassas).

But on the House floor Friday, the 11 delegates joined the rest of their GOP colleagues in voting to table the bill after House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith (R-Salem) said it needed closer scrutiny.

Caputo said the Republican caucus decided to kill his bill because it was sponsored by a Democrat -- a charge Griffith denied.

"They are playing politics with our children," Caputo said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Reputed Klansman Asks Judge To Throw Out ’64 Kidnap Case (AP)

By Jack Elliott Jr.

AP, January 27, 2007

JACKSON, Miss.— A reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men has asked a federal judge to dismiss the charges, saying the statute of limitations has expired.

Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester filed the motion Friday in U.S. District Court on behalf of James Ford Seale, who pleaded not guilty Thursday to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said yesterday he had not seen the motion and could not comment.

Seale, 71, could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee.

Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities.

Seale and Edwards were arrested in the case in 1964. But the FBI — consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that summer — turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges.

The Justice Department reopened the case in 2000.

Seale remained jailed pending a bail hearing set for tomorrow. His court-appointed lawyers said he is suffering from cancer. His trial is scheduled for April 2, though that is expected to be delayed.

Seale’s arrest Wednesday marked the latest attempt by prosecutors in the South to close the books on crimes from the civil rights era that went unpunished. In recent years, authorities in Mississippi and Alabama won convictions in the 1963 assassination of NAACP activist Medgar Evers; the 1963 Birmingham, Ala., church bombing that killed four black girls; and the 1964 Philadelphia, Miss., slayings of the three civil rights workers — the case that led to the discovery of Moore’s and Dee’s bodies.

In the dismissal motion, Nester said prosecutors needed to have charged Seale under the law in effect at the time of the alleged offense. The statute of limitations on the federal crime of kidnapping is five years, meaning the deadline to charge Seale was 1969, she argued.

While the other cases dealt with murder charges, Seale's is the first case in Mississippi to involve federal kidnapping charges.

Earnest Avants, convicted in 2003 on federal charges of aiding and abetting in the killing of a black handyman in the Homochitto National Forest in Mississippi in 1966, was among the defendants in recent civil rights- era crimes who argued the statute of limitations had run out.

A federal judge, later upheld by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, ruled that there was not an unreasonable delay in indicting Avants, because the federal government did not become aware it had jurisdiction until 1999, when it was discovered that the slaying occurred in a national forest.

Men Shot By Md. Official Are Freed From Custody (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda And Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Two critically wounded men who were shot by the No. 2 homeland security official in Prince George's County were released from police custody yesterday as the department backed off earlier statements that the men would probably face assault charges.

Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey determined yesterday that Robert White, 36, and Brandon D. Clark, 22, should no longer be in custody. "The state's attorney's office did not want to rush to judgment. We believe that further inspection of the evidence and further interviews with all concerned parties is necessary before any charges are brought forward," said Ramon Korionoff, Ivey's spokesman.

Michael J. Winkelman, an attorney for the men's families, said the decision means that their relatives will have free access to them in the hospital.

On Thursday, county police said assault charges were pending against the men, both furniture movers, for allegedly assaulting Cpl. Keith Washington, who is also a county police officer, in his Accokeek home Wednesday. They said then that Washington apparently acted in self-defense, based on statements from Washington and a family member whom they did not identify. The movers were unarmed, police said.

Yesterday, Sharon Taylor, the police department's top spokeswoman, said the statement that assault charges were pending "was obviously based on preliminary information."

"No charges have been made yet. Nothing can be decided until a fair and thorough investigation has been done, which this department is going to do," Taylor said. "There are two sides to the story, and so far we don't have both sides."

Washington could not be reached. Steven E. Sunday, a police union lawyer who met with Washington, did not respond yesterday to a phone message seeking comment.

White, of the District, and Clark, of Oxon Hill, remained at Prince George's Hospital Center yesterday. Both were breathing with the assistance of tubes and were unable to talk, Winkelman said. Police investigators have been unable to interview White and Clark because of their condition, Taylor said.

According to Winkelman and Leelee Best, Clark's girlfriend, Clark and White were working as subcontractors, moving pieces for Marlo Furniture, when they arrived at Washington's house to exchange a bedroom set.

Winkelman said the delivery contractor for whom Clark and White worked said the two men called him from Washington's house before the shooting to report that Washington was "very upset."

Speaking outside the hospital, Clark's mother, Marilynn Clark, said she was allowed to see her son and his co-worker yesterday for the first time since the shooting.

"I got a lot of eye contact with them," Clark said, adding that she told each man that relatives who loved them were nearby. "Both of them had tears coming out of their eyes. They understood what I was saying."

She said of her son, "I reminded him that he's strong and that he'll be okay."

White's mother and two siblings also arrived in Prince George's yesterday, having driven through the night from South Carolina. Late yesterday afternoon, they were waiting to see White.

"I just want to see my son," Carrie White Williams said. "If he just looks in my face, I know he'll be doing better."

White recently moved to the District from South Carolina. According to court records, White was convicted in the early 1990s in South Carolina on charges of assault, receiving stolen property and burglary.

Winkelman said that "any alleged prior criminal history has no bearing on this incident."

Washington was appointed the county's deputy director of homeland security in 2004 by County Executive Jack B. Johnson. He is a longtime Johnson supporter who worked at one time as his driver.

DOJ_NMG_0123733

Yesterday, Johnson, a former state's attorney, said of the probe into the shooting: "My position is the same position I had as a prosecutor. Every investigation must be aboveboard, beyond reproach. No stones must be left unturned."

Staff writer Rosalind S. Helderman and staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

No Rush To Judgment (WP)

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

In Prince George's, a police officer, a shooting and two men down

APRINCE GEORGE'S County police officer with an unsettling record of anger management problems gets into a verbal dispute with two men making a routine furniture delivery to his home. The dispute escalates. The officer, who has friends in high places despite his checkered history, ends up shooting both men with his 9mm Beretta. The deliverymen are critically injured, hospitalized and unable to give their accounts to investigators. Yet the very next day, a police spokesman says that the police officer acted in self-defense and the deliverymen will probably be charged with assault.

Talk about a rush to judgment.

Yesterday Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High acted to restore his department's credibility. "Right now the investigation is far from concluded," the chief said, rightly. "I want to see what the full facts disclose. We're not charging anyone right now."

We don't presume to know what happened Wednesday night when Cpl. Keith Washington shot the two men making a delivery for Marlo Furniture at his home in Accokeek. We don't assume that the two men he shot, Brandon D. Clark and Robert White, were angels; Mr. White evidently has an arrest record, and Mr. Clark also has had a brush or two with the law.

But we do know that Cpl. Washington has been the subject of repeated complaints about his on- and off-duty behavior. The common thread is that he turns routine encounters into highly charged, violent incidents. In separate meetings of a homeowners association on whose board he served three years ago, Cpl. Washington assaulted a property manager, shoved the association's treasurer and berated the association's president, it was alleged. Earlier, Cpl. Washington was sued for wrongfully arresting and abusing a man who protested Cpl. Washington's allegedly rough treatment of a motorist involved in a fender bender; an initial $260,000 judgment against him was overturned on appeal.

Cpl. Washington is a friend and political ally of County Executive Jack B. Johnson. In 2004, Mr. Johnson named Cpl. Washington to the newly created job of deputy director of homeland security for the county. At the time, we were among those questioning Mr. Johnson's judgment in appointing someone of Cpl. Washington's evidently deficient interpersonal skills.

Cpl. Washington, Mr. Clark and Mr. White all deserve a thorough, evenhanded investigation. What's on the line here is not only the reputation of a county police officer and the lives of two working men but the impartiality and judgment of police and prosecutors in Prince George's County.

Philadelphia Jails To Return To Court Oversight (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 26 (AP) — A federal judge ordered city jails to go back under court monitoring, describing conditions there as overcrowded and squalid and saying that inmates lacked access to clean cells and adequate medical attention.

The judge, R. Barclay Surrick of Federal District Court, issued a scathing ruling on Thursday, saying that holding facilities were overflowing and that lockups at police stations were firetraps that violated detainees' constitutional rights.

The ruling came in a lawsuit filed last year on behalf of 11 inmates with the help of David Rudovsky, a University of Pennsylvania law professor who filed a similar suit 35 years ago. That case led to court oversight of the jails from 1971 to 2001.

Judge Surrick had toured the system, which holds roughly 8,800 inmates.

While waiting to be assigned to regular cells, detainees at one jail "were forced to sleep overlapping one another and on every inch of concrete floor," Judge Surrick wrote. "Prisoners slept with their heads next to the toilet."

Inmates would spend days "without bedding provisions, sleeping, if they could, on metal benches or directly on the concrete floor," he wrote.

The city solicitor, Romulo L. Diaz Jr., said Friday that officials were evaluating the decision. Mr. Diaz said the city remained committed to improving conditions and to developing a fire safety plan that would satisfy the court.

Mr. Diaz has said the city needs more money to hire staff members and buy equipment, and to seek other solutions like home-monitoring devices for low-level offenders.

The city spends $262 million a year on its jail system, up from $93 million in 1987 and $195 million in 2001.

Professor Says Seminary Dismissed Her Over Gender (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

FORT WORTH, Jan. 26 (AP) — A former theology professor at a prominent Southern Baptist seminary here said officials had told her to leave because women are biblically forbidden to teach men.

The professor, Sheri Klouda, said she was hired in 2002 to a tenure-track position as an assistant professor at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, where she taught Hebrew and had earned her doctorate. But in 2004, Dr. Klouda said, an administrator, whom she would not name, told her that the seminary's president, Paige Patterson, would not be recommending her for tenure because she was a woman, and that she should plan to move on.

Dr. Klouda said she continued teaching for two more years, receiving good evaluations and usually filling her classrooms. In January 2006, the same administrator told her she would no longer be able to teach but would be paid through the 2006-7 academic year. A couple of weeks later, she said, she was told she would be terminated at the end of 2006 instead. She appealed to Dr. Patterson in April, she said, to no avail.

Dr. Patterson did not respond to requests for comment, and Van McClain, president of the board of trustees, said he could not discuss the matter but e-mailed several previously written statements.

Mr. McClain said Dr. Klouda had not been dismissed, but he did say that she had not been granted tenure. He also said it had been rare for women to teach theology at Southern Baptist seminaries.

"With regard to the tightening of the policy of women teaching in the School of Theology, there has been no change in policy, but rather a return to the way it has always been," Mr. McClain said.

"There was a momentary lax of the parameters," he said, adding that the seminary had "now returned to its traditional, confessional and biblical position."

Southern Baptist leaders agree that the role of pastor is reserved for men, based on a verse in I Timothy in which the Apostle Paul says, "I permit no woman to teach or to have authority over a man." The 2000 Baptist Faith and Message prohibits women from serving as pastors.

But critics say the interpretation should not be applied to the seminary because it is not a church.

Wade Burleson, a Baptist pastor and blogger in Enid, Okla., has denounced the seminary's treatment of Dr. Klouda. Mr. Burleson said leaders of the Southern Baptist Convention were trying to expand the church's statement of faith.

"The extraordinary belief that women should be forbidden from teaching men the Bible, or 'doctrine,' is held by only a handful of Southern Baptist leaders, including at least one agency head and a few strategically placed trustees in various agencies," Mr. Burleson wrote on his blog. "Unfortunately, the majority of Southern Baptists let them dictate policy for the entire convention."

In June, Dr. Klouda took a position with Taylor University, a nondenominational evangelical college in Indiana. "I gave up four years toward tenure," she said. "I had to begin all over again."

She said she did not know if she would take any action against Southwestern.

New Voting Machine Delays Continue (AP)

By Marc Humbert, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — It is highly unlikely new voting machines will be in place for this year's fall elections in New York and fully implementing them may have to wait until 2009, state election officials said Friday.

That could leave New Yorkers using the state's aging lever-action voting machines for yet another presidential election.

The prediction, from state Board of Election officials, came after state and county officials participated in two days of meetings about the situation this week with officials of the U.S. Justice Department.

"Clearly, 2007 is going to be very difficult for us and they understand that," said Peter Kosinski, the board's co-executive director. "We are in discussions about what is doable."

Federal officials sued New York last year over its slowest-in-the-nation moves to comply with provisions of the federal Help America Vote Act, which was adopted after the disputed 2000 presidential election. HAVA was designed to get states to replace their aging voting systems with modern machinery. The plan was to have everything in place for the 2006 elections at the latest.

Under a court-approved settlement of the lawsuit, New York agreed to have new machinery in place that could be used by handicapped voters for the 2006 elections. Other voters continued to use lever-action machinery.

While the state Legislature and former Gov. George Pataki had adopted legislation last year that required new voting machines for all voters to be in place for the 2007 elections, testing of possible new machines for certification by the state has been repeatedly delayed. The deadline for certification was originally set for late last year, then moved to this March and further pushed back to May by the state board earlier this month.

"It looks like it won't happen in 2007," state board spokesman Lee Daghlian said Friday. "I suppose it could happen in 2008, but there are some who feel they don't want to have new machines out there in a presidential year, so the next obvious move would be '09."

Daghlian noted that any such delay would require a change in state law and approval by the federal courts.

"That's all up in the air at the moment," he said.

"It's pretty clear, they are definitely interested in trying to get them in place for 2008," said Kosinski when asked about how federal officials were reacting.

Nonetheless, Kosinski said, "We don't want to have to set out some artificial deadline."

Counties across the state can't purchase new machines until the state board certifies which ones meet the state's standards. It was recently revealed that the private company in charge of testing for the state, Ciber Inc., was having problems with its federal certification as an approved testing company. New York officials have suspended testing while they investigate that situation.

Given the questions that have surfaced nationally over the security of some new voting systems and problems other states have faced with new machines, even one-time critics of New York's slowness to comply with HAVA now support a further delay.

"Obviously, 2008 is not the appropriate time to introduce a new technology," said Barbara Bartoletti, a spokeswoman for New York's League of Women Voters which is advocating a delay until 2009.

Bartoletti said the additional time was needed to make sure new voting systems were adequately tested and that poll workers and voters were properly trained and educated.

"We feel New York should go slowly and do it right," said Bartoletti.

Kosinski said that given the problems many other states have encountered, "our delay has worked to our benefit."

Nonetheless, Kosinski acknowledged the delay in complying with HAVA has led to the possibility New York might have to return at least $50 million in federal aid meant to help pay for new voting machines. The state has also received more than $200 million in additional HAVA-related aid. Kosinski said state officials are working with New York's congressional delegation to protect the funding.

"We have not given back any money as of today," he said.

The lever-action voting machine was first demonstrated in Lockport, N.Y., in 1892 and soon became the dominant system all across New York and much of the nation. It is still the primary voting system used in New York.

Official Proposes "Drafting" Poll Workers To Ease Problems (NYT)

By Bob Driehaus

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

CINCINNATI, Jan. 26 — The chronic shortage of election workers in Ohio could be solved by requiring residents to work at the polls the way they fulfill jury duty, the newly elected secretary of state says.

The official, Jennifer L. Brunner, a Democrat who won the office vacated by J. Kenneth Blackwell, a Republican, is asking lawmakers to require conscripted workers to have two days of training and then work eight-hours on Election Day.

If the Legislature approves the plan, Ohio would be the first state to force people to be election workers.

The system has been troubled by too few workers struggling with electronic machines and changes like the new requirement for voter IDs.

“Under Ohio law, we’re supposed to have equal numbers of poll workers from both parties at each polling place, but we don’t always,” Ms. Brunner said.

The workers’ average age is 72, and states and advocates around the country are grappling with a shortage of workers, according to research by VoteTrustUSA, a nonpartisan group.

“We are now facing a small crisis,” said Curtis Gans, director of the Center for the Study of the American Electorate at American University in Washington. “Most of the poll workers are older people, and they’re dying off.”

The problems here have been compounded since 2000 by accusations of mismanagement. This week, two Cuyahoga County election workers were convicted of misconduct for rigging a recount of the 2004 presidential election.

The communications director at VoteTrustUSA, Susan Greenhalgh, welcomed the effort to compel workers but stopped short of endorsing it.

“We need to see where the opt-out provisions are,” Ms. Greenhalgh said. “The last thing you want is somebody who really, really doesn’t want to be there working the polls.”

DOJ_NMG_0123736

Ms. Brunner, a former judge in Franklin County, said poll workers would fall under the same rules as jurors and would be drawn from registered voters. Conscripted workers, who would receive a stipend, would supplement the 48,000 poll workers in the state. They are paid $95 a day.

Officials could replace defiant workers who refuse to work.

Ms. Brunner said she hoped to have the system in place for the 2008 election but would not rush it. She said that she had not estimated the cost, but that it was likely to be more than the current system.

Candice Hoke, a professor of election law and the director of the Cleveland State Center for Election Integrity, praised the plan for allowing people who want to work at the polls to serve without fear of losing their jobs as a result of missing work.

"The downside is it takes a good deal of training, particularly with the complexity of the systems we have today," Ms. Hoke said.

Advocates of an election overhaul prefer maintaining a pool of workers who voluntarily return, to limit training.

"It's almost become a specialized job," said Dan Seligson, editor of Electionline.org, which monitors reform efforts. "In a perfect world, you would have the same group of young people come in, do it for five years and then bring in their friends to do it for five years."

R. Doug Lewis, executive director of the Election Center in Houston, would prefer the Ohio initiative on a smaller scale along the lines of tests in small, medium and large counties.

"I think we need to keep an open mind but realize that some of these ideas may not be as convenient as they appear at first blush," Mr. Lewis said.

Douglas County, Neb., is one of the few counties with such a conscript system. Its election commissioner, Dave Phipps, said the system had worked brilliantly for 20 years.

Half the county's 2,000 poll workers are "draftees," required to work in four elections, resulting in fully staffed polls for the 300,000 registered voters.

A drawback is higher absenteeism, Mr. Phipps said, a hurdle overcome by recruiting slightly more workers than needed. Technology-savvy younger people have lowered the average age of poll workers to 52.

The leaders of the Democratic minority in the Ohio legislature, Senator Teresa Fedor and Representative Joyce Beatty, will consider the proposal and other changes, including mail-in ballots for elections that involve just issues.

"We need to put more attention into our elections system than we have in the past," Ms. Fedor said. "It's time to update it."

The Senate president, Bill Harris, a Republican, declined to comment before receiving a detailed proposal.

Representative Jim Hughes, a Republican who is seeking reappointment as chairman of the Election and Ethics Committee, said: "Elections are a symbol of freedom in this country. Off the cuff, it kind of seems a little bit oppressive making service mandatory."

New York Won't Replace Voting Machines By The Fall (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

New York officials have given up on replacing the state's aging voting machines by the fall elections, and some would like to put off buying new electronic voting systems until after the 2008 presidential election, state officials said yesterday.

New York is the last state to update its machines, and the latest delay comes amid growing questions about the work of a laboratory that was hired to help test the machines being offered by five bidders.

Based in part on the problems with the testing lab, the New York State Board of Elections has pushed back its deadline for certifying which machines would be acceptable until at least May.

Given the months it would take for counties to acquire the machines and train poll workers, "that would make it impossible to replace anything more than a few isolated machines for the 2007 elections," said Douglas A. Kellner, a board co-chairman.

Mr. Kellner said it might be possible to have the new system ready for the presidential primary in March 2008. An association of county election officials passed a resolution last week urging the state to wait until 2009, and Mr. Kellner said most board members agreed that it would be better if the state did not have to make such sweeping changes amid the high turnout of a presidential election.

But because the electronic systems are easier for the disabled to use than the old lever machines, the state was required by Congress and a federal court order to make the changes more quickly. Mr. Kellner said those orders would need to be amended to allow for further delays and to let New York hold on to at least $50 million in federal funds to help pay for the machines.

Mr. Kellner said the elections board was also considering whether to terminate its contract with the testing lab, Ciber Inc., which has also run into trouble with federal officials.

The board suspended Ciber's work earlier this month after The New York Times reported that federal officials had found deficiencies in its practices and had held up its application for temporary accreditation under a new oversight program.

State election officials then asked Ciber, based in Greenwood Village, Colo., and the federal Election Assistance Commission for the reports about the deficiencies. The company turned them over on Thursday, after state officials threatened to subpoena the documents. The federal commission posted them on its Web site yesterday, along with a letter warning Ciber that it had only four to five more weeks to fix the problems.

According to the documents, a federal auditor found last July that Ciber, the nation's largest tester of voting machine software, did not follow its own quality-control procedures or conduct all the proper tests.

The documents indicate that in many cases, the lab simply used tests suggested by the voting machine manufacturers, rather than running standardized checks of its own. The auditor also criticized the lab for "acceding too quickly" to requests by the voting machine companies to modify the tests.

Voting machine experts have long been concerned about possible conflicts of interest in the testing, and some say the problems with Ciber have raised questions about the security and reliability of some of the machines now in use.

In a written response to the audit, company officials also acknowledged "relatively loose handling" of meetings during the testing. "Since we are a small group, we often just call each other down the hall for a meeting, especially if something is critical," the response said.

Ciber's spokeswoman, Diane C. Stoner, said in a statement yesterday that the company had fixed most of the problems and expected to receive the federal certification.

Ringleader Sentenced In Concrete Scheme (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, January 27, 2007

Fishers businessman gets 14-month prison term for his role in organizing cartel that fixed prices

The second of two ringleaders in a conspiracy to fix ready-mix concrete prices in the Indianapolis area was sentenced Friday to 14 months in federal prison.

Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney gave Gus "Butch" Nuckols III, 46, Fishers, a sentence seven months shorter than the one the government had recommended.

Nuckols' sentence matched that of price-fixing conspirator Scott D. Hughey, 52, president of Hughey Inc., a company doing business as Carmel Concrete Products. Hughey was sentenced Dec. 14.

Nuckols held two secret meetings to fix prices from July 2000 through May 2004 at a horse barn on his property.

Antitrust officials estimate $37.5 million to $100 million in concrete sales by Nuckols' firm, Builder's Materials & Supply Co., were affected by the conspiracy to increase prices and limit discounts to major purchasers. In June, McKinney fined Nuckols' company $4 million. The company also had pleaded guilty to an antitrust violation.

During sentencing, McKinney said he was concerned about an interview Nuckols gave WISH (Channel 8) in December. In the interview, the president and owner of the Fishers-based company said market "prices were eroding, and we probably did what any businessman would do." Nuckols also referred to fallout from the FBI and Justice Department investigation as "a hassle."

"Tell me why I shouldn't be concerned about that," McKinney said to Nuckols in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis. "I want to be sure you really understand what you did was against the law."

Nuckols was contrite during his sentencing, saying he had brought shame upon himself, his family and his company and employees through his leadership of the conspiracy, which potentially affected hundreds of millions of dollars in spending on public and private projects.

"I don't have a word in my vocabulary to tell you how sorry I am for my conduct," Nuckols said. "What I did was wrong, selfish. I'll spend the rest of my life trying to make up for what I did."

Jonathan A. Epstein, an attorney for the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, asserted Nuckols was "saying all the right things" at his sentencing but had minimized his role in the conspiracy during trial testimony in December and in the TV interview.

DOJ_NMG_0123738

"This isn't 'a hassle'; it's a crime," Epstein said. "We don't think those are the words of a man who fully appreciates he broke the law."

Nuckols' attorney, C. Joseph Russell, accompanied Nuckols to the TV interview at his horse barn and said he had told Nuckols not to admit responsibility during the interview, even though he had pleaded guilty to the conspiracy.

Ultimately, McKinney accepted that Nuckols regrets his conduct. In addition to his prison sentence, Nuckols must pay a $50,000 fine and spend a year on supervised release after serving his prison term.

Delta Creditors May Seek Extension From US Airways (BLOOM)

By Mary Schlangenstein And Jeff St. Onge, Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, January 27, 2007

Delta Air Lines Inc.'s creditors may ask US Airways Group Inc. to extend the Feb. 1 deadline on its hostile takeover bid as they study competing plans for the bankrupt carrier's future, people familiar with the matter said.

The nine-member committee of unsecured creditors is split between those favoring a quicker payback of their claims through a US Airways merger and those who would benefit under a Delta plan to emerge from court protection as an independent company, said the people, who didn't want to be identified because the discussions are private.

US Airways wants the panel to urge Atlanta-based Delta, which operates a hub at Salt Lake City International Airport, to open its financial records and trigger a U.S. antitrust review. If the committee doesn't act by Feb. 1, the $9.67 billion offer expires, Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker has said.

US Airways probably would extend its deadline if the creditors "said one single positive thing about the deal," said Jim Corridore, a New York-based analyst for Standard & Poor's. "All they need to do is allow the process to continue. This is not a selection of one plan over the other."

An extension would give the creditors' panel more time to debate US Airways' merger plan and Delta's bid to leave bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline by mid-2007, the people said.

The committee has "not asked us for an extension of the deadline," said Kelly Sullivan, a spokeswoman for US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz.

"We continue to work constructively and collaboratively with the creditors committee and others involved in our Chapter 11 proceedings," said Betsy Talton, a Delta spokeswoman. She declined to comment on the possible extension request.

Parker has offered $5 billion in cash and 89.5 million US Airways shares for Delta, whose creditors would own 49 percent of what would become the world's largest airline. Delta's plan to remain independent values the airline at as much as $12 billion. Delta is the third-biggest U.S. carrier by traffic; US Airways is seventh.

US Airways and Delta are both courting the creditors committee, which will help set terms for any bankruptcy exit. The panel is led by Boeing Co. and includes Coca-Cola Co.; United Technologies Corp.'s Pratt & Whitney, which makes aircraft engines; and Delta's pilots union.

The committee and its members face a Jan. 31 deadline to file objections to Delta's disclosure statement, which explains the airline's reorganization plan. A hearing on the document is set for Feb. 7.

"There are several large creditors that have conflicts of interest in terms of their willingness or desire to work with Delta in the future," S&P's Corridore said in an interview. "Their best interests may not line up with the best interests of the creditors not on the committee."

A reorganization plan generally doesn't go to all of the airline's creditors for approval until it has the backing of the creditors committee. A judge can confirm a plan over creditor objections as long as it is fair and reasonable.

A separate committee representing 20 institutions that own $2.25 billion of Delta's debt urged the panel on Jan. 24 to begin talks with US Airways.

The bondholders "are interested in maximizing the immediate return on their investment," said Eric Schaffer, a Pittsburgh-based bankruptcy attorney with Reed Smith LLP. Members of the creditors panel "are looking at it from what is arguably a longer-term perspective."

Delta estimates that unsecured claims against it would total $14.2 billion. The airline's September 2005 bankruptcy filing listed debt of $28.3 billion and assets of $21.8 billion.

Hynix Loses Bid For New Trial (BLOOM)

Hynix Semiconductor Inc. lost a bid to revisit a $133.4 million damage award to Rambus Inc. in a patent lawsuit over computer memory-chip technology, as a federal judge said he may decide next month whether to allow the case to move into its final phase.

Rambus shares surged as much as 11 percent. U.S. District Judge Ronald Whyte in San Jose, Calif., said a new trial on damages can't happen until the final phase of the lawsuit, which will address antitrust, unfair competition and fraud claims.

The judge Friday set a hearing for Feb. 16 to decide whether he should delay that phase until the U.S. Federal Trade Commission issues its penalty in an antitrust suit against Rambus, a designer of computer memory chip interfaces.

A federal jury in April awarded Rambus $307 million in its dispute with Ichon, South Korea-based Hynix, the world's second- largest memory chipmaker.

Jurors agreed with Rambus' claim that Hynix infringed patents covering fundamental aspects of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, the main type of memory used in computers. Whyte later reduced the award to $133.4 million.

Rivals Voice Complaints About Microsoft's New System (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 26 (AP) — Rivals of Microsoft renewed their call Friday for European regulators to act against what they say are "illegal practices," charging that the new Vista operating system is the company's effort to extend its monopoly to the Internet.

They asked the European Commission to make a decision "as fast as possible" on a complaint they filed last February. It had accused Microsoft of working to keep its existing monopolies and trying to extend its market dominance into other areas, including Web-based computing.

Microsoft had no immediate comment beyond saying that the rivals — represented by the European Committee for Interoperable Systems — were not saying anything new. The company has described the group as a front for I.B.M. and other competitors that have tried to use regulatory complaints to their business advantage.

The group said Microsoft's XAML markup language — which it said was positioned to replace the current Web page language HTML — was designed "from the ground up to be dependent on Windows."

"The very same practices the European Commission found to be illegal almost three years ago have now been implemented in Vista," the group of rivals said.

A spokesman for the group, Thomas Vinje, said Microsoft was seeking to impose its own Windows-dependent standards and displace existing ones.

"The end result will be the continued absence of any real consumer choice, years of waiting for Microsoft to improve — or even debug — its monopoly products, and, of course, high prices," Mr. Vinje said.

The rival group represents I.B.M., Nokia, Sun Microsystems, RealNetworks and Oracle along with smaller software companies like the Web browser maker Opera Software and two Linux operating system businesses: Red Hat and Linspire.

The complaint that the group filed in February 2006 accused Microsoff of monopoly abuse in sectors not covered by Europe's 2004 antitrust ruling. That decision found Microsoft had abused its position by bundling media software into its Windows software and squeezing out rival media players.

As a remedy, the European Union ordered Microsoft to share communications code with rivals to make their software work smoothly with Windows. It fined the company last July for dragging its feet over supplying the "complete and accurate" data required.

Microsoft challenged the regulators' conclusions and is awaiting a ruling from the Court of First Instance.

Jury: Broadcom Didn't Violate Patents (AP)

By Elliot Spagat, AP Business Writer

AP, January 27, 2007

A federal jury ruled Friday that Broadcom Corp. did not infringe on two of rival semiconductor maker Qualcomm Inc.'s patents for video compression technology, Broadcom said.

The nine-day trial, the latest turn in a long-running legal battle between the two companies included testimony from both chairmen, Broadcom's Henry Samueli and Qualcomm's Irwin Jacobs.

Lou Lipin, Qualcomm's general counsel, told the San Diego Union-Tribune the company was disappointed with the verdict and had not decided whether to appeal. Qualcomm representatives did not immediately return phone messages from The Associated Press.

The verdict comes amid a fierce attack against Qualcomm's business model by Broadcom, Nokia Corp. and other wireless equipment makers who say Qualcomm charges excessive royalties for rights to its patented inventions.

Qualcomm accused Broadcom of violating two patents for the compressing of video signals - technology that is used in DVD players, digital televisions and iPod music players.

"We are obviously very pleased and very grateful for this jury's diligence in working to arrive at the truth, even when presented with some very complex and intricate engineering testimony," said David Dull, Broadcom's general counsel.

Qualcomm has filed numerous lawsuits that accuse Broadcom of infringing on a combined 10 patents and misappropriating trade secrets. Broadcom has filed lawsuits that accuse Qualcomm of violating a total of 18 patents, and is one of six companies that has asked the European Commission to investigate Qualcomm's business practices.

A federal judge in New Jersey recently dismissed Broadcom's antitrust lawsuit against Qualcomm, a ruling Broadcom is appealing.

Qualcomm, based in San Diego, is best known as a pioneer of a wireless standard known as code-division multiple access, or CDMA, which runs about 20 percent of the world's cell phones. Broadcom, based in Irvine, is a relative newcomer to the cell phone business.

BofA And Countrywide In Alliance Talks (FT)

By Ben White And James Politi In New York

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

Bank of America and Countrywide Financial have held discussions about an alliance that would create the biggest mortgage lending group in the US, people close to the matter said.

The talks are said to be at an early stage and may not lead to a deal. But if they proceed, the negotiations could lead to a joint venture between the two companies, under which BofA would use its big branch network to help sell home mortgages originated by Countrywide. Countrywide would have the support of BofA's far bigger balance sheet to fund its lending.

The talks could also lead to an acquisition of Countrywide by BofA, which is eager to expand its mortgage lending business to match its breadth in credit cards. Such an acquisition would probably cost BofA, the second-biggest US bank, about $30bn, analysts said.

The talks indicate that BofA continues to focus on expansion in the US in spite of recent reports that it might be interested in buying UK bank Barclays. Ken Lewis, chief executive, has said a major foreign acquisition would be difficult for BofA to execute.

BofA said it did not comment on market rumour. Countrywide did not respond to a request for comment.

Countrywide shares soared 11 per cent after FT.com disclosed a possible alliance. They closed up 4.2 per cent at $42.00. BofA shares fell slightly to $52.04.

Banking analysts said a deal could make sense for both sides. BofA would dramatically expand its ability to serve consumers, while Countrywide would get the financial muscle to withstand the current slowdown in the mortgage business.

"This would cement Bank of America's lead as the dominant retail bank in the US," said Gerard Cassidy, banking analyst at RBC Capital Markets. He added that even if BofA were to buy Countrywide outright it could avoid violating the US law forbidding banks from having more than 10 per cent of consumer deposits following an acquisition.

Countrywide has a consumer bank and about $56bn in deposits, according to Mr Cassidy. BofA has about 9 per cent of US consumer deposits and could acquire $35bn-$40bn more without violating the cap.

BofA could divest some or all of Countrywide's consumer deposits to comply with the cap while keeping the mortgage origination business.

Countrywide is expected to report fourth-quarter results next week. In the first nine months of 2006 revenues rose 17 per cent to $8.7bn, while net earnings were 9 per cent higher at $2.1bn.

According to Mortgage Daily, Countrywide was the top provider of US home loans in the fourth quarter of 2006, ahead of Wells Fargo, JPMorgan Chase and Washington Mutual.

Nasdaq Holds Firm On A Bid For London Stock Exchange (NYT)

By Heather Timmons

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 26 — Nasdaq said on Friday that it did not plan to raise its offer for the London Stock Exchange, just before a deadline to do so, damping investors' expectations. Investors have until Feb. 10 to tender their shares for a deal, but any changes in the bid would have to happen this weekend unless a rival bidder emerges.

DOJ_NMG_0123741

That is generally seen as unlikely, though any such deal would not happen quickly, because the N.Y.S.E. is just starting to absorb pan-European exchange Euronext.

The exchange's shares have fallen over the last week as investors who were hoping for a higher price than Nasdaq's initial $5.3 billion bid head for the door.

If the deal does not go through, Nasdaq has to walk away for a year, possibly leaving the door open to other bidders. Shares of the London Stock Exchange rose 12 pence on Friday, to £12.95, above Nasdaq's 1,243 pence-a-share offer.

What could happen until Feb. 10 is still unclear. About 25 percent of the exchange's investors are short-term holders like hedge funds.

Many bought into the stock at a price higher than Nasdaq's bid, and some invested in the stock through time-sensitive options, which expire early this year.

Nasdaq already owns 28.8 percent of the London exchange and needs an additional 21 percent to take control. Nasdaq has hinted that it could reduce its position, but many other investors think that is a bluff designed to persuade them to tender their shares of stock for the hostile offer.

If enough investors sell and force the price below Nasdaq's offer price, then the remaining investors could race to Nasdaq to tender their shares, giving it the majority that it needs.

London exchange executives contend that the bid is not even equal to the standalone value of their company and have repeatedly refused to meet with their Nasdaq counterparts. The situation between the two exchanges degenerated in recent days to an exchange of hostile, taunting news releases.

The chief executive of Nasdaq, Robert Greifeld, and the chief of the London Stock Exchange, Clara Furse, have never talked about the deal face to face, and securing an agreed deal at any point in the future is probably unlikely, analysts say, because of the bad blood this bid has raised between them.

Nasdaq Declines To Raise Its Bid For LSE (WSJ)

By Alistair Macdonald And Henry Teitelbaum

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

Deal Dims as U.K. Market's Stock Climbs

The Nasdaq Stock Market said it won't raise its offer of £12.43 ($24.42) a share for London Stock Exchange PLC, but the LSE's share price rose, making Nasdaq's chances of buying the exchange it has pursued for almost a year look less likely.

Nasdaq could have raised its offer until a deadline at midnight Saturday if the LSE's board had agreed to a new bid. Under United Kingdom takeover rules, Nasdaq will no longer be able to increase its offer for the LSE unless a rival bidder appears, which most analysts see as being unlikely.

If Nasdaq aimed to spook the LSE's investors into selling -- something the London exchange has accused it of trying to do in the past -- the ploy has failed for the moment. The LSE's shares closed 4.2% higher than Nasdaq's offer at £12.95 Friday, on heavy volume.

Nasdaq also announced Friday that it was extending the closing date for LSE investors to tender their shares to Feb. 10. Nasdaq said that 0.62% of LSE investors have tendered their shares since Nasdaq extended its last deadline, leaving Nasdaq with 29.37% of the LSE's stock.

Defenders of the LSE say the shareholder register is going through a shift in which short-term hedge funds that might have taken Nasdaq's offer are trading places with investors who have a longer-term interest in the LSE. U.S. businessman Samuel Heyman continues to build his stake and is the LSE's second-largest investor, with a 10.44% stake through derivatives. A person familiar with Mr. Heyman's thinking said he "has a lot of faith in the credibility and judgment of LSE's management" to act in the interests of shareholders.

Even if this bid lapses under U.K. takeover rules, Nasdaq can come back in a year and have another shot at buying the LSE. Its near-29% stake in Europe's largest stock exchange could put off a rival bid, something the London exchange's management says is a possibility.

In a statement, Nasdaq said that, in its view, "there is now insufficient time to effect any revision of the final offers via constructive dialogue with LSE and an LSE Board recommendation by the deadline." The LSE declined to comment.

Bush's Climate Remarks Weighed For Policy Shift (WP)

By Peter Baker, Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

It was just a couple of dozen words out of more than 5,000, uttered so fast that many in the audience missed them at first. But President Bush's commitment to fight global warming in his State of the Union address this week has echoed around the world and provoked debate about whether he is shifting his view of climate change.

The words themselves were not radically different from what he has said in the past in other settings. As he addressed Congress and a national television audience, Bush forecast energy breakthroughs that will reduce U.S. dependence on oil. "These technologies," he said, "will help us become better stewards of the environment, and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

But it was the first time in Bush's six years in office that he mentioned the issue in a State of the Union. And he did it while presenting a high-profile plan to cut gasoline consumption -- and with it, greenhouse gases. "Every word is crafted in that speech and every word has meaning behind it," said Christine Todd Whitman, Bush's former Environmental Protection Agency administrator. "So the fact that he mentioned climate change in that context, that was a step forward, that was a change."

Leaders in Europe and Asia took notice as well, hailing what they saw as a turning point while renewing pressure on Bush to accompany words with more meaningful action. Environmentalists were skeptical but said Bush may be starting to respond to the growing political momentum for grappling with climate change.

"They may see some handwriting on the wall," said David Doniger, climate center policy director for the Natural Resources Defense Council. "They don't want to look like deniers right now. They've got enough problems." But he said Bush's proposal could be "a Trojan horse" that looks more important than it really is and, in its details, actually could undermine its own environmental benefits.

Bush's plan calls for reducing projected gasoline consumption in the United States by 20 percent over the next 10 years by mandating a dramatic expansion in the use of alternative fuels such as ethanol and raising fuel efficiency standards for automobiles. According to the White House, that would cut annual emissions from cars and light trucks by 10 percent, or 175 million metric tons, equal to taking 26 million cars off the road.

Environmentalists noted that the 20-percent reduction target applies to how much gas is forecast to be used in 2017, not how much is used today. Because of an expected increase in consumption over the next decade, such a cut then actually might only slow the growth of gas use. Moreover, alternative fuels would include liquid made from coal, which emits its own toxic gases. And Bush's plan does not address the source of two-thirds of greenhouse gases, such as power plants and manufacturers.

The Bush plan fell far short of the mandatory reductions in greenhouse gas emissions envisioned by the 1997 Kyoto accord, which Bush renounced in 2001. Days before the State of the Union, there was speculation he might embrace emission caps after James L. Connaughton, head of the White House's Council on Environmental Quality, agreed with such an idea "in concept." But White House spokesman Tony Snow slapped down the idea, and the speech made no mention of it.

"To be perfectly frank, I thought it was an appalling disappointment for everyone, whether you're on the right or the left," said Samuel Thernstrom, a former Bush environmental aide now at the American Enterprise Institute. "We had all been led to expect . . . that we would hear a very substantial initiative from the president." Instead, he said, Bush's plan is "essentially trivial, it's marginal."

Global warming has long been a political sore spot for Bush. During the 2000 campaign, he seemed to doubt that it was a major problem or that human activity contributed to it. "There's differing opinions," he said. "And before we react, I think it's best to have . . . full understanding of what's taking place."

After taking office, he withdrew the United States from Kyoto and, amid energy shortages in California, broke a campaign promise to impose mandatory reductions in power plant carbon dioxide emissions. The Kyoto move did not represent a major policy shift because the Senate had already made clear it would not ratify the pact because of possible economic consequences. But the administration had not prepared allies, and the move became an enduring symbol of Bush defying the world.

In 2002, Bush unveiled a plan to reduce the intensity of greenhouse gases 18 percent by 2012, but environmentalists dismissed his ideas as inadequate. In 2005, however, Europeans sensed a shift when Bush was asked about the issue in Denmark. "Listen," he said, "I recognize that the surface of the Earth is warmer and that an increase in greenhouse gases caused by humans is contributing to the problem."

Climate change began inching up the Bush priority list because of energy security. With oil prices spiking, disruptions to domestic production by Hurricane Katrina in August 2005 convinced Bush that more needed to be done to diversify U.S. supplies, aides said. He declared in last year's State of the Union that "America is addicted to oil." And he chose as Treasury secretary Goldman Sachs Chairman Henry M. Paulson Jr., an advocate for aggressive action on global warming.

Meanwhile, states led by California launched their own efforts to rein in greenhouse gases. Corporate executives began agitating for a consistent national policy.

As the White House began developing a new energy policy in the fall, Paulson pushed for bold action. Instead of a laundry list of small-bore initiatives, officials recalled Paulson saying, they should set an ambitious goal, then determine how to get there, leading to the idea of a major cut in gasoline consumption. By November, prodded by Paulson and Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, officials decided to make curbing greenhouse gases another goal of the policy.

"Since Secretary Bodman was committed to doing something about the climate change issue, he saw [fuel efficiency] as a win-win. It reduces our dependence on foreign oil, the vulnerability of the economy to oil price shocks and helps cut our greenhouse gas emissions," said David W. Conover, former head of the department's climate change technology program.

Outside the administration, another person who may have helped shape the president's thinking was FedEx Chairman Frederick W. Smith, a Bush fundraiser and friend whose business is sensitive to energy costs. During a campaign swing through Memphis last year, Bush attended a private dinner that included Smith. The conversation dwelled on national security but also touched on energy, Smith said later. Smith chaired the Energy Security Leadership Council with former Marine commandant P.X. Kelley and through the fall made the case that a disruption in global supplies could be devastating.

"The dependence of the United States on foreign imported petroleum, after nuclear proliferation, is the country's largest economic and national security issue," Smith said in an interview. "And if the country doesn't do something to reduce the amount of imported petroleum, we're going to have a very unpleasant economic correction or national security challenge."

Smith, Kelley and Goldman Sachs vice chairman Robert Hormats met Dec. 13 with White House economists Al Hubbard and Ed Lazear to present ideas, many resembling those built into the State of the Union. "They were very receptive," Hormats said. "You can tell the difference between a meeting where they're going through the motions and where they're genuinely searching for new ideas. They weren't in defensive mode. They recognized that more needed to be done."

The issue gained momentum on Capitol Hill, too, with Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) toughening a climate change bill and Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) developing a plan closer to the president's. Amid an unusually warm winter in Washington, newly elected House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) created a committee to examine the topic. And the same day Bush outlined his plan, former vice president Al Gore won two Oscar nominations for his global warming documentary.

Bush still opposes Kyoto and argues that greater technology will solve the problem. The White House said he has devoted $29 billion to climate science, aid and incentives, and this week he ordered government agencies to buy more hybrid-fuel cars and otherwise curb the intensity of greenhouse gas emissions by 30 percent by 2015. "We can get beyond . . . the pre-Kyoto era with a post-Kyoto strategy, the center of which is new technologies," he said on a visit to a DuPont facility in Delaware the day after the State of the Union.

Former EPA chief Whitman said that for the first time Bush may be willing to sign carbon emission caps into law. "He's kind of setting up for a carbon-constrained economy," she said. "I don't know whether there will ever be an administration bill, but it may be that he's setting himself up not to veto [someone else's] bill."

Inside Bush's Energy Proposals (WSJ)

By Nick Timiraos

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

Alternative energy: Fuel suppliers would have to include 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels such as ethanol in the nation's vehicle fuel supply by 2017, up from five billion gallons produced last year. Production of corn-based ethanol could reach about 15 billion gallons. The rest could come from cellulosic ethanol, which uses fibers from switch grass and other natural products, or liquefied coal.

Some economists caution that ethanol demand could pressure the corn supply, driving up corn prices because of food-fuel competition. Ethanol demand has already increased chicken prices by six cents a pound, according to the National Chicken Council. The price of corn, 75% of the cost of ethanol production, has doubled to nearly $4 a bushel over the past six months. Almost half of the country's corn harvest could go toward the fuel with the addition of 79 planned ethanol plants in 2008, according to the Earth Policy Institute.

Ethanol costs between $1.45 and $1.65 a gallon to produce and is less efficient than gasoline. A car running on E85 fuel -- reformulated gasoline that is about 85% ethanol -- gets a third less gas mileage than one running on gasoline. The federal government supports ethanol with tax subsidies worth about 51 cents a gallon. Only about 2.5% of cars are considered "flex-fuel," or capable of running on gasoline or ethanol, and even fewer do because less than 1% of the nation's gas stations offer E85.

Environmentalists are cool to corn-based ethanol because it requires so much water, energy and land and produces only slightly more energy than it consumes. A study by the Argonne National Laboratory last year found that a car that runs on E85 produces 20% less greenhouse-gas emissions, which are thought to cause global warming, than one using gasoline. Cellulosic ethanol, on the other hand, offers 80% net energy and could reduce emissions 80%. But the technology to produce cellulosic ethanol economically hasn't been developed. Liquefied coal would increase greenhouse-gas emissions.

Fuel efficiency: The president's plan proposes reducing consumption by 8.5 billion gallons over the next 10 years with stricter gas-mileage standards. Reaching that would require a 4% annual increase in fuel efficiency beginning in 2010 for cars, which would be equivalent to a fuel economy standard of 34 miles a gallon, according to the Union of Concerned Scientists. Currently, auto makers' fleets must meet an average standard of 27.5 mpg for cars and 21.6 mpg for light trucks. The light-truck standard is already set to increase to 24 mpg by 2011. The president's plan would do away with fleet-wide averages and instead assign fuel-economy targets to car models based on their size.

The two proposals present an apparent contradiction. Because ethanol gets less gas mileage than gasoline, mandates for greater use of alternative fuels could undermine efforts to achieve increased fuel economy.

Strategic reserves: The U.S. would more than double its strategic oil reserves to 1.5 billion barrels over the next 20 years to protect against oil-supply disruptions caused by such things as a terrorist attack or natural disaster. At full capacity, the reserves would represent 97 days of net oil imports, up from 690 million barrels today, or 55 days. The Energy Department estimates the expansion would cost $65 billion, with $55 billion for purchasing oil and $10 billion to build new storage facilities, which would join the hollowed-out salt domes along the Gulf Coast.

Very, Very Big Corn (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

President Bush made a big push for alternative fuels in his State of the Union speech Tuesday night, calling on Americans to reduce gasoline consumption by 20% over 10 years. And as soon as the sun rose on Wednesday, he set out to tour a DuPont facility in Delaware to tout the virtues of "cellulosic ethanol" and propose $2 billion in loans to promote the stuff. For a man who famously hasn't taken a drink for 20 years, that's a considerable intake of alcohol.

A bit of sobriety would go a long way in discussing this moonshine of the energy world, however. Cellulosic ethanol -- which is derived from plants like switchgrass -- will require a big technological breakthrough to have any impact on the fuel supply. That leaves corn- and sugar-based ethanol, which have been around long enough to understand their significant limitations. What we have here is a classic political stampede rooted more in hope and self-interest than science or logic. * * *

Ostensibly, the great virtue of ethanol is that it represents a "sustainable," environmentally friendly source of energy -- a source that is literally homegrown rather than imported from such unstable places as Nigeria or Iran.

That's one reason why, as Jerry Taylor and Peter Van Doren note in the Milken Institute Review, federal and state subsidies for ethanol ran to about $6 billion last year, equivalent to roughly half its wholesale market price. Ethanol gets a 51-cent a gallon domestic subsidy, and there's another 54-cent a gallon tariff applied at the border against imported ethanol. Without those subsidies, hardly anyone would make the stuff, much less buy it -- despite recent high oil prices.

That's also why the percentage of the U.S. corn crop devoted to ethanol has risen to 20% from 3% in just five years, or about 8.6 million acres of farmland. Reaching the President's target of 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017 would, at present corn yields, require the entire U.S. corn harvest.

No wonder, then, that the price of corn rose nearly 80% in 2006 alone. (See the chart nearby.) Corn growers and their Congressmen love this, and naturally they are planting as much as they can. Look for a cornfield in your neighborhood soon. Yet for those of us who like our corn flakes in the morning, the higher price isn't such good news. It's even worse for cattle, poultry and hog farmers trying to adjust to suddenly exorbitant prices for feed corn -- to pick just one industry example. The price of corn is making America's meat-packing industries, which are major exporters, less competitive.

In Mexico, the price of corn tortillas -- the dietary staple of the country's poorest -- has risen by about 30% in recent months, leading to widespread protests and price controls. In China, the government has put a halt to ethanol-plant construction for the threat it poses to the country's food security. Thus is a Beltway fad translated into Third World woes.

As for the environmental impact, well, where do we begin? As an oxygenate, ethanol increases the level of nitrous oxides in the atmosphere and thus causes smog. The scientific literature is also divided about whether the energy inputs required to produce ethanol actually exceed its energy output. It takes fertilizer to grow the corn, and fuel to ship and process it, and so forth. Even the most optimistic estimate says ethanol's net energy output is a marginal improvement of only 1.3 to one. For purposes of comparison, energy outputs from gasoline exceed inputs by an estimated 10 to one.

And because corn-based ethanol is less efficient than ordinary gasoline, using it to fuel cars means you need more gas to drive the same number of miles. This is not exactly a route to "independence" from Mideast, Venezuelan or any other tainted source of oil. Ethanol also cannot be shipped using existing pipelines (being alcohol, it eats the seals), so it must be trucked or sent by barge or train to its thousand-and-one destinations, at least until separate pipelines are built.

Even some environmentalists cry foul. Steve Sanderson, president of the Wildlife Conservation Society, tells us that intensive, subsidized sugar farming in Brazil -- where the use of ethanol is most widespread -- has displaced small tenant farmers, many of whom have taken to cutting down and farming land in the Amazon rain forest.

In the U.S., there is now talk of taking the roughly 40 million acres currently tied up in the Agriculture Department's conservation reserve and security programs and putting them into production for ethanol-related plants. "The land at risk under this ethanol program is land that's shown by the USDA to have had great results for the restoration of wildlife," Mr. Sanderson says, pointing especially to the grasslands of eastern Montana and the Dakotas. Hello ethanol, goodbye bison.

But what about global warming, where ethanol, as a non-fossil fuel, is supposed to make a positive contribution? Actually, it barely makes a dent. Australian researcher Robert Niven finds that the use of ethanol in gasoline -- the standard way in which ethanol is currently used -- reduces greenhouse gas emissions by no more than 5%. As Messrs. Taylor and Van Doren observe, "employing ethanol to reduce greenhouse gases is fantastically inefficient," costing as much as 16 times the optimal abatement cost for removing a ton of carbon from the atmosphere. * * *

It's true that scientific advances will probably improve and perhaps even transform the utility of ethanol. Genetic modification will likely improve corn yields. And the President insists we are on the verge of breakthroughs in cellulosic technology, though experts tell us the technical hurdles are still huge. We'd be as happy as anyone if DuPont researchers finally discover the enzyme that can efficiently break down plants into starch, but betting billions of tax dollars and millions of acres of farmland on this hope strikes us as bad policy. If cellulose is going to be an energy miracle -- an agricultural cold fusion -- far better to let the market figure that out.

Not that any of these facts are likely to make much difference in the current Washington debate. The corn and sugar lobbies have their roots deep in both parties, and now they have the mantra of "energy independence" to invoke, however illusory it is. If anything, Congress may add to Mr. Bush's ethanol mandate requests.

So here comes Big Corn. Make that Very, Very Big Corn. Sooner or later, our experience with this huge public gamble may make us yearn for the efficiency, capacity, lower cost and -- yes -- superior environmental record of "Big Oil."

Mr. Bush's Oil Security Blanket (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

One of the stranger and so far unexplained items in President Bush's energy program is his proposal to double the capacity of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, to 1.5 billion barrels, over the next 20 years. The proposal carries a $65 billion price tag — one of several reasons Congress should question Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman closely when he comes looking for the money.

The reserve's purpose is to provide an emergency supply of oil in the event of, say, a terrorist attack somewhere along the global oil supply chain or a natural disaster that sharply limits imports for a short time. The United States is highly vulnerable to such interruptions. It has only 3 percent of global oil reserves but accounts for 25 percent of consumption — more than 20 million barrels a day, about 60 percent of it imported. The reserve now holds 55 days worth of net oil imports. After the increase, there would be an estimated 97 days of protection.

A larger reserve would seem to make sense in the post-9/11 world, and last year's energy bill did in fact authorize an expansion to one billion barrels. But is there nothing better to do with the money? Might it not be more usefully deployed developing alternative fuels or more efficient vehicles, thus reducing the nation's dependence on oil and its vulnerability to future shocks?

The $2.7 billion the administration proposes to spend on this project each year for the next 20 years is three times the amount that Congress authorized last year for the Energy Department's entire research and development program for alternative energy sources. It may be necessary to increase backup supplies. But the administration would be a lot more persuasive if it displayed a deeper commitment to programs that would provide lasting security by reducing Americans' consumption of oil, rather than just squirreling it away.

Bush Proposes Budget Increase For Ocean Programs (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123746

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush on Friday proposed an 8% increase in the $1.75 billion federal budget for coastal and marine conservation programs.

The president hopes "to clean up our oceans and coastlines," said Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, whose agency includes the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which would get most of the additional $143 million budget request.

NOAA would receive $123 million, allowing it to do more research and improve ocean protections, said Arden Bement, director of the National Science Foundation.

Another $20 million would go to the National Science Foundation and the U.S. Geological Survey, helping increase research, sea floor mapping, forecast models, and water quality monitoring in the Gulf of Mexico, Chesapeake Bay and other coastal areas.

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said the budget request reflects the awareness that oceans no longer can be considered inexhaustible or indestructible.

"Only in recent decades have we come to realize we must take care of them as we would take care of any precious natural resource," he said.

This month, Bush signed into law a measure that overhauls management of marine fisheries and strengthens protections against further depletion of dwindling stocks. It reauthorizes through 2013 the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act, a 30-year-old law that guides fishery management in waters between three miles and 200 miles offshore. It also aims to end overfishing in America by 2011.

Last year, Bush created a vast new marine sanctuary, extending stronger federal protections to the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands and surrounding waters in the Pacific Ocean that are home to endangered monk seals, nesting green sea turtles and other rare species.

He also sought to have the United Nations impose a full-fledged ban against unregulated and destructive bottom trawling on the high seas, but he was opposed by fishing nations that sponsor the boats that drag the giant nets along the sea floor.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Artists Rescue Coca Heritage (AP)

By Joshua Goodman, Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia - You're unlikely to see Milena Bonilla's artwork on display in a New York gallery. Just mounting one of her installations inside the United States could land the 30-year-old artist in jail.

That's because, instead of oil on canvas, Bonilla's preferred medium is coca leaf, the base ingredient for cocaine. Classified as a dangerous substance, importing the plant is a felony without U.S. Justice Department permission.

The stalky shrub, which Bonilla planted in 12 two-liter plastic Coca-Cola bottles sheared off at the spout, is getting a makeover by a cadre of artists who want to wrest coca's millennial heritage and aesthetic appeal from the teeth of the war on drugs.

But the main target of so-called coca art may be Colombia President Alvaro Uribe, who has become the plant's chief eradicator as caretaker of the United States' $4 billion war on drugs.

Amid an upsurge in anti-American sentiment, several leftist leaders in the Andes have embraced the virtues of the much-maligned leaf even as the conservative Uribe - Washington's staunchest regional ally - has committed himself to its annihilation.

When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice first met with President Evo Morales of Bolivia in Chile, the former coca grower presented her with a charango - a Bolivian ukulele - decorated with lacquered coca leaves. To avoid a run-in with U.S. customs authorities, the diplomat left the present behind. President Alan Garcia of Peru, who is a relative moderate in the region, suggested to foreign journalists that the calcium-rich leaf tastes great in a salad.

Bonilla's installation, "Legal Consumption," was one of a handful invited last year to partake in the 40th National Salon of Artists, a showcase of Colombia's most innovative artists. She calls it a meditation on the hypocrisies of a marketplace that commercially exploits a plant most countries ban in its natural form.

"The worst part is that in its artificial form, used in a sugary soft-drink, coca carries a lot of health risks and none of the medicinal benefits traditionally associated with the plant," complained Bonilla.

DOJ_NMG_0123747

Coca's scientific name, erythoxylon novograntense, refers to the Spanish viceroyalty of Nueva Granada, which spanned Colombia, Ecuador and Venezuela. Across the Andes, the plant has been chewed as a hunger suppressant and stimulant for millennia, and the legal cultivation of small quantities is still permitted in Colombia for medicinal and ceremonial purposes.

But under Uribe, the plant's namesake habitat has been under constant assault by U.S.-supplied crop duster planes that chemically eradicated a record 445,000 acres of the plant last year - 31 percent more than in 2005, also a record year.

In a parody of this aggressive pursuit, Wilson Diaz exhibited "Uribe: The Eradicator," his drawing of the hunched-over president uprooting a coca plant with his hands, as part of a photo exhibit documenting the many places where the coca shrub can still be found in Diaz's native city of Cali, from ornamental hedges in upscale gardens to wild growths just outside an army barrack.

The aim, Diaz says, is to "deconstruct our understanding of the thin line between what's legal and illegal."

Diaz, 43, personally opposes the legalization of drugs - a result of his upbringing in the southern city of 2 million, which suffered more than most the cartel-driven violence of the late 1980s and early 1990s. But for its shock value, he says coca is unrivaled for its deviant symbolism.

Since 1996, Diaz has tried everything from handing out free coca seeds to unsuspecting horticulturists in Liverpool, England, to a videotaped performance in which he replicated the journey of a drug "mule" by swallowing 30 coca seeds, boarding a plane and voiding the seeds on foreign soil.

In 2004, New York-based e-flux, an online art forum, published Diaz' answer to "The Anarchist's Cookbook," the once underground bomb-making manual that was required reading for the anti-war movement in the 1970s. Called "How to obtain one kilogram of high quality cocaine in twenty steps," it is a precise and ultimately impractical instruction manual for making the narcotic at home from 1,500 pounds of coca leaves.

"To date, I don't know anyone who's tried it," said Diaz.

Unlike Diaz and Bonilla, Miguel Angel Rojas' coca artwork is based less on art theory and more on personal experience - or survival. The 61-year old artist, whose mixed medium work is well-known abroad, narrowly escaped from a drug addiction that claimed the lives of many of his friends in the reckless, sex-crazed Colombian art world of the 1980s.

In 1999, he used hole-punched pieces of coca to re-create the title of Richard Hamilton's iconic 1956 pop-art work "What makes today's homes so different, so attractive?"

The shared responsibility between producer and consumer for Colombia's drug-fueled violence is the subject of his latest work, a diptych featuring the words New York and Medellin - the former comprised entirely of confetti dots of dollar bills and the latter of coca leaves.

"It's like throwing salt on an open wound. I want to force the coke consumer to fess up to their share of the blame," said Rojas.

The odyssey Rojas underwent trying to exhibit his work in May at Houston's Sicardi Gallery, where it sold for $4,000, is a parable of the drug-stained stigma any Colombian must face when traveling abroad. Held for days by U.S. customs officials, four of his canvases were returned, hours before his show's opening, full of tiny holes from probing.

Ironically, although officials routinely search artwork for false bottoms and coca-impregnated canvases, they failed to notice the illegal substance when it was in plain view.

"This is the reason why I work with coca - there's nothing romantic about it," said Rojas. "I want to show the world the violence we Colombians must face daily as a result of their drug habit."

Targeting Cross-border Gangs (LAT)

By Duke Helfand And Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

The FBI will join L.A. police officials to train Latin American authorities in how to track 'transnational' street criminals.

Seeking to combat the spread of street gangs across international borders, the FBI will join forces with Los Angeles police and prosecutors next month to teach authorities from Mexico, El Salvador and other Latin American countries how to better track and investigate gang crime.

The three-day training in Los Angeles comes amid an alarming increase in "transnational" gangs that move between countries despite repeated efforts to dismantle their organizations and finances, authorities said.

The U.S. law enforcement officials will focus much of their attention on how they have dealt with local gangs that have gained footholds in Mexico and Central America.

DOJ_NMG_0123748

Special attention will be given, for example, to the MS13 and 18th Street gangs, both of which began in Los Angeles but have branched out to Central America, federal officials said. About 12 of 17 members of the 18th Street gang arrested in Los Angeles in September were foreign nationals, the officials said.

The training will include discussions about which laws countries use — or do not use — to attack gang problems. El Salvador, for example, does not allow wiretapping, a strategy employed by U.S. authorities to monitor gang activity.

"Many of these countries are seeing an influence of street gangs that evolved in Los Angeles but are moving [there] because of deportation," said Lt. Paul Vernon, a spokesman for the Los Angeles Police Department. "Many of these are hardened criminals."

The interagency training Feb. 7-9 will occur as Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton unveil their strategies for dealing with the city's own 39,000 gang members. They are expected to call for a multi-agency effort using court orders, injunctions and stepped-up enforcement to target Los Angeles' most dangerous gangs. Among those expected to attend the FBI summit are Bratton, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca and representatives of the city attorney and district attorney.

They will be joined by agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, the Department of Homeland Security, the State Department and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, as well as the Justice Department's new assistant attorney general for gangs and violence.

Police officials from other cities in California, Virginia and Maryland are also scheduled to attend.

The foreign police presence also will be formidable. It will include the directors of the national police forces of El Salvador, Honduras, Belize and Guatemala, as well as police chiefs from major cities in Mexico, according to Robert Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal division for the FBI's Los Angeles office.

"Essentially it is to get everybody together to build partnerships and provide for better communications and information sharing," said Loosle, who added that the exchange would continue at an April conference in El Salvador.

Villaraigosa did not mention the gang training during a news conference Friday at which he discussed his trip this week to Washington, D.C. But the mayor insisted that the responsibility for enforcing immigration laws rested with the federal government.

"Los Angeles is not in the position to crack down on illegal immigration," he said.

Still, Matt Szabo, a spokesman for the mayor, said the city was an enthusiastic partner in the FBI training. "It's absolutely necessary," Szabo said. "It's a big deal."

In El Salvador, law enforcement officials noted a 300% increase in extortions last year over the year before, including kidnappings in which families were told to wire money to people in Los Angeles, Loosle said. With a population of nearly 7 million, El Salvador has been experiencing about 10 homicides a day, with 60% to 70% of them gang-related, he said.

Suspected Cartel Boss Hires McAllen Lawyer For Defense Team (MCAMON)

By Andres R. Martinez, Monitor Staff Writer

McAllen (TX) Monitor, January 27, 2007

McALLEN — Suspected Gulf Cartel leader Osiel Cardenas-Guillen has hired prominent McAllen lawyer Roberto Yzaguirre as part of his defense team in a federal drug case that prompted Cardenas' extradition from Mexico a week ago.

Cardenas-Guillen, who faces a 17-count indictment out of Brownsville, was flown to the United States on Jan. 19 with 14 other fugitives.

He appeared in court once this week, but the judge closed the proceedings to the public. His arraignment is set for Feb. 1 in Houston. It's unclear whether the trial will be in Brownsville or Houston.

Yzaguirre defended the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel's former head, Juan Garcia Abrego, in another federal drug case in 1996. Unlike Cardenas, who was first tried in Mexico before being extradited, Mexican authorities whisked Garcia out of the country without a trial the day after he was arrested.

U.S. Justice Department officials told reporters Monday that Cardenas-Guillen was responsible for smuggling 4 to 6 tons of cocaine a month into the United States from 1999 to 2003. They also claimed he is responsible for a majority of the violence associated with drug cartels during the last few years, including the attempted murder of FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Matamoros.

Cardenas-Guillen had been running the cartel from his prison cell in Mexico since 2003, according to Mexican authorities.

Yzaguirre was also the lawyer for Guillermo Gonzalez Calderoni, Mexico's former drug czar. Calderoni led Mexico's effort against drug cartels in the early 1990s, but later fled the country after rumors spread that he protected some cartels.

DOJ_NMG_0123749

Calderoni lived in McAllen for about a decade. Yzaguirre successfully represented him when Mexico twice tried to have him brought back to Mexico to face charges. The former Mexican official was gunned down leaving Yzaguirre's office Feb. 5, 2003.

Yzaguirre referred all questions about Cardenas-Guillen to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Houston.

Video Recovered In US Marshals Shooting (WUSA)

By Dave Statter

WUSA-TV, CBS 9, Washington, DC, January 27, 2007

The shooting of a 16 year old by US Marshals is caught on camera. An attorney for the teen wounded on January 3 on 4th Street Southeast, says he recovered video from 4 different cameras.

David Shurtz says the images paint a different picture than the story given by a US Marshals Service spokesman.

On the day of the shooting the spokesman said deputy marshals working an eviction fired on a teenager who tried to run them over with a car. Shurtz says the video doesn't show any deputy marshal in danger of being hit by the vehicle. Shurtz and the teen's mother believe their is a cover-up by the Marshals Service.

Spokesman Dave Turner denies there is a cover up. Here is Turner's complete statement sent by email Thursday to 9NEWS NOW:

"The U.S. Marshals Service takes this shooting incident very seriously. We are processing the case according to our standard procedures, which call for the initial investigation to be conducted by the Metropolitan Police Department. That's underway right now, and we're cooperating with them to the fullest extent. There isn't 'a cover up' because we're responding appropriately to the investigation. After the completion of MPD's independent investigation, this agency will receive the matter for internal review to see if there were any violations of our own policies, or Justice Department's."

Ex-ATF Agent Cross-examined In City Suit (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2007

CHICAGO -- Lawyers for the city of Chicago and former Police Officer Joseph Miedzianowski on Friday cross-examined a one-time ATF agent who contends she lost her job after confronting the officer about corruption.

Diane Klipfel and her husband are suing the city, alleging that Miedzianowski was protected and turned internal investigations against them after they tried to bring his activities to light in 1992.

Miedzianowski was arrested six years later and was convicted of running a Chicago-to-Miami drug ring.

The attorneys attempted to show that Klipfel had significant issues with her ATF employers that had nothing to do with a detail she worked with Miedzianowski. They went through Klipfel's history of filing complaints against her bosses and asked about some of the reasons she may have been dismissed from ATF.

A lawyer for the city, Sara Ellis, asked whether Klipfel took any of her complaints about Miedzianowski directly to Chicago police internal affairs. She said that she did not.

Ellis also asked whether any harm had come to her or her children; Klipfel testified this week that she was threatened.

"You're still alive, right?" Ellis asked.

"So far," Klipfel said.

Trial Of Accused Bomb Maker Ends In Hung Jury (MOBPR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile (AL) Press-Register, January 26, 2007

Jurors weighing criminal charges against accused bomb maker Gregory Wendell Nichols reported Thursday that they were hopelessly deadlocked, prompting the judge to declare a mistrial.

The charges remain pending, unless federal prosecutors in Mobile move to dismiss them. They said they will confer among themselves before deciding whether to try the case again.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Anderson asked Senior U.S. Circuit Judge Emmett "Rip" Cox to set the case for March, which would give prosecutors an extra month to decide if they want to proceed. He stated in a written motion that a February setting would not give enough time to either side to coordinate with their expert witnesses from out of town. He also indicated that both sides would like to explore the possibility of a plea bargain.

Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden said he does not know whether the U.S. attorney's office ultimately plans to take another shot at the 46-year-old car salesman from Flomaton.

"That's up to them. If they do, we expect Mr. Nichols will be acquitted," he said.

Acting on a tip, agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5. Getting permission to search his pickup truck, they found five explosive devices and charged him with violations of federal firearms laws.

Nichols admitted that he made the devices from spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He said he packed the cylindrical canisters, a couple of inches long, with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape, and attached a firecracker fuse.

Nichols told jurors that he made the devices -- which he referred to as firecrackers -- to drop into a river to watch the explosions. He said he and his fiancée did this with a batch of devices he had made in June and planned to do it again before ATF agents arrested him.

Aglice Messer, Nichols' mother, said she hopes prosecutors decide to drop the case. "I just feel like they're picking on the wrong person," she said. "He's ready to get it over with."

The trial featured dueling testimony from experts. James Jason Harrell, an explosive enforcement officer with the ATF in Atlanta, compared the modified carbon dioxide cartridges to hand grenades. He testified that in tests he conducted, the cartridges blasted apart, sending metal fragments in different directions.

The testimony was designed to help prosecutors meet their burden of proving that the device was a weapon with no other "legitimate social or commercial purpose."

Madden attacked Harrell's credibility, noting that he falsely claimed on a résumé to have a college degree. Harrell explained that he was set to graduate in December but had to push back the date until this coming March because his wife suffered a health problem.

John Nixon, a firearms, ballistics and explosives consultant who testified for the defense, told jurors the devices were "puny" compared with weapons used by the military. He acknowledged under cross-examination, however, that the device could cause injury and that fragments sprung from the explosion could travel at speeds comparable to a bullet from a .45-caliber gun.

Under cross-examination, Nichols denied assertions by the prosecution that he had threatened his fiancée and her family with the bombs. Assistant U.S. Attorney George May suggested that the woman had not been seen from since the day ATF agents arrested Nichols.

But prosecutors never offered any evidence to back up those suggestions, and Madden said in an interview Thursday that they were baseless. He said prosecutors did not subpoena the woman.

"As far as I know, she's still living in Flomaton," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Unions Split On Immigrant Workers (WP)

By Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Union leaders are fundamentally divided over how to best tackle immigration reform as they wrestle with how to convert illegal immigrants from job threats to dues-paying members. The split reflects long-standing questions over the place of undocumented immigrants in the labor movement.

One side supports a guest-worker program, which could permit hundreds of thousands of immigrants to enter the country annually depending on the needs of U.S. businesses. The other side says such programs encourage employers to pay less, exploit immigrant workers and drive down working conditions for everyone.

The Service Employees International Union, with many immigrants among its 1.8 million members, backs the guest-worker idea, leading it to an unusual labor-business alliance with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The AFL-CIO, a federation of 54 unions, calls guest-worker programs exploitative and wants immigrants who enter the country to do so as permanent residents, not temporary workers.

Eliseo Medina, executive vice president of SEIU, which broke from the AFL-CIO in 2005 over strategic differences, said his union recognizes "the reality of the marketplace and the economy." A guest-worker program could give immigrant workers the right to unionize and eventually petition for citizenship, he said.

Immigration reform, which congressional leaders and President Bush have called a priority, has wide implications throughout the U.S. labor movement. Last year, the Senate proposed a guest-worker program that would have made immigrants temporary residents and employers responsible for requesting their green cards.

DOJ_NMG_0123751

Unions universally opposed that proposal and are trying to shape a plan to their liking, but their divided voices could dilute their message.

Immigrants are the fastest-growing sector of the U.S. workforce and organizing them has been a priority for unions as they shift from a message of "protect American jobs."

"It's a sea change from the early 1990s when immigrant labor was viewed by many as the enemy of organized labor," said Harley Shaiken, director of the Center for Latin American Studies at the University of California at Berkeley. "Now labor recognizes the reality of 12 million undocumented people in this country and the complexity of how to regularize that."

When thousands of immigrants marched on the National Mall last year, many of the organizers were union leaders. The spokesman for the Washington region's immigrant coalition was also the leader of a SEIU local. AFL-CIO leaders also stood with immigrant activists at marches, and last year they formed an alliance with a national group of day-laborer centers.

For some, guest-worker programs awaken memories of the government-sanctioned -- and flawed -- Bracero Program that operated from 1942 to 1964. It locked immigrants, mostly Mexican men, into English-language contracts that they could not understand and made them beholden to farm bosses. At the end of their contracts, under which they picked sugar beets, cotton and other crops for long hours and low pay, the immigrants were deported.

Ana AvendaÃ±o, the AFL-CIO's associate general counsel, called today's guest-worker programs, which tie immigrant workers' visas to their U.S. employers, "modern-day Bracero Programs."

"The bells and whistles they are currently adding to the temporary workers programs are bound to fail, they have been proven to fail," she said.

Medina said the SEIU advocates a guest-worker program with visas that would let workers change jobs, join unions and petition for permanent residency.

"Workers that come here would have full protections of our labor rights, including the right to organize, and they would have an independent method of enforcing those rights," Medina said.

SEIU's support of a revamped guest-worker program reflects a desire to create politically tenable immigration reform. Bush has said that his support of immigration reform hangs on the inclusion of a temporary-worker provision.

"Immigrants really want something. There's such desperation for some resolution of this mess," said Ruth Milkman, a professor of industrial sociology at the University of California at Los Angeles.

But SEIU's temporary-worker proposal is nothing like the president's plan to connect "willing employers with willing workers" or the guest-worker provisions floated in Congress, which would not give workers the right to independently petition for permanent residency.

Finding middle ground could be tough. Broad support is needed to change immigration laws, said proponents of increased immigration, who have been pushing to rewrite the laws for years.

"As the process goes along, I think there's a framework for the labor movement to come together," Medina said. "It won't be an easy process, but it can happen."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Focuses On Iraq At GOP Retreat (RC)

By Susan Davis

RollCall.com, January 26, 2007

President Bush spent nearly two hours at the House Republican retreat today in further efforts to build support for his Iraq War strategy and to allay concerns that Congressional Republicans could be sidelined in the legislative process under Democratic control.

“I appreciate your understanding that we’re still a nation at war,” Bush told the nearly 160 Members in attendance. “You know, when I talked to the country the other night, I wish I could have reported differently, but it’s not the truth and it’s not the reality. There’s an enemy out there that would still like to strike us. And as I said, and I know most of you believe, the best way to defend this country is to stay on the offense and bring the enemy to justice before they hurt us again.”

While Bush’s opening remarks received lukewarm applause — they largely mirrored his State of the Union address on Tuesday — House Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) said Bush received “several” standing ovations in the closed-door question-and-answer session afterward.

“It did a lot of good to have the president here, and to have Members hear him, and be able to confront him if they had a question about policy, and to hear him and his conviction to continue to win and do all we can to succeed in Iraq,” Cantor said.

DOJ_NMG_0123752

The House and Senate are on track to vote on a resolution soon that is expected to be a referendum on Bush's war plan. Democratic leaders have said they expect significant bipartisan support opposing the president's strategy.

However, Cantor said recent Whip meetings have shown encouraging signs that the GOP may be more unified than Democrats anticipate.

"I've gotten a lot of positive reception," Cantor said. "I think, again, this was an opportunity for Members to get together and to understand that we are a party of principle and to stand up and do all we can to back the commander in chief and succeed and win in Iraq."

Approximately 15 Members questioned the president on Iraq and a range of policy matters, including health care and immigration.

"This was a full discussion," said House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.), who said the president helped assure Republicans they will not be cut out of the process in the 110th Congress.

"He's no triangulator," Putnam said.

Putnam added that while Bush strongly advocated his policy in Iraq, he did not expressly ask House Members for anything in return. "He didn't say 'Please support me.' He said, 'Here's what happens if this doesn't work,'" Putnam said.

Sources in the room said one of the standing ovations was prompted by Rep. Mike Ferguson (R-N.J.), who told Bush that House Members were equally committed to success in Iraq.

As for the Iraq resolution, House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) reiterated Thursday that the leadership would not put pressure on its Members as to how to vote on the floor. "This is a war," Boehner said. "As a leadership team you can't make this a party unity vote."

At Lawmakers' Retreat, Pep Talks Address Concerns Of The New G.O.P. Minority (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Md., Jan. 26 — President Bush tried to rally House Republicans on Friday as the lawmakers hunkered down on the Eastern Shore and struggled to come to grips with their new minority status and the challenge of the continuing war in Iraq.

Gathered to plot how to make their stay in the minority as brief as possible, 160 House Republicans were exhorted by Mr. Bush to work with him on education, health care, immigration and retirement issues and to give his troop buildup in Iraq a chance to work.

"I fully understand there are differences of opinion, but one of the things I have discovered is in Washington, D.C., most people understand the consequences of failure," Mr. Bush said. "And if failure is not an option, then it's up to the president to come up with a plan that is more likely to succeed."

After his public comments, Mr. Bush took more than a dozen questions from lawmakers in a closed session. Republican leaders said Mr. Bush offered a detailed explanation of his Iraq strategy and made it clear that he understood the political pressure the war was putting on lawmakers back home. They said the president's determination bolstered the Republican rank and file, which will face a fight over a Democratic resolution opposing the president's new strategy.

Representative Adam Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference, said Mr. Bush told lawmakers that "because I sleep in the White House, don't think I don't know what is going on out there." Mr. Putnam said that that "reminds people that he really does get it and understands what ordinary members are going through."

"And he said: 'Know this,' " Mr. Putnam said. " 'There is a commander in chief and I ran for this office and that is the expectation of this office and the responsibility of this office.' " The comments came on a day the administration stepped up its campaign against Congressional opposition to the troop increase.

Though House Republicans have been among the president's most reliable supporters, there is deep skepticism among even these loyalists about whether his new Iraq plan will work. The skepticism is coupled with political unease about what may happen if the plan does not — particularly after election losses influenced by public frustration with the war.

Mr. Bush sought to allay those concerns and made a veiled reference to calls by some Democrats to block spending on the added troops, noting that he had met earlier in the day with Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus after the Senate confirmed the general as the new commander in Iraq.

"It reminded me as the president I must make sure he has everything he needs, that he thinks he needs to succeed in the mission that we have sent him on," Mr. Bush said. "And I look forward to working with you to make sure that our generals and our troops that we put into harm's way have the support of the United States Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0123753

In his public comments, Mr. Bush made no mention of the recent election's outcome for his party, though he seemed pleased to see no sign of the Democrats.

"I'm glad to be among friends," said Mr. Bush, who is scheduled to visit a Democratic retreat next week.

The majority of House Republicans attending the two-day retreat at a resort in this historic waterfront community have never served in the minority, having joined the House after the Republican takeover in 1994.

Trying to inspire the House members, the party leadership brought in Newt Gingrich, the former speaker and the architect of the 1994 victory, who urged them to think big. They examined where they lost direction in the months leading up to the midterm elections and what they could do to recover. Lou Holtz, the former football coach who led Notre Dame to a national championship in 1988, delivered what was described as a rousing motivational speech.

Many House Republican lawmakers and senior aides acknowledged that the sudden loss of the majority had been a shock and that they were having difficulty adjusting. People who once ruled the House find themselves with much less to do and much less power with which to do it. The Republicans also believe they have been badly mistreated by the new Democratic majority in the opening days of the 110th Congress, as Democrats who promised a more inclusive House rammed through their priority legislation with little consideration for Republican views.

But the new minority has won little sympathy, given that the Democrats complained bitterly that Republicans ran roughshod over them in the 12-year Republican reign, subjecting Democrats to some of the same treatment.

Republican officials said the question-and-answer session with the president covered a variety of issues and touched on one lawmaker's flood control project. The president was applauded for his new health care push, and lawmakers said he gave no ground on immigration — a subject on which he and House Republicans have diverged. Republicans compared the session to a frank family discussion.

"I felt it did a lot of good to have the president here," said Representative Eric Cantor of Virginia, the chief deputy whip.

Bush Rallies GOP On Iraq Plan (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- President Bush yesterday rallied House Republicans gathered for their annual retreat, saying the party can unite around his domestic agenda but acknowledging his ideas are overshadowed by fractured positions on the Iraq war.

Republican leaders said Mr. Bush explained the importance of success in Iraq without explicitly asking them to support his plan to send 21,500 more troops there.

"It did a lot of good to have the president here [and] have our members ... be able to confront him if they had a question about the policy and to hear him and his conviction to continue to win and do all we can to succeed in Iraq," said Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, the deputy Republican whip.

"The president said these are tough times, war is never easy," Mr. Cantor said. "Unlike what the other side is going to present on the floor, we're going to do what's right. We're going to stand by our troops."

Democrats who control Congress are planning a vote next week on a nonbinding resolution opposing the president's plan.

Mr. Bush's public remarks on Iraq yesterday were largely repeated from his State of the Union address on Tuesday, but he stayed for a private session with the 160 members attending the retreat. Leaders later described the one-hour talk as a "frank," "unabashed," "good family discussion."

Republican Conference Chairman Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida said Mr. Bush's talk was filled with his trademark decisiveness: "He's no triangulator."

Mr. Bush took questions from more than a dozen members about domestic issues and his Iraq plan, which several Republican senators have openly criticized.

"He didn't say, 'Please support me.' He said here's what happens if this doesn't work,' " Mr. Putnam said.

Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio on Thursday identified Iraq as "first and foremost" why Republicans lost their congressional majority in November's midterm elections.

Mr. Bush told members he understands the war poses a political difficulty for them.

"That reminds people he really does get it," Mr. Putnam said.

According to a source in the room during the private discussions, Rep. Mike Ferguson of New Jersey told Mr. Bush: "We want you to succeed in Iraq," prompting members to applaud wildly.

During his public remarks, Mr. Bush said he thinks the war in Iraq is key to the war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0123754

"I fully understand there are differences of opinion, but one of the things I have discovered is in Washington, D.C., most people understand the consequences of failure," Mr. Bush said. "The plan I outlined to the American people is one that I believe can succeed."

Mr. Boehner said most members support a Republican resolution calling for the creation of a bipartisan panel to oversee the implementation of the troop surge and setting benchmarks for the plan's progress.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, has dismissed the idea. Republican leaders said they will not try to force a party-line vote on the Democratic war resolution because "this is war [and] you can't try to make this some party loyalty vote."

But Mr. Cantor said yesterday he asked members at the retreat: "Does anybody feel the need to or are compelled to have to vote for Mrs. Pelosi's resolution or can you stand up and support our troops?"

Washington Bush Going Into The Lion's Den In Test Of Brittle Bipartisanship (WSJ)

By Gerald F. Seib

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

President Bush travels to Williamsburg, Va., next Saturday to meet with the entire House Democratic delegation. It will be a real "Kumbaya" moment for the nation's leaders, a sign of a new spirit of bipartisanship in Washington.

Well, maybe. To some extent. While it lasts.

Those caveats reflect the uncertain nature of bipartisan cooperation in Washington right now, almost four weeks into power-sharing between a Republican president and a Democratic Congress. The rhetoric of bipartisanship, at least, remains alive, and in that spirit Mr. Bush accepted an offer to meet behind closed doors with the House's Democrats, who will be on their own previously scheduled retreat.

The president's appearance was the brainchild of Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Caucus. He describes it as "a chance for him to speak to Democrats directly, confidentially, in a personal way." Similarly, a senior White House aide characterizes the appearance as a way to open some lines of communication, which in turn might help build some trust.

As a former senior adviser in the Clinton White House, Rep. Emanuel knew that the idea made sense for both sides -- and that the president could hardly say no. For Democrats, the invitation is an important way to make good, at least in a symbolic way, on pledges they made to voters to try to work across the aisle. For Mr. Bush, refusing to walk into the Democratic lion's den would make him appear to be the one standing in the way of cooperation.

Moreover, a meaningful private conversation might be a way to help both sides figure out how much common ground there really is. Right now it's hard to tell. Democrats in the 435-seat House, for example, have been getting some Republican votes for their legislative initiatives, but not overwhelming numbers: 82 to raise the minimum wage and 37 to expand embryonic stem cell research, but only eight to set up a panel to oversee intelligence spending.

Other, quieter steps are happening. Rep. Emanuel, for instance recently hosted a dinner with 10 moderate Republicans, and may have other such small sessions.

But it's increasingly obvious there simply won't be any bipartisan understanding on the biggest issue of the year, Iraq. And, whatever its extent, the bipartisan impulse has a life span that runs, at best, until this summer's August recess. After that, nearly everything will be tinged by the 2008 presidential campaign. That leaves limited time, and a limited set of issues, energy and immigration the most interesting among them, for which something bipartisan can actually happen.

It's worth remembering that Mr. Bush has been here before. When he became governor of Texas, Democrats controlled both houses of the state legislature. Mr. Bush developed a reputation for working the Democratic side pretty well, and he got meaningful results to show for it. That's why talking directly to Democrats, while at least a few people are still humming "Kumbaya," makes sense for both sides.

Health Plan's Impact Debated (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

President Bush likes to say that his health-care proposal would "level the playing field" between people who get health coverage through their job and those who buy it on their own.

But experts said yesterday that it would tilt that field toward a kind of health insurance that Bush has long favored -- a high-deductible plan paired with a special tax-exempt health savings account, or HSA.

"I think it would be a big push for HSAs," said Mark B. McClellan, a health economist and former top health-policy adviser to Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0123755

While McClellan thinks that would be a good thing, other experts said it would benefit the wealthy and undercut Bush's goal of bringing fairness to the private health insurance system.

In contrast with traditional health plans that typically charge $20 co-payments for visits to the doctor, high-deductible plans require consumers to pay hundreds or thousands of dollars out of pocket for medications, physicians' services and hospital care before most insurance coverage kicks in. The deductibles are steep, at least $2,200 for family coverage, compared with about $220 in a traditional plan. But the special savings accounts enable people to accumulate a tax-free pool of their own money to pay the deductibles and other uncovered health bills, rolling over any unused funds to the following year. And premiums for high-deductible plans tend to be lower.

The theory is that the plans, by making consumers feel the costs of their health care, give them an incentive to shop for the best prices for health services and to forgo procedures that they do not need. That is also one of the goals behind the proposal the president rolled out this week.

Bush's proposal seeks to eliminate the long-standing tax break for job-based medical insurance, requiring that a worker's taxable income include any money his employer contributes to help pay the premiums. A new tax deduction -- $15,000 a year for families and $7,500 for individuals -- would help people pay the premiums, either through their job or on their own. The plan faces opposition from Democrats in Congress.

The president contends that the current tax code favors employer-sponsored insurance and encourages covered workers to get more expensive plans, while his proposal would put all insurance buyers on an even tax footing and encourage them to shop for plans that cost less than $15,000.

Average annual premiums for employer-sponsored health insurance were $11,480 for family coverage and $4,242 for individual coverage in 2006, according to the nonprofit Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation.

Congress cleared a legal path for high-deductible plans to be paired with HSAs in 2003, and so far the new plans account for about 3 percent of the insurance market, according to a study by economists at the Rand Corp. But because they tend to have lower premiums and to allow consumers to accumulate money tax-free, more people would sign up for them as a cost-containment strategy if Bush's proposal were enacted, experts said. The plans would also benefit from shifts from employer-sponsored insurance to the private market, where high-deductible plans are more common.

"It would reinforce HSAs," said McClellan, formerly chief of Medicare. "That's what a lot of people who don't get insurance through their jobs are buying now."

The White House says the proposal would motivate people to seek only the amount of insurance that they really need, helping to control spiraling health-care costs.

"HSAs are a great step in this direction, and this is an even bigger step towards leveling the playing field and removing some of the weird disincentives to getting basic insurance and paying for routine care out of pocket," said Katherine Baicker, a member of the president's Council of Economic Advisers.

Len Burman, director of the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center, said that, in leveling the field, the White House should also seek to scrap the HSA tax break, whose purpose is to counter the tax code's current bias toward comprehensive and expensive employer-provided coverage. Under Bush's plan, it would be the only extra tax break for health insurance -- one that would most benefit wealthy people, who can best afford the financial risk of a high-deductible plan and to sock away a lot of money in an HSA.

"It's a really generous tax break," said Burman, whose center is a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution. "If the goal is to try to get people to spend less on health care, why subsidize high-deductible health plans over aggressively managed care? People who believe that the market is the solution ought not to be prescribing one particular approach. Just create the right incentives for people to economize . . . and let them pick the option that works best."

Burman said eliminating the HSA tax break would bring in billions of dollars that Bush could put toward the other initiative he proposed this week -- giving states special grants to fund innovative ways of covering the nation's 47 million uninsured.

"This is not just free money just sitting there," he said. "There really is a big opportunity cost."

High Schools Eyed In No Child Left Behind Renewal (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

Educators, lawmakers and the White House are indicating that high school reform should be included in this year's renewal of the No Child Left Behind law, and the discussion about what it will include is already under way.

"If we're going to do significant high school reform, this is the vehicle, this is the year," Bob Wise, president of the Alliance for Excellent Education (AEE), told educators gathered on Capitol Hill yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0123756

The administration -- to the chagrin of some conservatives worried about ballooning the law -- included several new high school requirements in its NCLB proposal, such as mandatory dropout-data collection, additional testing standards and more funding for low-income schools.

"I think something can and will happen this year on high school reform," Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said recently.

Yesterday's conference, hosted by AEE, brought together research analysts to discuss how the government can best help improve the nation's high schools and better prepare students for college and the work force.

James Kemple, director of K-12 education policy at MDRC, a nonpartisan social policy research group, said there are common themes in successful high school reform models, including small classes or schools, double doses of basic literacy and math classes, well-designed curriculums and teacher coaching, and a focus on career mentorships and "real-world" interaction.

"Most high schools have limited connection to the adult world," he said, arguing that work-based learning and employers in the classroom improve student learning.

The administration's proposal would require states to develop college-prep English and math standards for high schools and administer tests based on those standards by 2012-2013. Its goal is to coordinate between high school and college courses to build common expectations for students and better prepare them for college and the workplace.

Democrats who control the education committees already have indicated an openness to tackling high school reform. Whether they will remains to be seen, and details will emerge as lawmakers from both sides of the aisle -- including Senate education panel Chairman Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts -- outline their suggestions for renewing the NCLB law at the National School Boards Association's annual conference Monday.

The five-year-old law requires states to test third- to eighth-graders annually and once in grades 10 to 12, with the goal of ensuring that all students can read and do math at grade level by 2014. States had to set paths to meet that goal and track the progress of their schools. Consistently failing schools must offer students public school choice and tutoring services.

Education experts say more data is needed to quantify the needs of high school students, especially dropout numbers. Mrs. Spellings said authorities have "virtually no information" about America's high schools.

According to numbers compiled by AEE, about 1.2 million students each year don't graduate from high school with their peers, and those from low-income families are six times as likely to fall into that category. If the 2006 dropouts had graduated, America would benefit from an additional $309 billion in income and purchasing power over their lifetimes, according to AEE.

"We realize that if we can't change the trend of dropouts in this country, we'll have a serious, serious problem," Sen. Richard M. Burr, North Carolina Republican, told yesterday's gathering.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, New Mexico Democrat, agreed that there is a growing appetite for acting on high school reform this year -- a topic that "hasn't received the attention" it deserves.

Mr. Kemple said the following innovative high school models studied by the MDRC provide a starting point for reform discussions:

•First Things First greatly improved the academic outcomes of middle and high school students in Kansas City, Kan., by setting up small learning communities, pairing students with a staff member and forcing rigorous course work.

•A study of Career Academies -- small high schools set up around a common career theme -- found that over a four-year followup, young male Academy graduates, especially those who were at risk, earned over $10,000 more than counterparts who didn't attend the academies.

•The Talent Development High School model -- often used in low-performing city schools as a way to focus on college entrance and employment -- produced substantial gains in attendance, academic course credits earned and promotion to the next grade, according to a MDRC study of 20 groups of ninth-graders.

The administration's proposal for renewing NCLB also calls for extending to the high school level the federal funding stream known as Title 1, which now primarily goes to low-income elementary schools.

Coast Guard Cited In Report On Flawed Ship (WP)

By Renae Merle, Spencer Hsu

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

The Coast Guard's newest cutter, the flagship of a $24 billion plan to modernize the nation's coastal fleet, suffers from significant design flaws, and the service has failed to properly supervise the contractors doing the work, government inspectors have found.

DOJ_NMG_0123757

The 418-foot National Security Cutter is the largest ship the Coast Guard has ever commissioned, but as designed would be limited in its ability to venture far from U.S. shores in search of drug smugglers and terrorists, according to a report scheduled to be released Monday.

Technical experts said the design of the vessel was likely to result in "fatigue cracks" that would sharply increase maintenance costs and shorten the ship's useful life. The report also said the Coast Guard appeared ill-equipped to supervise the project's contracting team, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, which had been given wide latitude in running the program.

The agency lacks the "appropriate workforce, business processes, and management controls for executing a major acquisition program" like this one, the report by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general says. "The Coast Guard is still trying to come from behind and create the organization needed to manage the program."

The Coast Guard and its contractors hindered the audit of the program, known as Deepwater, after ignoring years of warnings from technical experts about the ships' designs, the report says.

A representative for the Coast Guard did not return a call for comment yesterday. But in a response included in the report, the service challenged the inspector general's conclusions, saying the findings do not represent the "most current, comprehensive, or technically accurate data."

"The Coast Guard opinion is that decisions regarding structures and production have been well-considered and were prudent and correct," the response says.

The inspector general's report is the latest indictment of Deepwater, which aims to modernize the Coast Guard's aging fleet of ships, planes and helicopters over the next 25 years. In December, the Coast Guard sidelined eight Miami-based 123-foot cutters produced under the program after finding that they were not seaworthy.

The report has been circulated in the Department of Homeland Security and in Congress. A source provided it on the condition of anonymity because the document is not yet authorized for release.

New House Appropriations Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.) has discussed exerting more control over Deepwater projects, and a Transportation and Infrastructure subcommittee chaired by Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D-Md.) will hold an oversight hearing into Deepwater on Tuesday.

Cummings called the report "one of the most troubling reports I've read in my 11 years in Congress," adding that indications that the Coast Guard impeded auditors demanded a "thorough assessment."

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) called the report "a stunning indictment" of Coast Guard management.

"This Congress is not a ship of fools," Thompson said, promising unspecified oversight. "We will not tolerate the spending of $775 million of the taxpayer's money on a boat that will not perform its intended function, will have a shortened service life and will cost another fortune to maintain."

The inspector general's report is the latest in a series of audits that have faulted the Department of Homeland Security for its failure to manage contracts for its most complex and demanding missions. Deepwater was the largest project on a list of 32 Homeland Security contracts worth $34 billion cited in July by the House Government Reform Committee as marred by "significant overcharges, wasteful spending, or mismanagement." Other projects singled out included the hiring of airport screeners and deploying baggage inspection equipment, as well as programs involving nuclear detection equipment, border sensors and emergency housing after Hurricane Katrina.

The Coast Guard cutter report laid much of the blame on the Coast Guard's relationship with its contracting team.

The ship's "design and performance deficiencies are fundamentally the result of the Coast Guard's failure to exercise technical oversight over the design and construction of its Deepwater assets," the report said. The Coast Guard plans to build eight new cutters. The first was christened in November and will be delivered to the service in August. The second is slated for delivery in October 2008.

The combined cost of the first two ships has already increased from $517 million to about $775 million. That does not include the cost of addressing the design flaws or another $302 million for "re-pricing of all work associated with the production and deployment" of the first two ships, the report said.

Put another way, the cost of the first two ships will roughly double while their expected service life will likely be cut by 20 percent.

That's because shortly after the contract was awarded in 2002, Coast Guard technical experts began to warn about design flaws. The "fatigue service lives" of several critical elements are expected to be less than three years. In 2004, an assistant commandant wrote a memo expressing concern about the structural design, noting that "several of these problems compromise the safety and viability of the hull."

DOJ_NMG_0123758

The Coast Guard eventually decided to make upgrades to the two current ships so they could operate at least 170 to 180 days a year at sea, the report says. The original contract calls for the ships to be able to operate 230 days a year.

The Coast Guard "has chosen to reinterpret the Deepwater contract rather than hold the contractor accountable" for the higher standard, the report says. The change allows the service to "downplay" the seriousness of the deficiencies and "minimize" the scope of improvements required.

In its response, the Coast Guard said it had "not lowered performance standards." The ship's structure "does not pose an immediate concern; rather, it presents a risk that it may need some structural repairs during its service life," the response said.

The inspector general also faulted the Coast Guard and contractors for imposing restrictions on interviews with employees and "hindering" the audit. The contractors, for example, wanted lawyers present during interviews with their employees. The meetings never took place.

The Coast Guard initially required that contact with the auditors be reported, that interviewees submit documents to the service before turning them over to auditors, and that an agency official be present during any interviews. The inspector general suspended fieldwork for five weeks in 2005 because of the agency's demands.

The Coast Guard's lawyers found some of the restrictions violated employees' rights. Auditors eventually interviewed some agency officials, but continued to have problems obtaining documents, according to the inspector general. In December 2005, auditors requested a copy of a briefing detailing the results of a structural analysis. The Coast Guard submitted the document, but omitted several pages of technical information, including notations "in large red lettering" stating that the ships would not meet their 30-year service life requirement, the report said.

In a response to the report, the Coast Guard said it did not prevent employees from meeting with the audit team and that Homeland Security officials are developing department-wide guidance for working with the inspector general in the future. A spokeswoman for the Lockheed-Northrop contracting team said the team companies concurred with the Coast Guard's response.

"There are no flaws with the design," spokeswoman Margaret Mitchell-Jones said.

She said the Coast Guard is the "technical authority for the National Security Cutter" and if the report claims otherwise, "then the report is flawed."

Navy Searches For 3 From Copter Crash (AP)

By Allison Hoffman,

AP, January 27, 2007

Navy vessels about 50 miles off the California coast searched Saturday for three crew members of a Navy helicopter that crashed during a training operation.

The Friday crash killed one crew member and left the remaining three missing as darkness fell over the Pacific.

The sailor died after being pulled alive from the water, said Navy spokesman Cmdr. Jack Hanzlik.

"It's a sad time whenever we lose shipmates like this, so our hearts and prayers go out to the families," Hanzlik said.

The helicopter, based at Naval Air Station North Island in Coronado, was on a training mission when it crashed at about 5:30 p.m. EST. The MH-60S, commonly known as a Seahawk, was on a mission off the USS Bonhomme Richard, near San Clemente Island, directly west of the Camp Pendleton Marine base.

Hanzlik said the helicopter crew put out a mayday call before the crash. Navy sailors and Marines who were training with them aboard ship arrived at the crash site in inflatable boats within minutes.

The sailor pulled alive from the water died aboard the Bonhomme Richard while receiving medical attention, the Navy said.

His name was being withheld pending family notification. The names and rank of the others aboard also had not been released.

It was not clear whether mechanical malfunction or pilot error might have contributed to the crash, the Navy said. An investigation was under way.

Hanzlik said he did not know what type of maneuver the helicopter was performing when it crashed.

The USS Bonhomme Richard is an amphibious assault craft that took Marines to Indonesia after the 2004 tsunami.

The ship was training with two other Navy ships, the destroyer USS Chung-Hoon and the cruiser USS Chosin. Both of those ships were also participating in the rescue mission, Hanzlik said.

Two additional vessels, the destroyer USS Milius and the amphibious craft USS Rushmore, were deployed to assist with the search.

DOJ_NMG_0123759

The MH-60 Sierra is a twin-turbine craft based on the UH-60L Black Hawk and the Navy's SH-60B Seahawk, according to the manufacturer, United Technologies Corp.'s Sikorsky Aircraft. It is designed to operate off aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers and frigates, ranging up to 100 nautical miles from the ship.

Watch What They Do (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The next time Senate Democrats preach spending restraint, readers may want to recall this week's vote on the line-item veto. The new majority had a perfect opportunity to add a new check on spending earmarks but quickly passed it by.

New Hampshire Republican Judd Gregg needed 60 votes to end debate on his amendment to give the President Bush "rescission" authority. That tool would have allowed Mr. Bush and his successors to single out and send back to Congress earmarks and other wasteful projects in spending bills. Congress would have then been required to vote quickly, up or down, on the spending cuts. Mr. Gregg's bill was nearly identical to 1995 legislation that was supported by 20 Democrats who are still in the Senate.

Yet Mr. Gregg won only 49 votes, and among Democrats only Indiana's Evan Bayh and Connecticut's Joseph Lieberman voted in favor of the spending restraint they've preached. Among Republicans, only Alabama's Richard Shelby voted for his beloved pork-barrel power. At Tuesday night's State of the Union address, the Members applauded for the cameras when Mr. Bush spoke of controlling earmarks. A day later the Senators showed what they really care about.

Countdown To The Census (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

The accuracy of the census is determined in the planning stages, and planning for the 2010 count is already imperiled. The dangers fall into two categories: money (too little) and politics (too much). The new Congress will have to manage both vigilantly.

An underfinanced census would be an inaccurate census. Easy-to-count suburbanites — who tilt Republican — would almost certainly be overrepresented, while urban dwellers — who lean Democratic — would get short shrift because of the difficulty in counting mobile and diverse populations. To prevent that, lawmakers must begin by reinstating the roughly $50 million that was cut from the current census budget by the previous Congress.

The new Congress must also ensure that the next budget includes adequate funds for projects that made the 2000 census a success. Among them are strong partnerships with state and local governments, as well as with churches and businesses, to promote the census, and a multimillion-dollar down payment on the census advertising budget. Because they will not bear fruit until the census is under way, those projects may seem easy to sacrifice in favor of more immediate demands. But any budget shortfalls cannot be made up later because the necessary lead time will have been squandered.

Lawmakers should also hold hearings to air the reasons behind the abrupt resignation last November of the director of the Census Bureau and the equally sudden departure of his deputy director. Both men were highly qualified statisticians and, by all accounts, committed to an unbiased and thorough census. They have acknowledged tensions with the Bush administration, but offered no details.

Whatever it finds, the inquiry should send a clear message that the White House must choose new census directors whose professional qualifications and impartiality are above reproach.

Slave Wages (WSJ)

By Malia Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

HONOLULU -- Nancy Pelosi led the effort in the U.S. House during her first week as speaker to increase the minimum wage to $7.25 per hour from $5.15. In the process she ensured that American Samoa, a U.S. territory, is exempt from the wage hike, but did not exempt the Marianas Islands. The distinction is not unimportant.

StarKist and Del Monte, two big fish- and tuna-canning companies with packing plants in American Samoa, are headquartered in California, the former in Ms. Pelosi's San Francisco district. These companies pay a federal minimum wage of $3.26 per hour, or what will be $4 per hour less than what Ms. Pelosi is requiring American businesses on American soil to pay workers. But American Samoa Delegate Eni Faleomavaega argued that raising the minimum wage "would devastate the local tuna industry." Could that not also be the case elsewhere in the country?

In any event, despite strident criticism of Ms. Pelosi for the exemption and her avowal "to make sure that all of the territories have to comply with U.S. law on the minimum wage," it still carried over into the final legislation.

But the exemption for American Samoa is more curious still. Even the U.S. Department of Labor has noted the government's corruption, citing several cases of waste and fraud. Hawaii U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo says there is a push for federal law enforcement to take a more active role on that Pacific island. And Hawaii's FBI plans to open an office there to keep a closer watch.

What is even more ironic about Ms. Pelosi's behavior is that the region she is attempting to exempt has historically treated its workers poorly, with many instances of human rights abuses, and paid them pittances, besides.

Look no further than the story of Kil Soo Lee. In 1998, the Korean national incorporated the Daewoosa garment factory with the help of Togiola Tulafono, then lieutenant governor. (Mr. Tulafono is now governor.) Mr. Lee kept roughly 300 women from Vietnam as slaves; he was convicted in 2003 on 14 counts, including extortion, money laundering, conspiring to violate the civil rights of others and holding workers to a condition of involuntary servitude. Federal prosecutors called the Daewoosa case the biggest "modern-day slavery" case in U.S. history. Mr. Lee had devastated hundreds of young girls' lives -- and he had done so with the help of prominent Samoan government officials.

I met Mr. Lee in January 2001, flying from Hawaii to American Samoa with a Vietnamese translator to help expose him, his "garment factory" and the government who embraced him. Dozens of young women in the factory told me they paid $5,000 upfront to their government to secure a three-year contract to sew designer clothes for $408 per month. They were promised spacious living quarters with a swimming pool, nutritious meals three times daily and substantial wages. When they arrived, the accommodations crammed 36 people to a poorly ventilated, humid hallway, lined by tiny bunk beds with half-inch mattresses. Bath facilities offered no privacy and broken toilets; the swimming pool was filled with garbage and putrid green slime.

But poor living conditions wasn't all. They were fed a rice and cabbage gruel. They were slapped and pinched by guards for minor offenses such as missing a curfew or working too slowly. Female workers were subject to the whims of Mr. Lee, some of them sexual. He forced them to clip and manicure his toenails, to watch them shower, and to "lay" beside them on their bunks. The workers often weren't paid sometimes for months, despite the National Labor Committee reporting Daewoosa's sales at $8 million in 1999. They could not leave the island, as Mr. Lee had seized their passports.

Mr. Lee received special treatment from the government, including tax exemptions and a waived bond requirement -- possibly because of his connection to then-Lt. Gov. Tulafono, who was hired to incorporate Daewoosa while Mr. Tulafono's wife served for two years on the company board. The Vietnamese workers told me that when police were called to investigate a beating, they walked away with clothes, not a report or an arrest.

Ngyen Thi Nga and Dung Thi Kim Vu sought help from attorneys Virginia Sudbury and Christa Tzu-hsiu Lin, who took their case in 2001 pro bono. Weeks later, both whistleblowers allegedly drowned in rough seas off Pago Pago, although their bodies were never found. As new witnesses stepped forward, Mr. Lee became more volatile. He deported, with the cooperation of the Vietnamese and Samoan governments, nine primary witnesses and demanded the arrest of four others. Tensions were high when Samoan guards attacked the Vietnamese workers on Nov. 28, 2000. Quyen Truong, 21, was severely beaten with a club, stabbed in the eye and blinded.

Associate Justice of the High Court of American Samoa Lyle Richmond presided over the five-week civil trial in 2001, which I attended. Mr. Richmond ordered Mr. Lee to refund back wages, but he did not.

After national media exposure, Mr. Lee was arrested by federal agents, deported from American Samoa to Hawaii on March 23, 2001, and held behind bars without bond. The indictment claimed Mr. Lee willfully held people in involuntary servitude from Feb. 9, 1999, to December 2000, and forced them to work without pay under threats of serious harm and physical restraint. In February 2003, after a four-month trial, Mr. Lee was found guilty.

Mr. Lee appealed. He argued that the United States did not have jurisdiction in American Samoa. The court disagreed and on Dec. 27, 2006, Mr. Lee lost his appeal.

Ms. Pelosi campaigned heavily for office and her leadership position on a promise of honest government. Her party supposedly advocates for the blue-collar workers. But is it honest to exempt American Samoa from the minimum wage requirement, especially with the documented human-rights abuses? Is it "advocating for the workers" to ensure that their pay is kept considerably lower than their counterparts in the U.S.?

In addition to House speaker, Ms. Pelosi can add "ethically challenged" to her resume.

Durable Goods, Housing Deliver Signs Of Strength (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery, Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123761

The manufacturing and housing sectors exhibited some unexpected strength in December, although economists were cautious about both reports.

The Commerce Department reported that new orders for durable goods -- things like refrigerators and airplanes that are meant to last three years or more -- rose 3.1% in December from a month earlier. A surge in aircraft orders accounted for a large part of the gain, but orders for "core" capital goods excluding defense and aircraft were also up at a good clip. That category, which counts everything from telephones to machine tools and is viewed as a measure of business investment, rose 2.4% in December.

Nevertheless, some economists warned against reading too much into one month's data. Overall, manufacturing remains in a tough patch: In the fourth quarter, orders for core capital goods fell at an annualized rate of 6.1%, the largest drop in nearly three years. Also, other survey data on new orders have suggested the current quarter could be weak, said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at consultancy MFR Inc.

"It was a very solid report, but it's kind of inconclusive about where we're headed," he said.

In a separate report, the Commerce Department said that new-home sales recovered in December, rising 4.8% from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.12 million units. But many economists cautioned that the monthly number may have been exaggerated. For one, unusually warm weather in December may have confounded seasonal adjustments meant to compensate for lower activity in winter.

The figures also do not take into account the high number of buyers canceling contracts on homes. In addition, say economists, the 1.5% drop in the median home price in December to $235,000 from a year ago may understate the actual size of the price decline because it does not factor in the generous incentives that builders are offering buyers to sell homes. Incentives can be indicative of further weakness in the market.

"We have yet to see any meaningful evidence of a sustainable recovery in the housing market," said Ian McCarthy, chief executive of Atlanta-based Beazer Homes USA, which reported a loss in its fiscal first quarter that ended Dec. 31.

For the full year, new-home sales fell 17.3% in 2006, the largest decline since 1990. Home builders sold roughly 1.1 million new homes last year. On Thursday, the National Association of Realtors said that sales of existing, or preowned, homes fell 8.4% to 6.48 million. Taken together, sales of new and existing homes totaled 7.54 million units last year, down 9.78% from about 8.36 million units in 2005.

The uncertain outlook for housing contrasts sharply with an overall economy that has recently exceeded forecasters' expectations. Positive data on consumer spending and job growth, reinforced by the upbeat report on capital-goods orders, have increased economists' confidence that the expansion will maintain momentum this year as drags from housing and manufacturing ease.

The interplay between housing and the economy also remains a key issue for Federal Reserve policy makers. They expect the housing slump to offset strength in other areas of the economy just enough to keep inflation on the cooling trend it has exhibited in recent months. That, in turn, would allow the Fed to hold short-term interest rates at their current level of 5.25%. As of Friday, futures markets put more than nine in ten odds on the Fed holding rates steady through at least July.

US Housing Shows Unexpected Strength (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

The US economy showed signs of renewed strength on Friday as data revealed unexpected growth in the housing sector and orders for big-ticket manufactured goods rose.

Sales of newly built family homes rose 4.8 per cent last month to 1.1m for the year amid signs that housebuilders were beginning to clear excess inventory that has weighed down the construction sector.

The figures make it less likely that the Federal Reserve will consider cutting interest rates in the coming months. US stocks weakened in early trading while bonds fell and the dollar strengthened against the euro and yen.

The backlog of new homes standing empty fell to its lowest level since the start of last year – with enough supply to meet about 6 months worth of demand, the Commerce Department said.

The drop in excess inventory was seen by some economists as a sign the market had bottomed, while figures for the full year revealed the extent of the slowdown in 2006 as sales of new homes were 17 per cent lower than the previous year.

This sharp slowdown last year acted as a drag on the economy, prompting jobs cuts and reducing demand for construction machinery.

Caterpillar, the heavy-equipment maker, said on Friday it expected demand for domestic construction equipment to remain weak in the year ahead as it turned its attention to the oil and mining market.

DOJ_NMG_0123762

Meanwhile, manufacturers welcomed a government report showing orders for durable goods rose in December by the largest amount in three months, with a gain of 3.1 per cent.

Daniel Meckstroth, an economist at the Manufacturers Alliance, said the increase was “a positive sign that the manufacturing slump is a pause, not a recession, and is starting to turn around”.

The increase was driven by orders for commercial aircraft, but there was also an unexpectedly strong rise in demand for other durable goods as non-transportation orders rose 2.3 per cent.

Peter Kretzmer, an economist at Bank of America, said: “The rise in capital goods orders appears to signal improved prospects heading into 2007, following a pronounced flattening last quarter.”

New-Home Sales Up At End Of Down Year (WP)

By Daniela Deane

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

The number of new homes sold in December rose more than expected, suggesting that the depressed market could be turning a corner, but sales for all of 2006 still took their biggest annual slide in 16 years, according to government figures released yesterday.

December sales rose 4.8 percent, the biggest monthly gain since April, to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 1.12 million new homes sold, the Commerce Department said. For the full year, new-home sales fell 17.3 percent, the biggest decline since 1990, as the housing market suffered a sharp contraction after five years of blazing growth.

The new-home sales numbers came one day after other figures showed that sales of previously owned homes fell 0.8 percent in December after two months of modest gains, capping the steepest annual drop in that part of the real estate market since 1989. For the year, sales of existing homes fell 8.4 percent.

"We knew the year was going to be bad," said David Seiders, chief economist of the National Association of Home Builders. "There was no big surprise there. The real story is that toward the end of the year, sales did stabilize and even move up a bit."

The November and December sales figures were boosted by unusually warm weather, after inclement weather kept October numbers down, Seiders said.

New-home sales in December rose in three of four regions of the country, compared with November. Sales were up 27.3 percent in the Northeast, 26.6 percent in the Midwest and 0.3 percent in the Southeast, which includes the Washington region. Sales fell 4.4 percent in the West.

Nationally, the median price of a new home fell 1.5 percent in December, to $235,000 from $238,600 a year earlier. For the year, the median new-home price rose 1.8 percent, to $245,300 from $240,900.

The down year has translated to lower profits for home builders. To lure back buyers, builders cut prices somewhat, but also offered sweeteners that included free upgrades and finishes, help with closing costs and lower mortgage rates through their affiliates.

Sagging sales and a slew of contract cancellations also caused builders to cut back on construction. Builders delayed starting projects; walked away from land deals, leaving deposits on the table; renegotiated lesser deals with land sellers; and converted new home projects into rentals. These steps all helped to reduce inventory.

Thomas S. Bozzuto, chief executive of the Bozzuto Group, which builds condominiums, townhouses and single-family houses in the Washington-Baltimore region, said he believed the new-home market may have touched bottom and will gradually begin to recover, though not to previous sky-high levels.

"We're not going to see an instant turnaround or a quick recovery," Bozzuto said. "But I think it has bottomed out."

Bozzuto said traffic at local developments built by his firm has picked up since the beginning of the year after what he described as a "very bad" autumn and early winter.

He said that although buyer traffic had increased, it was nowhere near the boom levels of 2004 and 2005.

Bozzuto said his company responded to the market contraction by delaying some projects, turning two condominium developments to rentals and restructuring some land deals with sellers.

Sales Of New Homes Rise For 2nd Month (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 (AP) — New-home sales increased in December for a second consecutive month, raising hopes that the worst of the housing downturn is coming to an end.

DOJ_NMG_0123763

The Commerce Department reported Friday that sales last month rose 4.8 percent after a 7.4 percent rise in November.

Those two increases, however, were not enough to salvage the full year, which had sales of 1.06 million units, down 17.3 percent from 2005. That was the biggest decline since 1990, when sales fell 17.8 percent.

The housing bust has come after a boom in which sales of both new and existing homes set records for five consecutive years. Helped by the lowest mortgage rates in four decades, the sales surge was bolstered by investors buying in hopes of reselling the properties for quick profits. Analysts attribute the declines in 2006 to a cooling of that speculation.

The median price of a new home sold in 2006 rose 1.8 percent, to $245,300, compared with a 9 percent gain in 2005.

David Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders, said he looked for home prices to remain depressed in 2007 as builders try to reduce high levels of unsold homes.

He said his organization's January survey of builder sentiment showed continued use of incentives to clear the backlog, with 60 percent of builders surveyed offering optional items like kitchen upgrades or decks at no charge, compared with 41 percent at the beginning of 2006.

Other incentives include paying closing costs, which 52 percent of builders said they did, compared with 31 percent a year earlier, and paying buyers' financing points on loans, something 30 percent said they did.

The report on new homes came after a report on Thursday that sales of existing homes fell 8.4 percent last year, to 6.48 million units, the biggest decline since 1989.

New-home sales in December rose in all parts of the country except the West, which posted a 4.4 percent decline. Sales rose 27.3 percent in the Northeast, 26.6 percent in the Midwest and 0.3 percent in the South.

Regarding another sector of the economy, the Commerce Department said orders to factories for big-ticket manufactured goods rose in December by 3.1 percent, the largest gain in three months, giving hope that manufacturing will not be seriously affected by the slowdown in housing.

The increase was led by demand for commercial aircraft and the biggest increase in orders for cars and trucks in more than two years.

Excluding transportation, these orders increased 2.3 percent, the best showing in that category since March and better than analysts had expected.

For all of 2006, new orders rose 7 percent, compared with an 8.6 percent increase in 2005.

Blue Chips Slip; Volatility Marks Start Of '07 (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The pundits weren't kidding when they said the stock market could be more volatile this year.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to its 26th record finish in four months on Wednesday, and then promptly plunged 119 points on Thursday, its largest point or percentage decline in two months.

It fell an additional 15.54 points, or 0.12%, on Friday, to 12487.02 and now is little changed since the year began, up just 0.2%. For the week, the blue-chip average was down 0.6%.

What's behind the volatility? Uncertainty about what investors consider the two most important stock-market drivers: profits and interest rates.

The issue in a nutshell: The pace of profit growth has slowed markedly from the 19% gain registered in the third quarter. Market interest rates, meanwhile, such as bond yields and mortgage rates, which pleased investors by falling late last year, have started rising again.

Neither is a disaster, which helps explain why the Dow industrials, which were down sharply for much of the day Friday, recouped most of their losses by day's end. Profit gains still are above the historical average, and interest rates still are low by historical standards. But neither is quite as good as it was, which makes investors nervous.

As for corporate profits, "I've heard the term 'mixed.' I've used the term 'dicey,'" said Benjamin Pace, chief investment officer at Deutsche Bank Private Banking in New York.

About 40% of the companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index have reported fourth-quarter 2006 profits so far, and the results aren't bad at all. They just aren't eye-popping.

Profits are coming in about 10% above the year-earlier quarter, according to Thomson Financial. That is above the long-term average of 7%. It looks as if this will be the 14th quarter in a row of double-digit profit gains. About 68% of companies are surpassing analyst estimates.

But profit gains for last year's third quarter were nearly twice as good -- up about 19%. And 71% of companies beat estimates.

DOJ_NMG_0123764

While profits are above average, they are being evaluated by investors who, subconsciously at least, had gotten in the habit of buying stocks based on truly excellent results.

"Earnings have been a bit weaker, I think, than many market participants had been hoping for," said Leo Grohowski, chief investment officer at U.S. Trust in New York.

And as 2007 results roll in, profit gains are likely to be below 10%. Neither Mr. Pace nor Mr. Grohowski expects stocks to decline overall this year, but they both say the market could experience some volatility as it adjusts to slower profit increases.

It also will have to adjust to a less-positive interest-rate environment. Late last year, investors widely expected the Federal Reserve to begin cutting interest rates by the middle of this year. The yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell below 4.5% last month.

But since then, with the economy looking hotter than expected, the Fed seems much less likely to cut rates any time soon. The 10-year Treasury yield rose Friday to 4.879%.

That still is pretty low. But like profits, it isn't eye-popping any longer.

None of this is causing panic. But rising market rates make life more expensive for businesses and consumers. They also make bonds look like a more attractive investment compared with stocks.

The broad S&P 500 fell 0.6% in the week just ended, including a decline Friday of 0.12%, or 1.72 points, to 1422.18. It is up 0.27% in 2007.

The Nasdaq Composite Index also was down 0.6% for the week, and up 0.05%, or 1.25 points, on Friday to 2435.49. It is up 0.84% on the year.

Also working against stocks on Friday, crude-oil futures rose $1.19 a barrel, or 2.2%, to $55.42.

Worries On Rates Lead To Mixed Day (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

Wall Street closed out a volatile week with a mixed performance yesterday after a pair of economic reports dashed hopes for an interest rate cut anytime soon. The major indexes were down for the week.

Stocks found some late-day strength as investors sought bargains after a two-day pullback that erased most of the gains made so far this year.

Strong results from Microsoft helped lift technology stocks, while the heavy machinery maker Caterpillar lent some support to the Dow Jones industrials. However, those gains were offset by economic reports that raised concerns about interest rates.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 15.54 points, or 0.12 percent, to 12,487.02.

Broader stock indicators were mixed. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was down 1.72 points, or 0.12 percent, at 1,422.18, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 1.25 points, or 0.05 percent, to 2,435.49.

The Commerce Department said new-home sales rose 4.8 percent in December, well above economists' projections and a sign that the slumping housing market might have bottomed out. The department also said orders to factories for big-ticket manufactured goods rose in December by the largest amount in three months, led by demand for commercial aircraft.

Investors had been holding on to hopes that central bankers might cut rates in the first half of the year. A steady stream of positive economic data like yesterday's is, however, making that unlikely and is instead raising the possibility the Federal Reserve might resume its campaign of rate increases that ended in August. The Fed's Open Market Committee meets next week.

"The biggest driver is concern the Fed might see more reasons to raise rates than to lower," said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies & Company.

For the week, the Dow was down 0.62 percent, while the S.& P. 500 lost 0.58 percent and the Nasdaq fell 0.65 percent.

Long-term bonds were steady, with the price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note at 982/32 and the yield at 4.87 percent, both unchanged. Shorter-term bond yields rose during the session.

The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell.

Oil prices rebounded after a steep decline in the previous session because of doubts that OPEC members are making the production cuts promised last year. The price of a barrel of light crude oil rose $1.19, to $55.42, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Steven Goldman, chief market strategist for Weeden & Company, said the retreat in stocks should offer buying opportunities. He said that the market was not "terribly overbought, but had been listlessly moving up" and that "pulling back allows the market to clean out its excess."

The major indexes had been up more than 1 percent on Wednesday, to the highest levels this year, before the two-day retreat. For the year, the Dow is up 0.19 percent; the S.& P. is up 0.27 percent; and the Nasdaq is up 0.84 percent.

Shares of Caterpillar, whose earnings are heavily tracked as an indication about the pace of construction, rose $1.46, or 2.5 percent, to $61.09 after it reported a 4.3 percent rise in fourth-quarter profit. The company also stood by its full-year forecast, which it thinks will show continued strength in industries like mining, oil and gas.

Honeywell International, a diversified high-tech manufacturer, reported fourth-quarter profit rose 14 percent. Lackluster 2007 projections, however, sent shares down 7 cents, to $44.13.

Countrywide Financial, a mortgage lender, rose $1.71, or 4 percent, to $42, after The Financial Times reported that the company was in talks with Bank of America that might lead to its acquisition or a joint venture.

The newspaper, quoting sources that it did not identify, said Bank of America might acquire Countrywide for as much as $30 billion or form a joint venture to sell mortgages.

Technology stocks rose after Microsoft reported second-quarter results beat Wall Street expectations and projected double-digit growth in all of its core businesses through the rest of its fiscal year, which ends June 30. Strong sales of its Xbox video game console helped offset the delayed release of its latest operating system, Vista.

Microsoft, which hit a 52-week high in the previous session, rose 15 cents, to $30.60.

Amgen, the biotechnology company, declined after it said fourth-quarter profit missed projections. Its shares fell $3.35, or 4.5 percent, to $71.50.

Dollar Seesaws As Markets Await More U.S. Data, Fed (WSJ)

By Isabelle Lindenmayer

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The dollar seesawed indecisively Friday, making few intra-session gains as the market awaits additional U.S. data and a Federal Reserve meeting in the coming week to provide further confirmation of a recovering economy.

Despite the release of solid housing and manufacturing data early Friday, the dollar slipped across the board, then retraced its losses in afternoon trading.

Late Friday in New York, the euro stood at $1.2913 from $1.2935 late Thursday. The dollar stood at 121.595 yen from 121.14 yen late Thursday, while the euro stood at 157.00 yen from 156.72 yen late Thursday. The dollar was at 1.2536 Swiss francs from 1.2481 Swiss francs, while the pound was at $1.9593 from $1.9643 late Thursday.

"The market is unwilling to sell [the euro against the dollar] even more until there is further confirmation" that the economy is firming up, said Matthew Strauss, currency strategist at RBC Capital Market.

"That confirmation will have to come from next week's gross domestic product data, the Fed becoming more hawkish or the employment data," Mr. Strauss said, referring to January payroll data.

"That will tell the market whether [the euro] should break lower than $1.29 and continue, or if it should reverse," he said.

Crude Goes Above $55 A Barrel On Cold Weather, OPEC Cuts (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

Crude-oil futures jumped above $55 a barrel Friday to their highest level in more than two weeks as freezing temperatures around the East Coast raised the prospect of increased consumption of heating fuel.

Forecasters predicted that below-normal temperatures gripping the region would continue into at least the first week of February after a respite over the weekend. Private forecaster Frontier Weather said temperatures from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic will likely average 12 to 16 degrees below normal through the first week of February, boosting heating-oil demand.

"The weather forecasts started the ball rolling," said Phil Flynn, an analyst at Alaron Trading Corp. "Even though winter is getting off to an awfully late start, these types of weather patterns are known to sometimes last into March, and all the extra supply we built up may be lost further down the road."

The March crude-oil contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange rose $1.19, or 2.2%, Friday to $55.42 a barrel, the highest settlement since Jan. 9.

A report from tanker tracker Lloyds MIU that crude-oil exports from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries fell to below 23 million barrels a day in December from under 24 million barrels a day in November also underpinned the gains.

In Race For Iowa, Clinton Has To Make Up Ground (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123766

DES MOINES, Jan. 26 -- When New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton arrives here for her first presidential campaign events this weekend, she will encounter unfamiliar terrain -- a landscape where she is not the perceived front-runner for the Democratic nomination.

Although Clinton appears formidable at the national level, she has not built up a lead in Iowa, home of the first caucuses of the 2008 campaign next January. Most recent polls of Iowa Democrats have shown former senator John Edwards of North Carolina in the lead, with Clinton in a pack that includes Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

"This is anyone's race to win, including obviously Governor Vilsack, who is very familiar with the landscape here," said newly elected Iowa Gov. Chet Culver (D), who met with Clinton shortly after she arrived Friday afternoon but who is remaining neutral. "That's the wonderful thing about the caucus process. The winner will have to earn it."

That puts Clinton in the unusual position of having to prove herself against other Democrats, and having to build up a political infrastructure in Iowa at a time when many rivals already have a head start. Her appearances here -- her first in more than three years -- are certain to start a media frenzy, potentially intruding on the direct access to candidates that caucus-goers have come to expect.

There are many reasons why Clinton may meet resistance in Iowa. An obvious one is her vote for the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war in Iraq. Although she has increasingly become a harsh critic of the administration, her long support for the conflict -- and her refusal to renounce her vote -- has left a sour taste among some liberal Democrats.

She also has opposed subsidies for ethanol, a politically incorrect position for any presidential candidate seeking support in an agricultural state such as Iowa.

But, more fundamentally, her challenge may be finding ways to show Iowa Democrats that she is a more personable and accessible figure.

"Her history is eight years at the White House and six years as a U.S. senator -- all of it with Secret Service -- and there's many obstacles that go along with it, many of which Vice President Gore faced in 2000," said Steve Hildebrand, a senior Obama adviser who ran the Clinton-Gore reelection effort in the 1996 race and managed Gore's victory over Bill Bradley in Iowa in 2000.

"She's going to have to figure out how to get outside of that circle, in order to have the same kinds of dialogues with Iowa voters that all the other candidates are going to have," Hildebrand said. "It's expected in these early states, and she's going to have to figure out how to get that done."

J. Ann Selzer, who conducts the Iowa Poll for the Des Moines Register, said the key for Clinton is "to figure out how to make it personal."

Clinton advisers accept the polls as generally accurate and reject suggestions that she will have trouble converting skeptics into supporters. She has, they argue, only begun the process of introducing herself to Iowans, in a dinner in Washington last month and with a handful of phone calls to key activists.

"She needs to get out there and start campaigning," one Clinton adviser said. "I think there is a fundamental stubbornness about [Iowans] that they're not going to be favorable until they see them. They want to see Senator Clinton personally."

The previous time Clinton appeared in Iowa was November 2003, when she served as emcee at a state Democratic fundraising dinner featuring the party's 2004 presidential candidates.

She did not campaign in the state last year during her reelection campaign in New York, choosing to avoid any indications that she already had her eye on the presidency.

Former president Bill Clinton was the keynote speaker at a Democratic Party dinner in October, a few weeks before the midterm elections, but though he is very popular among rank-and-file activists, neither he nor Sen. Clinton has spent much time campaigning in Iowa living rooms over the years.

Bill Clinton essentially wrote off Iowa in 1992 because Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) was a presidential candidate that year, and in 1996 because Clinton faced no primary opposition in his reelection campaign.

Sen. Clinton is just beginning to put an organization in place and to attract endorsements. She named JoDee Winterhof, a former top adviser to Harkin, as her Iowa state director on Friday. Former Iowa attorney general Bonnie Campbell is heavily involved as a non-paid adviser and supporter. Another veteran of Harkin's staff, Lorraine Voles, serves as Clinton's Senate communications director.

But other Iowa veterans are already signed up elsewhere, including David Plouffe, a former Harkin acolyte who is running the Obama campaign.

Vilsack's presence in the race complicates the efforts of all candidates to line up endorsements from top elected officials in the state, but there is a scramble underway for the backing of state legislators and county officials. "With Hillary in the race, with

DOJ_NMG_0123767

Obama in the race, Iowa politicians are pretty smart about this process," said a party official who spoke about the competition on the condition of anonymity. "I think they're going to keep their powder dry and see how it's playing out."

Obama's appearance at an annual steak fry hosted by Harkin last fall helped touch off interest in Obama's presidential bid. The Clinton campaign regards him as a candidate who has enormous potential appeal but who is untested in the rigors of national campaigns.

Edwards, who finished second in the 2004 caucuses, has been to Iowa 17 times since the beginning of 2005, maintaining his network of supporters. None of the other Democrats underestimates his strength in the state, although several strategists in Iowa say he may have trouble holding his position over the course of the year.

"John Edwards has been out there a lot, and he ran before, and since that time he's been cultivating people, meeting them in living rooms, signing up people, and that means a lot," said Harkin, who is supporting Vilsack.

"And then Barack Obama, when he came to my steak fry -- I haven't seen anything like that since Robert Kennedy ran for president."

Hillary Heads To Iowa To Kick It Off (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's first trip as a 2008 presidential candidate starts Saturday with a two-day political tour of Iowa, to be followed by rapid-fire excursions to New Hampshire, South Carolina and California.

In recent Iowa polls, Clinton trails Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, former vice presidential candidate John Edwards and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. But Clinton's staff says she'll turn those numbers around once she hits the frigid Iowa ground and warms up skeptical Hawkeye State voters.

The Clintons don't have as much of a track record in Iowa as they do in other states: In 1992, Bill Clinton skipped the state, conceding it to Sen. Tom Harkin, a native son. He did win the state in 1992 and 1996.

Hillary Clinton last swung through in 2003.

Earlier this week, Clinton scooped up former Harkin aide JoDee Winterhof to run Clinton's state operation. Another Harkin alumna, Lorraine Voles, has been working for Clinton for about a year.

The senator, who declared her candidacy via Web video a week ago, makes her first visit to New Hampshire next weekend, with a trip to South Carolina, a state where Obama and Edwards are expected to do well, planned later in the month, according to a Democratic source. Clinton also has planned fundraisers and meetings in Los Angeles late next month and late March.

The West Coast appearances have kicked off a prediction that Obama and Clinton will battle it out to win over the party's Hollywood fat cats. DreamWorks founders David Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg already have scheduled a Feb. 20 fundraiser for Obama. Clinton earned the backing of Elizabeth Taylor on Thursday.

Clinton was to arrive in Des Moines Friday night and kick off her trip with an appearance before the state Democratic Party at 11:30 a.m. local time Saturday, followed by an appearance at a community center. Then she treks to Cedar Rapids for a small house party with supporters.

On Sunday morning, she heads to Davenport, where she will schmooze diners at a local restaurant.

Simon Says: Hillary Stumps In Iowa (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 27, 2007

DES MOINES – It is not as if Iowa had nothing going for it before Hillary Clinton got here.

John Wayne was born and Cary Grant died here. The state has produced one president (Herbert Hoover from West Branch) and one First Lady (Mamie Eisenhower from Boone). And it is the only state whose first two letters are vowels.

But what really gives this state its claim to fame is that this is where the presidential nominating process begins in the Iowa caucuses, scheduled to be held next January.

Numerous 2008 presidential candidates have been here numerous times in the last months and years with the exception of Hillary (as her campaign officially refers to her.)

Until today, she had not set foot in Iowa since Nov. 15, 2003, when she headlined a Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner for the state party. It was considered her first real signal that she might run for president some day.

Now that day has arrived and Hillary is back and many Iowans are almost as excited as if John Wayne and Cary Grant had come back with her.

DOJ_NMG_0123768

On Thursday, one local TV station had a story about school children hand-painting signs of greeting for Hillary and another had videotape of Bonnie Campbell, a Democratic activist here, getting a phone call…from Hillary HERSELF!

Iowa Gov. Chet Culver, a Democrat, said in an interview Friday, "This is anyone's race to win, but they have to earn it and that includes going to a high school gym on a Saturday morning like Hillary is and taking tough, pertinent questions."

Iowans love to ask questions of candidates and not just once. By the end of this year, this is the joke you are going to hear out of Iowa: "I haven't decided whether I am going to vote for Hillary, yet. I have only met her five times."

"Candidates need to spend a lot of time here," Culver said. And spend lots of money. Iowa loves the money that the campaigns and media spend, but they love the attention much more.

Where else can you look up from your biscuits and gravy at the breakfast buffet in the downtown Marriot here to see Brian Williams or Tim Russert or Bob Schieffer or George Stephanopoulos waiting to get a table? Where else are you going to be able to go to your local diner and see Hillary and Barack and John and Joe and Chris and all the rest?

Culver said that John Edwards drew 900 people when he was last in Iowa. And 900 is a big crowd in this state. Of the 953 communities in Iowa, 800 contain fewer than 1,000 people. Keep that in mind when you see crowd estimates from here.

Culver said the race was wide open in part because Hillary hasn't been here in such a long time. "This is her first trip," he said. "People admire and respect her, but this is her first test."

I asked Culver whether he was going to endorse anybody and he said, "In all likelihood I will not."

But doesn't Culver feel any obligation to his predecessor, Tom Vilsack, who is running for president?

"While Gov. Vilsack has been supportive and is certainly my friend, others have been supportive and are my friends," Culver said. And then Culver mentioned how Barack Obama had come out and campaigned for him last year.

Everyone would like Culver's endorsement, but in 2004, Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin and Al Gore and even Jimmy Carter all endorsed Howard Dean. Who then came in third here.

"We have learned endorsements, frankly, don't amount to a whole lot," Culver said.

So what does?

"Coming here and spending quality time," Culver said. "They all need to spend a lot of time here."

Ex-Shaheen Aide Joins Clinton Campaign (POL)

By John Distaso

The Politico, January 27, 2007

UnionLeader.com has picked up the first clear signal that Hillary Clinton's New Hampshire campaign is taking shape.

Highly-regarded Democratic strategist Liz Purdy of Concord has signed on in a senior staff role in the state, Clinton national field director Karen Hicks confirmed today.

"She's a super organizer and we are so psyched to have her," Hicks said.

"She is going to be helping us through the year organizing and staffing up as a senior person in the state."

Hicks said Purdy has no official title at the moment, but said, "She will be playing a big role for us."

Purdy, a 1996 UNH graduate, was the fund-raising director for former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen's successful 2000 campaign for a third term as governor. She also was deputy campaign manager for Shaheen's unsuccessful bid for the U.S. Senate in 2002.

She headed the college Democrats while at UNH and was speaker of the student senate. She also worked for the state Senate as a legislative aide before serving as finance offer for the state Democratic Party.

Huckabee To Set Up '08 Exploratory Panel (AP)

By Andrew Demillo

AP, January 26, 2007

Republican Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor and a favorite of conservatives, will take the first step in a 2008 presidential bid, an official told The Associated Press on Friday.

Huckabee, 51, plans to file papers on Monday establishing an exploratory committee that will allow him to raise money and hire campaign staff, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid pre-empting a formal announcement.

Huckabee faces difficult odds as he enters a crowded Republican field topped by better-known, better-funded candidates such as Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

DOJ_NMG_0123769

All three have spent the last few months building their national campaign organizations, courting fundraisers and lining up grass-roots supporters in primary and caucus states. However, they also have records or positions on social or fiscal issues that don't sit well with conservative voters — and that could give Huckabee an opening.

"My brand of conservatism is not an angry hostile brand. It's one that says 'conservative' means we want to conserve the best of our culture, society, principles and values and pass them on," the former Southern Baptist minister said last month.

Huckabee, a fierce foe of abortion rights and gay marriage, isn't the only conservative in the field and he faces a tough fight for the support of the GOP's right flank, a crucial voting bloc in the nominating contests.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, a favorite son of the religious right, is already in the race and other conservatives, such as California Rep. Duncan Hunter and Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, will be battling for their share of the vote.

Still, Huckabee is hoping history can repeat itself. He was born in Hope, Ark., and was chief executive for a small state for many years. It was a story line that worked for Democrat Bill Clinton in 1992.

Huckabee left office Jan. 9 after serving 10 1/2 years as governor of a Democratic-leaning state; he was ineligible to seek re-election because of term limits. During his tenure, he repeatedly had to defend against slips of the tongue and ethics controversies.

Arkansas' Ethics Commission has admonished Huckabee for violations five times in 14 years, once for taking money from an organization whose donors have never been listed. He jokingly attributed his weight loss to a "concentration camp" diet and once called his state a "banana republic."

In November, he lashed out at reporters who questioned wedding-gift registries set up to furnish Huckabee's new $525,000 home in North Little Rock. Friends had set up the accounts for Huckabee and his wife Janet, who have been married since 1974.

Nationally, Huckabee is perhaps best known for his dramatic weight loss and his emphasis on healthy lifestyles. He shed 110 pounds after being diagnosed with diabetes. He also saw his political profile rise when he headed the National Governors Association for one term.

Since he left office, Huckabee has been on a nationwide tour to tout his book, "From Hope to Higher Ground: 12 Stops to Restoring America's Greatness." With chapters on taxes and foreign policy, Huckabee's book lays out his potential talking points for a presidential campaign.

Sen. Joe Biden To Kick Off Presidential Campaign Wednesday (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) — Democratic Sen. Joe Biden, who has made no secret of his plans to run for president in 2008, says he will make it official next Wednesday.

The 64-year-old Delaware lawmaker said he will file paperwork with the Federal Election Commission and launch a campaign website, www.joebiden.com.

He joins a crowded Democratic field dominated thus far by New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. Other candidates include former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee; Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich.

Biden traveled extensively last year to the early voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina and plans another swing through those states soon after launching his presidential committee, his spokesman, Larry Rasky, said.

Recently, as the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Biden convened several weeks of high-profile hearings on the Iraq war.

Generally regarded as a longshot in the presidential contest, Biden is one of his party's leading spokesmen on foreign affairs and plans to stress that expertise on the campaign trail. Biden voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq, but has since become a vociferous critic of the conflict.

Biden has also criticized President George W. Bush's plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops to try and stabilize Iraq's capital city, Baghdad. On Wednesday, the Foreign Relations Committee approved a resolution he co-authored with Sens. Carl Levin, a Democrat, and Republican Chuck Hagel, stating that sending more troops into Iraq is "not in the national interest."

Biden has also been promoting a detailed plan for peace in Iraq that would divide the country along ethnic lines.

This is not the first time Biden has sought the presidency. He was a candidate for the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination, but withdrew from the race in 1987 amid accusations that he had plagiarized passages in his speeches.

Biden has about $3 million (euro2.31 million) in his Senate campaign account that will transfer to his presidential committee, Rasky said.

The campaign will be run by Luis Navarro, a longtime Democratic activist with close ties to organized labor. Recently, Navarro headed the Florida Democratic Party and served a stint as political director for Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's 2004 presidential bid.

Hunter Is First Candidate To Buy TV Ad In New Hampshire (BOS)

By James Pindell

The Boston Globe, January 26, 2007

California Congressman Duncan Hunter is the first candidate to pay for television advertising time on New Hampshire airwaves for the 2008 presidential election.

The ad, which began airing on WMUR-TV in Manchester today, shows Hunter in front of a fence on the border with Mexico.

CNN is reporting the ad also airing in Iowa.

Hunter announced in South Carolina Wednesday he is running for president. He will visit New Hampshire on Monday.

Last month, DraftObama.com paid for ads on cheaper cable networks encouraging Illinois Senator Barack Obama to run for president.

Preparations Set, Giuliani Now Faces A Big Choice (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani, who developed a national reputation for decisive and reassuring leadership after 9/11, now faces the odd challenge of having to reassure some supporters that he can be decisive about a very different issue: running for president.

Even as his fellow Republican John McCain and fellow New Yorker Hillary Rodham Clinton have all but formally declared their candidacies, Mr. Giuliani has proceeded more cautiously.

Since last month, he has formed an exploratory committee, more aggressively recruited a campaign staff and moved to divest himself of one of his companies. And he is now visiting New Hampshire, home to the first primary, for the second time in three months. But he has studiously avoided making a public commitment to run.

Asked recently in Delaware about his political plans, he offered an ambiguous reply: “I think the biggest question you have to ask is, ‘Can you really lead the country?’ If I believe that I can do it, then I will, and if I don’t, then I’ll support somebody else.”

He ducked the question again yesterday, telling reporters in Bretton Woods, N.H., that he would not be rushed by contenders who are already entering the race. “You should do it when you feel it’s the right time,” he said.

Despite the delay, his aides argue that the accelerated pace of early primaries next year actually benefits a well-established figure like Mr. Giuliani — much, they say, as his national stature will enable him to close whatever gaps now exist in fund-raising and organization.

Frank Luntz, a Republican consultant who is not now working for any of the presidential campaigns, described Mr. Giuliani as “the only candidate who can set his own timetable, because he is so established in the minds of the voters.”

Nonetheless, doubts have been raised about the proverbial fire in his belly. Some New Yorkers in particular recall his decision to quit the Senate race against Mrs. Clinton in 2000 after running for months and raising millions of dollars but never formally declaring his candidacy.

Mr. Giuliani, already hobbled then by a messy separation from his wife, withdrew after finding that he had prostate cancer. But he was also ambivalent about the prospect of being a legislator.

Wrestling then with which course of medical treatment to pursue, he said on the day he withdrew: “And about the decision to run: I was almost in the same position, not being able to make it, which has never really happened to me. I’ve always been able to make decisions.”

David Garth, a media consultant who helped steer the Giuliani mayoral campaigns, said that while he had no reason to doubt a candidacy this time, “it’s a question of where his head is, as it was in the Senate race.”

Michael R. Long, chairman of the New York State Conservative Party, voiced uncertainty.

“He called me before Thanksgiving just to touch base and said he’d like to talk, and I haven’t heard from him since,” Mr. Long said. “We went through this in the United States Senate race. Whether he pulls the trigger or not, I don’t know.”

Fred Siegel, a Cooper Union historian and Giuliani biographer, dismissed the analogy to 2000. “The question is there in Washington,” Mr. Siegel said, but “I think it’s mistaken.”

Mr. Giuliani’s aides maintain that he is being held to a standard different from that of other prospective candidates who have not formally declared. And anyway, they say, his ambivalence, whether real or merely perceived, may well vanish soon. Mr.

Giuliani, who will address the Republican State Convention in New Hampshire today, is to travel to California and South Carolina next month, and supporters in New Jersey are preparing to announce endorsements next week.

California and New Jersey are two of a number of populous states that are expected to shift their 2008 primaries to February, very early in the campaign season, and South Carolina's comes even earlier, a week after New Hampshire's.

"Folks who believe he is not running do so at their own peril," said Michael DuHaime, former political director of the Republican National Committee, who is heading Mr. Giuliani's exploratory effort.

"There is a spin out there that the campaign is further behind than it is, that Rudy may not be serious, and that is being done deliberately to keep us from certain fund-raisers," said Mr. DuHaime, a native New Jerseyan who begins working for Mr. Giuliani full time next week.

Kieran Mahoney, a Republican consultant in New York who is working for another presidential prospect, former Gov. James S. Gilmore III of Virginia, said he had been unconvinced of a Giuliani run until recently, when the former mayor stepped up the pace of hiring a campaign staff and reports emerged that he had taken steps to sell the biggest division of his consulting business.

"Stop listening to what they say and look at their behavior," Mr. Mahoney said of potential candidates in general. "Giuliani is, in fact, an active participant in the marketplace in terms of scooping up talent and making business decisions that are economically injurious and politically positive. I have been a skeptic. I am now a believer."

Even Mr. Giuliani himself, though continuing to demur, did drop a hint or two in New Hampshire yesterday, saying at a Chamber of Commerce dinner that he might return later this year to play golf, or for other reasons.

Some consultants to Mr. Giuliani's rivals, and even some of his supporters, say that given the campaign's relatively late start, his inner circle may be overconfident about his ability to build a respectable war chest by March 31, the first of the deadlines for reporting campaign contributions. A poor sum then would make it all the harder to attract further donations, and, with more candidates now choosing not to participate in the federal campaign financing system, the importance of fund-raising has increased, as has competition for the millions at stake.

Already, Mr. Giuliani is being measured against a 140-page game plan drafted by a member of his campaign staff last fall. That document, which Giuliani advisers say was stolen from them, set a fund-raising goal of at least $25 million by the end of March, but some potential fund-raisers and donors whom it identified have already enlisted in support of other candidates.

Asked about the $25 million figure, Mr. DuHaime, who did not join the campaign until after the document was drafted, replied: "What is important to us is we have a strong number in that first period, and I'm not going to put the number out there publicly. We're certain we're going to have enough money to be competitive."

In New Jersey, where two fund-raisers have been scheduled and a spectrum of local politicians are expected to endorse Mr. Giuliani next week, one supporter, Steven E. Some, said that he had worked in five presidential campaigns and that "selling Rudy is the easiest sell I've ever had in my life."

"I have no doubt whatever that he's in this for the long term," said Mr. Some, a veteran political consultant. "I've never had anyone come up to me to raise any doubt about whether he's going to go the course."

Still, an underlying perception exists, and is being stoked, that Mr. Giuliani has not committed himself to a campaign, in part because he is reluctant to relinquish the lucrative consulting business that he founded after he left the mayor's office five years ago. Referring to Mr. Giuliani's exploratory activity, Harold M. Ickes, a longtime adviser to Mrs. Clinton, said, "I thought he was just advertising so he can increase his fees."

Mr. Mahoney, the Republican consultant, acknowledged that one challenge facing Mr. Giuliani would be determining how to expand his political base rightward.

"In order to become the mayor of New York City," Mr. Mahoney said, "you have to do things that are not wholly consistent with being the Republican nominee for president."

Amid Question Of Flip-flopping, McCain To Back Reform Bill (POL)

The Politico, January 27, 2007

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., will sponsor a bill to strengthen campaign finance laws in this session of Congress despite vehement opposition to campaign finance reform from conservative Republican activists whose support he needs to win the party's nomination for president in 2008.

McCain recently had appeared to be backing away from his support of campaign finance reform, which has been a signature issue for him. But Friday, a top aide in his Senate office said that McCain will reintroduce a bill to further clamp down on independent "527" groups.

DOJ_NMG_0123772

"Yes, it is McCain's bill and McCain will introduce it this Congress," Mark Salter, McCain's chief of staff, wrote in an e-mail. "Moreover, he wanted to introduce it earlier this month, but Senator (Russ) Feingold's staff suggested to our staff to wait a week or two."

Salter's response came after inquiries from the Politico about McCain's apparent retreat on campaign finance reform.

McCain and Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat, together wrote the 2002 law that fundamentally over-hauled federal campaign finance regulations.

The measure earned the scorn of conservative Republicans and other political activists who argued that it stifled free speech rights by limiting political spending.

Last session, the two worked on a measure that would place tighter controls on the "527" groups that emerged to circumvent the limitations imposed by the McCain-Feingold measure.

This session, however, McCain has declined to support two other campaign finance measures that reformers consider priorities: one would expand the public financing system for presidential elections, and another would require grassroots organizations to disclose their funding and expenditures.

His lack of support for both worried campaign finance reformers who have considered him a champion of their cause.

McCain "has been supporting reform efforts for so long and has taken on the whole world when it comes to reform drives in Congress, so I'm convinced he truly believes in it," said Craig Holman, a lobbyist on campaign finance for Public Citizen.

"But it's very unfortunate that when it comes around to his presidential bid he's suddenly backing off, especially at such a critical moment. This is the year in which we're actually going to get some sweeping lobbying and ethics reform legislation, and he's not working with us on that," Holman said, adding that McCain's staff over the last few months had become unresponsive to entreaties to support campaign finance reforms.

McCain's campaign officials deny that he's backed away from supporting campaign finance reform. "He is a conservative candidate. He is going to run on reform should he decide to run," said Danny Diaz, a spokesman for McCain's exploratory campaign. "He's committed to reducing the amount of special interest money involved in politics. He has been. He will remain so."

However, in a survey recently posted on the exploratory campaign Web site, McCain officials asked supporters to comment on 25 specific proposals in four categories: taxes, government spending and regulation, the war in Iraq and the war on terror, and America's military. Campaign finance was not on the list.

Additionally, campaign officials have declined to quash speculation that he will opt out of the public financing system. And McCain voted last week to remove the grassroots lobbying disclosure provision that he previously supported. Many conservative activists, whose support McCain is courting, had opposed this measure.

McCain also has declined to sponsor a bill in the 110th Congress to expand the public financing system for presidential elections. The bill -- which will be introduced by Feingold -- is similar to one McCain sponsored in the 108th Congress, though he withheld his name on last session's measure.

By the time the bill was introduced last session, McCain was already considering a presidential run. Had he sponsored the bill, Diaz said, McCain might have faced charges of conflict of interest. It could have appeared as if he were trying to boost the public money that could be provided to campaigns, including his own.

Diaz described McCain's decision not to sponsor the bill as "a noble and pretty straightforward thing to do," and compared it to a judge recusing himself from a trial in which he or she has an interest. Public financing "is something that he still supports as a matter of policy," Diaz said, but he added that McCain "believes the public financing system is not fulfilling its original goal and must be reformed."

The leading contenders for the Democratic and Republican presidential nominations are expected to opt out of the public financing system, which provides taxpayer dollars to candidates who abide by restrictions on how much they can raise.

"A decision has not been made" about whether McCain will rely on public financing, Diaz said. As for the lobbying disclosure provision, which would have required grassroots organizations to disclose their financing, Diaz said McCain withdrew his support last year after meeting with groups across the political spectrum that argued the provision would have stymied citizen activism.

The leaders of six prominent campaign finance reform groups in Washington disagreed and urged the senators to support the provision, which the groups said would prevent abuses exposed in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

But one campaign finance reformer who has supported McCain's campaign finance efforts said his recent equivocation should be understood in the context of the campaign. The people whose support McCain needs don't count campaign finance as among their top issues, the reformer said, adding "some of the people hate McCain-Feingold and he's not going to run from it. I don't think he could, but he won't try to."

"There's going to be ongoing tension between his interest in campaign finance reform and the political reality that some of the people he's trying to reach are not interested in that issue.

Early On, Obama Showed Talent For Bridging Divisions (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — Barack Obama's entry into politics came on a winter morning at the white-columned Harvard Law Review building when, about 2 a.m., a deeply divided editorial staff chose him as the first African American to lead the prestigious publication.

It was no small accomplishment. Obama, who at nearly 30 was older and more world-wise than most of his classmates, had to navigate among sharply drawn factions of conservatives and liberals to beat 18 other candidates for the job.

Today, Obama's weighing of a bid for the White House has provoked questions about whether he has the experience to build a winning coalition of voters. But at Harvard Law Review he showed that — on a much smaller scale — he had the savvy to maneuver through turbulent political waters.

"The Harvard Law Review was a place of petty and vicious internal politics," said Brad Berenson, an editorial board member with Obama and, more recently, an associate counsel to President Bush.

"Compared to Washington and the White House and the Supreme Court, the Harvard Law Review was much more politically vicious," Berenson said. "The conservatives threw their support to Obama because he could bridge the gap between both camps and retain the trust and confidence of both."

Whether Obama can reprise his role as political bridge-builder remains to be seen. Now a Democratic U.S. senator from Illinois, he plans to announce a decision Feb. 10 about the 2008 campaign — though most observers believe that he is in the race.

The son of a racially mixed marriage, Obama did not present himself at Harvard as either a black candidate or a white candidate. He gained the respect of the law review's famously divided factions by listening to all sides.

Former staffer Michael Froman, now a corporate executive who has supported Democratic presidential candidates, agreed that when Obama led the law review in 1990 and 1991, much of the staff's right wing "felt comfortable" with Obama, even those in the conservative Federalist Society.

"It's funny," Froman said, "but it's the same thing I hear now from some conservative friends of mine — not that they agree with him on policy, but that they feel he hears them out. Unlike some of the firebrands on both the left and the right, he was just a very good listener."

Interviews with more than a dozen people associated with the law review, both liberals and conservatives, found no one who did not profess respect for Obama.

The law review was housed in a three-story Greek Revival structure that once had been a private home. The Harvard Legal Aid Bureau occupied the first floor, leaving the cluttered upper stories for the review. The top level, or attic, became the review's law library, its desks and tomes stacked under the sloping roof. The house invoked chaos.

Obama entered that disheveled world in the fall of 1988, already distinct from most of his classmates.

He did not come to Cambridge, Mass., directly from an undergraduate program; he had spent several years doing community work in Chicago. He was not among the privileged or Ivy League legacies. He had turned down a full-ride scholarship at New York University School of Law to attend Harvard. Classmate Cassandra Butts remembers first meeting Obama at the financial aid office.

Nor did Obama arrive with little life experience. He was born in Hawaii, lived in Indonesia and later attended college in Los Angeles and New York. He had also traveled to Africa in search of his father's roots in Kenya.

In his first year, he researched articles for the Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review. He occasionally spoke out against apartheid in South Africa. He addressed a banquet for the Black Law Students Assn.

Professor Randall Kennedy recalled Obama's theme: Don't forget where you came from.

Classmate Tynia Richard called the speech "one of the most rousing and passionate addresses we heard."

"Harvard was one of those places that can get petty politically," said Richard, now a New York administrative law judge. "People put forth their own agendas, stretched and pressed their ideas in a variety of different ways.

"And he talked about the need to interact with different groups, to become engaged with one another."

After students' first year in law school, they compete for spots on the law review. They are selected by editors based on their writing and analytical skills. Each year, about 40 students in a class of 540 win spots on the review. Each winter the editors, second- and third-year students, gather to choose a president for the following year.

Obama competed in a field of 19 candidates, four of whom were black.

By tradition, the candidates spend the day cooking meals for the voters. After breakfast, the kitchen table is piled high with law articles the candidates have worked on. The articles are reviewed, and votes taken. As the day wears on, eliminated candidates join editors at the kitchen table for the next meal and round of voting.

In Obama's case, the staff of about 80 conducted a marathon series of votes stretching about 17 hours. It was well past midnight when Obama finally bested David Goldberg.

"He was not a conventional politician," said Goldberg, now a civil rights lawyer in New York. "He was thoughtful, and he listens. People came to appreciate that."

Goldberg added, "I was happy to lose to him. I really wanted to be the articles editor."

Kenneth W. Mack, now a law professor at Harvard, said Obama stood out from the beginning. "He seemed more mature," Mack said. "Everyone understood he was a liberal. He didn't hide that.

"We had opinions, and we argued. But he was always able to make common ground," Mack said.

Under Obama's presidency, the review tackled several delicate racial issues, including allegations that black males, or "invisible men," were inadequately protected by civil rights laws, and the plight of black women giving birth to crack-addicted babies.

The review also panned a biography by a white writer about former slave and abolitionist Frederick Douglass, saying not enough blacks were quoted.

Obama too was criticized at the time. Christine Lee Spurell, a black classmate who is now a public defender in Abingdon, Va., was upset he did not name other blacks to the law review's masthead.

But today she believes he was trying to build the best staff. "He had to make hard decisions," she said. "And he made them correctly."

In The Tennessee Senate, A Historic Shift Of Power (NYT)

By Theo Emery

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

NASHVILLE, Jan. 26 — Over the last year, members of the Tennessee legislature have witnessed a number of updates. Plasma televisions that broadcast legislative sessions now line corridors in Legislative Plaza, where many lawmakers have their offices. Smoking has been banned from the building although the two activities it used to cloud, lobbying and political arm-twisting, remain.

But a sign of perhaps the most significant change can be found outside Room 1, the office of the Senate speaker, where the nameplate on the wall has been replaced for the first time in 36 years.

Earlier this month, senators voted out John S. Wilder, an 85-year-old Democrat who had been speaker since 1971, choosing instead Ronald L. Ramsey, the first Republican to lead the body since Reconstruction. In Tennessee, the powerful Senate speaker is also lieutenant governor, and next in line for the governorship.

Back-room politicking and shifting loyalties played a role in the ouster of Mr. Wilder, who comes from a wealthy West Tennessee cotton family and who flew his own plane to the capital. Until he was voted out, he was the nation's longest serving state legislative leader, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

The change reflects a reality in the South: rising Republican strength in state politics, said Prof. Merle Black of Emory University, a co-author of "The Rise of Southern Republicans."

Since Barry Goldwater's campaign for the presidency in 1964, the South has reliably voted Republican in presidential races, except for 1976 and to a lesser degree in 1992, but Democrats maintained power in state and local elections.

"It's really only been in the 1980s and accelerating in the 1990s, that white voters in the South have identified themselves more as Republicans than as Democrats," Professor Black said, adding, "Mr. Wilder represents the persistence of Democratic strength in states like Tennessee."

As recently as the early 1990s, Democrats controlled every Southern legislature. That changed in 1994, when voters in North Carolina and South Carolina elected Republican majorities in their Houses, and Florida elected a Republican majority in its Senate, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. Today, Republicans control both houses in Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia, while Democrats control those in Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana and North Carolina. In Mississippi and Tennessee, Democrats control the House and Republicans the Senate.

Beginning in 2005, Republicans held a one-vote majority in the Tennessee Senate, which temporarily grew to two votes when a Democrat switched parties last year and then lost his seat last fall. But the Republicans were denied the leadership two years ago when two Republicans, Micheal R. Williams and Tim Burchett, voted for Mr. Wilder. Mr. Wilder then named Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0123775

Williams to the No. 2 leadership post in the Senate. This time around, both senators voted for Mr. Ramsey, and it was a Democrat, Senator Rosalind Kurita, who played the pivotal role in Mr. Wilder's leadership defeat when she startled colleagues by voting for Senator Ramsey. Ms. Kurita said her decision was a "vote of conscience" because Republicans had been undemocratically denied the leadership in 2005. Although she said it was not a reward for her vote, this time it was Ms. Kurita who received the No. 2 position, speaker pro tem.

Mr. Wilder's exit from the speaker's chair is the end of an era of sorts, said Mark Byrnes, a political science professor at Middle Tennessee State University.

"I think it does mark a close of a chapter of Tennessee history," Professor Byrnes said, "that more of the old-style, less partisan — if not bipartisan — politics is on its way out."

Professor Black predicted that as older Democrats left the Southern political landscape, "Republicans will probably pick up more seats as we proceed through this decade."

Mr. Wilder won his first Senate race in 1959, served one term, then returned in 1967 to a political career that has continued uninterrupted. When first elected speaker, he pledged to shun "petty" partisanship, according to a newspaper account at the time. He fended off later challenges by enlisting the loyalty of Republicans, who received plum committee assignments.

In recent years he seemed not to care about his image or the fact that politics is increasingly media-driven. He referred to himself in the third person and was known for his befuddling speeches. He ruminated regularly about "the cosmos," and in 2002, famously rambled about "bed devils" during a speech.

But there has never been any doubt that he was a crafty politico who reveled in his position.

"You've got to figure that he's wily as all get out if he's survived in this position for 36 years," said John G. Geer, a Vanderbilt University political science professor. "He probably knows every nook and cranny of the State Legislature."

Mr. Ramsey praised his predecessor, but said the Republicans' time had come in Tennessee.

"John Wilder had done a good job for 36 years," he said, "but leadership needed to change, and I think both sides would agree with that."

Last week, movers carted furniture from Mr. Wilder's former offices and stacks of boxes filled his new, more modest quarters, which he shares at least temporarily with another senator.

As Mr. Wilder walked slowly down the hall after a meeting, he waved off questions about his ouster and its meaning.

"I'm a state senator," he said, one finger raised, "and I'm going to be the best state senator that I can be."

Regulate AstroTurf Lobbying (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

A MEMBER OF Congress will sit up and pay attention when told that 1,000 — or even 100 — constituents have written or e-mailed about a particular piece of legislation. Paying attention to grass-roots opinion is part of a politician's DNA.

But what if the voice of the people is really only an echo of a sophisticated pitch by professional lobbyists? In that not-uncommon situation, "grass-roots" lobbying of Congress has been dubbed the political equivalent of AstroTurf, the artificial grass first installed in the Houston Astrodome in 1966.

The real AstroTurf has its defenders. But no one argues that baseball or football players shouldn't know if they are playing on grass or on a synthetic substitute. (The information would be impossible to keep from them anyway.) Likewise, shouldn't lawmakers know whether a "grass-roots" campaign is actually "AstroTurf"?

The sponsors of the recently enacted ethics bill in the Senate thought so, and included in an early version of that legislation a proposal to require any organization that spends at least $25,000 to stimulate grass-roots lobbying to file detailed reports with Congress. The provision was stripped out, however, after complaints that the restrictions would interfere with free speech by ensnarling activists in bureaucratic red tape.

Chastened, campaign reformers have narrowed their proposals for "AstroTurf" accountability in a way that should allay any legitimate concerns about free speech. Instead of applying to all organizations that might urge their members to contact Congress, the more modest proposals being discussed would be limited to organizations that already are registered as lobbyists.

Even this regulation would be protested by some activists, who contend that a constituent who writes to a member of Congress deserves to be heard regardless of whether the idea was suggested by an interest group with access to direct mail or the Internet. After all, don't others influence us all in the formation of our political opinions?

True enough, but members of Congress have a right to know whether a campaign is the result not of a spontaneous sea change in public opinion but a professional operation. Such truth-in-packaging doesn't mean that lawmakers will disregard the outpouring of opinion on a given subject, only that they will put it in proper perspective.

Registered lobbyists are already subjected to disclosure requirements that don't apply to ordinary citizens. It's a minimal burden on free speech in the cause of making the legislative process transparent and accountable.

"AstroTurf" lobbying shouldn't be illegal, but neither should it be disguised as coming from the grass roots.

U.N. Atomic Chief Cites Iran Enrichment Plan (NYT)

By Mark Landler, David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 26 — The head of the United Nations nuclear inspection agency said Friday that Iranian officials had told him that they planned to begin installing equipment next month in an industrial-scale plant to enrich uranium.

Such a move would intensify Iran's confrontation with the Security Council, which has demanded a full suspension of the production of nuclear material, and has authorized mild sanctions.

The announcement by the official, Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, was coupled with a plea to both Tehran and Western nations for all sides to take a "timeout" to head off a larger confrontation.

"Enough flexing muscles, enough calling names," Dr. ElBaradei said in a conversation with reporters here at the World Economic Forum conference. "It's time to engage."

He proposed a suspension of the sanctions against Iran, while the Iranians simultaneously suspend enrichment of uranium. That process can produce fuel for nuclear weapons, though the Iranians deny that is their goal.

Nuclear experts and American officials say Iran's announcement may be a bluff. Tehran has run into significant difficulties in assembling centrifuges to enrich uranium. A year ago it promised to have 3,000 centrifuges running by now; instead, it is just beginning to install that equipment, at Natanz.

But Dr. ElBaradei seemed clearly concerned that once enrichment began, it would be difficult to halt, and that Iranian officials would be loath to dismantle any plant once construction had begun.

He is also concerned that such a plant could become a military target for the United States or Israel. Such a strike would be "absolutely bonkers," he said, noting that it would not deprive Iran of the technological expertise to pursue any nuclear ambitions.

"It would only strengthen the hand of hard-liners," he said. "They would simply go underground."

Dr. ElBaradei said he worried that further sanctions against Iran, which the United Nations has threatened to impose next month, "is only going to lead to an escalation."

Given what inspectors know about Iran's current capabilities, Dr. ElBaradei said, the Iranians are three to eight years away from being able to manufacture a nuclear device. That is roughly in line with estimates made by American intelligence officials.

The United States said it would stick to its insistence that Iran stop enrichment before negotiations begin. The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the reports that Iran planned to install 3,000 centrifuges showed its continued defiance.

"We'll see what Dr. ElBaradei has to say," Mr. McCormack said Friday at a briefing in Washington. "More importantly, we'll see what the Iranians do; they continue in provocative behavior."

He said the preliminary sanctions, which ban the import and export of material used in uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missiles, appeared to be having some effect in Iran.

There is evidence of an internal split in Tehran. Two hard-line newspapers that reflect the views of Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, recently demanded that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad stay away from nuclear issues because his comments were deepening Iran's isolation.

Iran's relations with the international nuclear monitoring agency have deteriorated since the sanctions were approved. Iran has demanded the agency remove the official who oversees inspections of Iranian facilities, and it has barred more than 30 inspectors, all from countries that supported sanctions.

It is not clear how much influence Dr. ElBaradei can exercise, now that the confrontation has moved to the Security Council. But he appears to believe there is support for his proposal.

A diplomat at the agency, speaking on condition of anonymity, said he had found such support in Germany and France. Those nations, along with Britain, have led the talks with Iran over its nuclear program.

Dr. ElBaradei has also consulted with Russia, which favors a more conciliatory approach. But he did not discuss the idea with American officials before making it public here, the diplomat said.

The United States has said that if Iran suspended uranium enrichment, Washington would join the Europeans in direct talks with Tehran, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has indicated that she would take part.

DOJ_NMG_0123777

Dr. ElBaradei also suggested the United States show more flexibility in its standoff with North Korea, which detonated a crude nuclear device in October. The North Koreans have demanded that the United States drop financial sanctions as a condition for reviving talks over their nuclear program.

American and North Korean officials met this month in Berlin, a meeting meant to lay the groundwork for a revival of multiparty talks in Beijing. State Department officials say they are hopeful of some kind of deal, perhaps involving a temporary freeze on plutonium production in the North.

U.N. Says Iran Plans Nuclear Development (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2007

Iran plans to begin work next month on an underground uranium enrichment facility, as part of a plan to create a network of tens of thousands of machines turning out material that could be used to make nuclear arms, U.N. officials said Friday.

The officials' comments were the first concrete confirmation that work on the facility would begin in February. A senior U.S. State Department official warned the move would be a "major miscalculation" by Iran.

"If Iran takes this step, it is going to confront universal international opposition," said Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns. "If they think they can get away with 3,000 centrifuges without another Security Council resolution and additional international pressure, then they are very badly mistaken."

Former Iranian President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, meanwhile, accused the U.S. of acting like a bully, with the ultimate aim of forcing Iran to "abandon nuclear energy." In a sermon in Tehran, he said a U.S. military buildup in the Gulf and the announcement that U.S. forces would seek to capture or kill Iranian agents in Iraq were aimed Iranian nuclear programs.

"Today our enemies have come with several issues against us while having supporters in the world communities," Rafsanjani told worshippers Friday. "This is bullying."

Also Friday, the Iranian government said it would bar all U.N. inspectors from countries that voted in favor of a U.N. Security Council resolution last month that imposed sanctions on Iran for its nuclear program. Iran said it had rejected 38 names from a list of inspectors from the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency.

Iranian officials have said repeatedly that work would start soon on the uranium enrichment facility at its Natanz underground plant. There had been speculation the leadership might launch the project next month to celebrate the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution that brought the clerical leadership to power.

But the timing of the work may in part be a gesture of defiance. The Security Council's 60-day deadline for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment runs out next month, paving the way for further sanctions.

"I understand that they are going to announce that they are going to build up their 3,000 centrifuge facility ... sometime next month," IAEA head Mohamed ElBaradei told reporters at the World Economic Forum.

U.N. officials, who demanded anonymity because the information was confidential, emphasized that Iran had not officially announced plans to embark on the assembly of what will initially be 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz. But they said senior officials have informally told the IAEA that the work would begin next month.

Iran ultimately plans to expand its program to 54,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material.

Iran says it aims to produce nuclear fuel to generate electricity. But if Iran chose, it could use the massive array of centrifuges to make enough weapons-grade material for dozens of nuclear warheads a year.

Diplomats briefed on the IAEA's findings said this month that the Iranians recently finished pre-assembly work at the Natanz facility, which is underground as protection against attack.

In enrichment plants, centrifuges are linked in what are called cascades. For now, the only known assembled centrifuge cascades in Iran are above ground at Natanz, consisting of two linked chains of 164 machines each and two smaller setups.

The two larger cascades have been running only sporadically to produce small quantities of non-weapons grade enriched uranium, while the smaller assemblies have been underground "dry testing" since November, IAEA inspectors have reported.

A U.N. official cautioned against assuming that the new work at Natanz would result in thousands of centrifuges spinning anytime soon, suggesting Tehran might do nothing more than put together another 164-machine cascade underground.

A diplomat with access to much of what is known about Iran's enrichment program said Tehran may not be technologically advanced enough to put together thousands of centrifuges in series _ work that would take months even for more developed countries. Additionally, he said, Iran might be "drawing a new line in the sand" by embarking on _ and then pausing _ its underground assembly work.

Even a symbolic start of underground installations at Natanz would sharply escalate the conflict between Tehran and world powers over its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0123778

In another example of Tehran's hardball tactics, diplomats in Vienna, where the IAEA is headquartered, said Iran had demanded the removal of a senior official linked to agency inspections of the Iranian nuclear program. Iran barred the official, Chris Charlier, from visiting last year.

ElBaradei suggested Thursday that one way to defuse tensions would be a "simultaneous time-out" _ with Iran suspending enrichment activities and the Security Council suspending sanctions so the matter could "go to the negotiating table."

In an indirect slap at the U.S. and Israel, ElBaradei also said anyone advocating military action against Tehran was "bonkers," because such a move would force Iran "to go underground."

Israel and the United States have both suggested a strike on Tehran's nuclear facilities was not off the table.

Curfew Is Lifted In Beirut, But Tension Lingers (NYT)

By Nada Bakri

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 26 — Lebanese Army soldiers reinforced checkpoints and maintained a heavy presence in tense neighborhoods in Beirut on Friday, lifting a rare nighttime curfew that had been imposed to stop the worsening violence between pro- and antigovernment crowds.

If there was any optimism in this beleaguered city, it was framed around the hopeful notion that all sides had become so frightened by the violence that perhaps they would be willing to find a compromise to end the nation's internal political standoff.

"The opposition will think about escalating maybe 10 times before doing it again," said Osama Safa, director of the Lebanese Center for Policy Studies, a research group. "I think, if anything, it proved that this can be very, very costly."

The curfew, lifted early Friday morning, was imposed after a fight at a university cafeteria grew into rioting and gunfire that left four people dead and 200 injured.

Slowly, this weary city came back to life as cleaners removed piles of debris, broken glass and bullet castings from the streets around Beirut Arab University, in Tariq Jadide, a Sunni neighborhood on the southern edge of the city.

Dozens of smashed and burned cars were towed away.

There was a veneer of calm yet deep uncertainty as the Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah and its allies held funerals for two of their activists who had been shot near the university campus.

Leaders on all sides, as they have from the beginning, called for unity to prevent Lebanon from sliding toward civil war.

"We urge all religious figures, Christian and Muslim, and all sensible people in Lebanon to shoulder their responsibility before it's too late," Sheik Mohammed Yazbik, a senior Hezbollah official, told mourners at one of the funerals.

Several thousand mourners turned out for the funerals. Gunmen fired shots in the air while others carried portraits of the deceased. The calm was fragile. "Death to Siniora, death to Jumblatt," shouted mourners in one procession, referring to Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and the pro-government Druse leader Walid Jumblatt.

At the same time, the Christian pro-government leader, Samir Geagea, said that he held the Hezbollah-led opposition responsible for the violence and warned that any moves to topple the government by force would lead to civil war.

"Some parties are trying to overthrow the government and the regime by force," said Mr. Geagea, the leader of the Lebanese Forces party. The government, he said, "will not fall under pressure, and if you continue, there will be civil war."

On Tuesday, a nationwide strike called by the Hezbollah-led opposition shut down the city and much of the nation, with roadblocks and crowds of supporters who took to the streets, burning tires and cars.

Hezbollah has demanded that Mr. Siniora step down or form a government of "national unity" that would give the opposition veto power and hold early parliamentary elections.

Mr. Siniora has refused to resign, insisting that the opposition end the protests and negotiate.

Lebanon Stands At Shiite-Sunni Brink (WSJ)

By Mariam Fam

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

The violence that Lebanon has witnessed in recent days -- culminating in clashes between Shiite opposition activists and Sunni pro-government supporters -- has again raised the specter of a civil war with a sectarian slant that echoes the growing regional Sunni-Shiite tensions. It also has underscored how combustible the stalemate has become between the Lebanese government and the opposition.

Lebanon, once viewed as a success story for democracy in the region, has previously witnessed mass protests that were largely disciplined and peaceful. But it has more recently seen a frightening escalation of unrest that troubles many Lebanese still recovering from the 15-year-old civil war that ended in 1990.

Then, the fighting was largely between Christians and Muslims. Now, the political differences, on the rise since the end of the summer war with Israel, have sectarian undertones, among other things. Lebanese Sunnis largely back the government, while the Shiite Hezbollah and other Shiite groups stand in the opposition. Christians are divided between the two camps.

Increasing polarization in the Middle East further aggravates this issue. The rising clout of Shiite Iran and its influence in Iraq -- and beyond -- has alarmed Sunni regimes in the region. Hezbollah is backed by Iran and Syria, while the Lebanese government has the support of Washington and some key European and Sunni Arab governments. And many Lebanese feel their country, which boasts a delicate religious and sectarian mix, has become a proxy battlefield for regional and international power struggles.

"Lebanon's political terrain is rapidly shifting away from a phase marked by mild tremors and toward another era of civil-war-style earthquakes in which no government will be able to find firm footing," read an editorial on the Web site of the Lebanese The Daily Star newspaper. "Anyone who has studied the history of this fractious country knows how easily and quickly minor skirmishes can spiral out of anyone's control."

The editorial lamented Thursday's incidents involving a scuffle in a Beirut university between Sunni Muslim backers of the government and Shiite supporters of Hezbollah that disintegrated into clashes with cars set afire and fighting with stones and homemade clubs. Television footage showed gunmen taking aim from rooftops and windows. At least three people were killed, according to wire reports, and each camp blamed the other for the violence.

"What really scares the Lebanese people is that now Lebanon is once again teetering on the verge of a civil war, and that it may be starting to resemble the frightening Iraqi scenario, where sectarian sedition between the Sunnis and the Shiites flares," said Sateh Noureddine, managing editor of As-Safir newspaper, in an interview.

Thursday's violence came the same day that international donors pledged some $7.6 billion in aid, loans and other help for Lebanon and its government's economic-overhaul plans. The donors' conference in Paris was seen as a success, but the violence showed it will take more than just money for war-scarred and fractured Lebanon to heal its wounds.

"Any reform programs cannot take place without a political consensus," said Farid el-Khazen, a professor of politics at the American University of Beirut and a member of the Christian opposition allied with Hezbollah. "Not much can be done unless you have political consensus and support."

Demanding greater power, Hezbollah-led opposition supporters have staged sit-in protests for nearly two months in downtown Beirut, demanding the government step down or a new one be formed. The situation started to unravel on Tuesday when the opposition stepped up its campaign -- burning tires in the streets in a strike that paralyzed Beirut and other areas across Lebanon. Clashes between supporters of the two camps ensued.

While many Lebanese agree Tuesday was a watershed, they are divided over whom to blame. "Tuesday's strike has crossed the red line. The opposition controlled the country in a way that is not peaceful, and that did not respect the freedom of opinion," Mr. Noureddine said. Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, an expert on Hezbollah, said that, feeling threatened by the opposition's show of force on Tuesday, government supporters fueled Thursday's violence to flex their own muscles. "A lot of the violence is emanating from pro-government supporters," she said.

Aware of the lurking danger, political leaders on all sides appealed for restraint. Druse leader and senior pro-government politician Walid Jumblatt called on the Hezbollah-allied speaker of parliament to reconvene lawmakers in a bid to resume dialogue, the Associated Press reported.

The appeals for calm have raised the hopes of some that the violence may serve as a wake-up call that brings the leaders of the opposing groups closer.

But many analysts feel the recent flare-up has served only to cement the sectarian divide. Most troubling, they say, is that Thursday's street clashes signaled that if the situation further deteriorates, it may become more difficult for political leaders to control their supporters and stop some from tit-for-tat attacks. Already, many are accusing saboteurs of infiltrating crowds to instigate violence. On Friday, as calm was restored to Beirut, television stations affiliated with the opposing camps rehashed Thursday's events, trading barbed accusations.

"Unfortunately, I don't feel that the Lebanese leaders have enough awareness, wisdom and ability to assess the danger and call for coming together to find a common ground," Mr. Noureddine said.

Along Beirut's Line Of Confrontation (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123780

BEIRUT, Jan. 26 -- During Lebanon's 15-year civil war, the Green Line divided Beirut into predominantly Christian and Muslim halves along a road that became a symbol as telling as it was intimidating. In time, in a war in which more than 100,000 people were killed, it was less a front line and more a no man's land, named, some say, for its unkempt weeds and bushes.

Little remains of the Green Line today, save the Barakat Building near the downtown, its stately columns and arches still honeycombed by the damage of war. Like much of Lebanon itself, the other scarred buildings along the road are sheathed in a thin facade of concrete, stone and glass.

These days, the front has shifted to the Old Airport Road, a mile-long stretch of which divides its residents by Muslim sect -- Sunni or Shiite. The emerging border evokes the old and the new of Lebanon's two-month-old crisis: civil war memories and the sectarian schism transforming Lebanon and the region around it.

"This is the line of confrontation," said Ahmed Itani, sitting with friends around a corner from the airport road, in the Sunni neighborhood of Dana. "They're there, we're here, and if something's going to happen, it's going to happen in between."

For hours Thursday, Beirut witnessed scenes reminiscent of Iraq, as hundreds of Sunni residents, aligned with the government, battled Shiites loyal to Hezbollah and the allied Amal movement, opposition groups that launched a campaign in December to topple the government. At least four people were killed and about 200 wounded. Calm returned Friday after the army imposed an overnight curfew and politicians urged their followers to retreat from the streets. Workers removed dumpsters that had served as barricades, dragged incinerated cars to curbsides and scrubbed streets stained by charred tires.

But the telltale specter of civil war lingered. Residents traded stories of both now and then: Sunni snipers perched on roofs, firing on unarmed Shiites below; Shiite vigilantes stopping cars, demanding identity cards to learn the drivers' sects.

In the claustrophobia inspired by Lebanon's shoe-horned diversity, many Sunnis were upset that Shiites had dared to encroach upon what Sunnis consider their turf, and they set up their own checkpoints in the Bekaa Valley and on the coast south of Beirut. Along the Old Airport Road, residents wrestled with the knowledge that civil wars often start through accumulated accidents, not by design.

"The leaders in this country are shepherds, and the followers are sheep. Is that not right?" Itani said. "Fight, you fight. Stop, you stop. Sleep, you sleep." His friends at a garage started laughing, until the owner, Mahmoud Akawi, stepped in.

"Who wants a war?" he asked angrily. "A long time ago, the fathers of the sons living here today died. Are the sons going to have to die now? Are we going to have to go through all these deaths again? Sunnis killing Shiites?"

Itani and his friends sat in silence.

Lebanon's crisis is more than a struggle between a government and its opposition. At issue are the fundamental questions of the country's identity: the influence of the United States, Syria and Iran; the relationship with Israel; the power of the Sunni and Shiite constituencies. Given the stakes, the government and its allies -- grouping Sunni Muslims, Druze and some Christians -- and the opposition -- the Shiite movements of Hezbollah and Amal, together with an influential Christian ally -- have escalated pressure, confident they can both mobilize and restrain their supporters. But with each clash, many say, the two sides move inexorably toward a point of no return.

On the Old Airport Road, a sign outside a Sunni mosque reads, "We want one Lebanon, not two Lebanons." Across the street, another banner says: "Sunnis and Shiites are the nation of the Prophet Muhammad. They can't be divided."

Other signs are more sectarian. A banner commemorates former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, a Sunni, who was executed by a Shiite-led government. "We will not forget you," it reads in red and black. Other posters celebrate the ongoing Shiite holiday of Ashura, "the victory of the aggrieved."

Every few hundred yards Friday, the army deployed armored personnel carriers and soldiers, some of whom were checking cars as they entered neighborhoods.

"We're against this war," said Mustafa Tahish, a 33-year-old tailor standing with his brother, Hisham, in Dana. "But armed men came to our territory. It's like a stranger coming to your house. How can we put up with this?"

"It was a provocation," his brother interrupted.

"We've been living together for years," Tahish went on. "They married us, and we married them. But you can't use force to settle a problem." He quieted. "This isn't Iraq," he said finally. "Is someone going to burn his house with his own hand?"

Traffic was light along the Old Airport Road on Friday because schools and universities were closed to let tensions subside. At one kiosk, a headline read, "Lebanon: Last chance for a solution before a disaster for everyone."

A little farther along was the Shiite neighborhood of Ghobeiri, where Wissam Berro, a grocer born to a Sunni mother and a Shiite father, worried about his wife of two months and the children they planned to have.

"How can I, if I don't know if there's going to be a war in Lebanon?" he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0123781

From Hezbollah's leaders to Shiites in the street, many speculate that the United States is encouraging the Sunni-Shiite tension as a way to blunt the growing profile of largely Shiite Iran. But there is worry, too, that whatever the design, Lebanon is too divided, too weak, too reflexive in its loyalty to its clannish leaders to withstand the repercussions of sectarian strife.

"Curse whoever awakened it!" read Friday's headline in as-Safir, one of Beirut's main daily newspapers.

Mohammed Zein al-Din shook his head as he remembered Thursday. An electrician, he was returning home from a Christian neighborhood when he was stopped in a mixed area by Amal loyalists in plain clothes, pistols tucked in their jackets. The men asked for his identity card. "They found I was a Shiite," he said, "and they told me I could go."

Din pointed at the Old Airport Road. It was the khat al-tamas, he said, the line of confrontation. "Anything can happen because everyone's armed," he added, then grimaced. "Pretty soon we're going to need three or four identity cards to get around."

Storming Of Home Caps Deadly Day In Gaza Strip (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

GAZA CITY, Jan. 26 -- Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a fighter from the rival Fatah movement Friday, witnesses said, sparking a deadly gun battle. The clash capped a day of factional violence across the Gaza Strip that killed at least 13 people, including a 2-year-old boy.

The fighting, among the deadliest in nearly two months, marred the anniversary of Hamas's upset victory in Palestinian parliamentary elections. After nightfall, gunfire continued to echo through Gaza City. The heaviest shooting was concentrated around the residence of Mansour Shaleil, a Fatah leader in the Jabalya refugee camp just north of Gaza City.

Hamas gunmen surrounded the house early Friday to detain Shaleil, accusing him of involvement in a shooting in which two Hamas supporters were killed. After an hours-long standoff, dozens of gunmen stormed the house and exchanged fire with Shaleil and a supporter, according to witnesses and ambulance drivers.

The gunmen later withdrew, Palestinian news media reported, leaving Shaleil unharmed. Two men identified as Hamas fighters were killed.

"It looks like they forgot who the enemy is," said Maher Megdad, a Fatah spokesman. "They forgot the Israeli occupation."

Fatah gunmen, meanwhile, kidnapped 19 Hamas fighters and threatened to kill them if Shaleil was harmed, officials on both sides said. After the siege at Shaleil's house ended, Hamas and Fatah officials said they were working with mediators to arrange the hostages' release.

Fighting also spread to the headquarters of the pro-Fatah Preventive Security Service in Gaza City. Four Hamas gunmen were killed in a battle outside a nearby mosque.

In other incidents, fighting erupted outside the residences of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas.

Deadly Battles Shatter Gaza Calm (BBC)

BBC.com, January 27, 2007

At least 13 people have died in some of the deadliest fighting between rival Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah in Gaza for months.

Two civilians - one a two-year-old boy - were among those killed, Palestinian medics said.

The clashes erupted after weeks of relative calm and renewed efforts to form a national unity government.

Both Hamas and Fatah said they were suspending talks after the violence, which continued into the night.

Both factions also kidnapped members of the opposing side during the day.

More than 40 people have died as a result of a power struggle between supporters of the Hamas-led government and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction since mid-December.

Echo of gunfire

The BBC's Alan Johnston in Gaza says there has been intensive mediation by Egyptian diplomats in an effort to stop the bloodshed there.

He says late in the evening word came that Fatah and Hamas had agreed to order their supporters off the streets.

But our correspondent says both then accused the other of reneging on the deal and clashes continued.

Some of the heaviest fighting took place in the Jabaliya refugee camp, where Hamas gunmen laid siege to the home of a local Fatah leader.

The gunmen eventually stormed the building and two people were killed.

DOJ_NMG_0123782

Militants linked to Fatah said they had captured at least 19 Hamas supporters in response to the siege. Some were later freed.

As night fell the streets of Gaza continued to echo to the sound of gunfire and explosions.

Elsewhere, fighting erupted outside the residences of Mr Abbas and Hamas Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar.

Mr Zahar's home was damaged after being hit by a rocket-propelled grenade, security sources said.

Palestinian Factional Strife Leaves 14 Dead (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Rushdi Abu Alouf

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

JABALIYA, GAZA STRIP — Fourteen Palestinians died Friday in a resurgence of factional violence that marred the one-year anniversary of Hamas' victory in parliamentary elections.

The daily death toll was one of the highest in the sporadic street fighting that has sunk the Palestinians deeper into chaos and poverty over the last year and complicated efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Friday's bloodshed disrupted talks between Hamas and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' rival Fatah movement on a proposed power-sharing arrangement.

Hamas' upset win Jan. 25 of last year gave the militant Islamic group control of the government, ending Fatah's dominance.

Because Hamas is sworn to Israel's destruction, its takeover prompted the United States, other Western countries and Israel to cut off funding to the Palestinian Authority.

Abbas, who had been elected president in 2005, has been trying for months to cut a deal with Hamas that would install a coalition Cabinet supportive of his efforts to negotiate peace with Israel and end the crippling sanctions. These talks have broken down several times amid the sporadic factional fighting, which has left more than 70 people dead since May.

Friday's violence, in which at least 34 people were wounded, broke two weeks of relative calm.

Four Hamas gunmen were killed in Gaza City after they and other worshipers leaving a mosque exchanged mortar and grenade fire with Fatah-led Preventive Security Service police at their nearby headquarters.

Most of the violence occurred in this northern Gaza town and its refugee camp.

After a 10-hour siege, dozens of police from the Hamas-led Interior Ministry stormed the home of a senior officer in the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, Fatah's militia, trying to arrest him for an earlier killing. The officer, Mansour Shaleil, escaped harm, but six people died — one of his relatives, a Fatah defender, two Hamas policemen and two unarmed bystanders.

During the siege, Fatah militants elsewhere said they had seized 19 Hamas members as hostages and threatened to kill them if Shaleil was hurt. Eleven of the hostages, held in the West Bank city of Nablus, were later freed; the fate of the others was unknown.

Hamas police officials said Shaleil was implicated in a roadside bomb explosion that hit a Hamas police jeep late Thursday, killing two policemen. Five other police officers and five civilians were wounded.

Before dawn Friday, Hamas policemen surrounded the home of another Fatah militiaman suspected of involvement in the bombing and killed him. A police spokesman said the militiaman had fired at the police as they went to arrest him.

Fatah officials called his death an execution.

Also killed Friday was a Hamas activist shot by a rooftop sniper as he rode through Jabaliya in a loudspeaker van summoning people to a rally marking the election anniversary.

Hamas had scheduled the rally for Gaza City but moved it to Jabaliya as a protest against Fatah's alleged role in the latest violence.

The crowd of 6,000 people, many of them bused from elsewhere, was small for a Hamas gathering in the coastal strip, the movement's stronghold, and many times fewer than Fatah mobilized for a Gaza City rally. Hamas policemen set up roadblocks and stood sentry on rooftops to protect the gathering as militants waved the movement's green flags.

The main speaker, lawmaker Mushir Masri, said Hamas would stand firm against its foes: Israel, the United States and "leaders of the coup," a reference to Abbas and other Fatah leaders who are trying to force Hamas to give up full control of the government.

"Don't waste your time and effort, because we are staying in our positions, in the government and in the parliament, just as the mountains of Palestine are staying in their place," shouted Masri.

Despite the Western economic pressures, which have made it impossible for the government to pay full salaries to its 165,000 employees, Hamas remains relatively popular — about even with Fatah in several opinion polls.

Abbas, reluctant to force a showdown, has delayed the plan he announced last month to call parliamentary and presidential elections ahead of schedule, a move Hamas has said it would resist.

DOJ_NMG_0123783

He set a deadline Thursday, promising to fix an election date unless talks with Hamas produced agreement within three weeks on a power-sharing government that would recognize Israel's right to exist.

But Friday's violence forced a postponement of the latest scheduled power-sharing talks until at least Sunday, Hamas officials said. Fatah officials said the talks were suspended until further notice.

"How can dialogue go on when there is a bomb underneath the table?" said Fatah spokesman Tawfiq abu Khoussa.

Deadly Suicide Bomber Attack At Hotel In Pakistan's Capital (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Jan. 26 — A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a Marriott hotel here on Friday afternoon, killing himself and a security guard, the police and security officials said. At least five other people were wounded.

No one immediately claimed responsibility.

The attack took place in an upscale neighborhood of the Pakistani capital considered to be a high-security zone.

Many foreign visitors stay at the Marriott, and important government and private functions are often held there. The prime minister and many of his cabinet ministers, members of Parliament and diplomats live nearby.

The United States Embassy issued an advisory to American citizens in the country.

"The embassy strongly advises all Americans to avoid the area, exercise caution, and limit unnecessary travel," the statement read.

Officials and witnesses said the suicide bomber had tried to enter the hotel through an entrance near the parking area.

"There is an emergency gate which is used by the employees of the hotel," Brig. Javed Iqbal Cheema, a retired officer who runs the National Crisis Management agency, said in an interview at the blast site.

He said the bomber appeared to have planned to force his way through the emergency gate.

"The guard, as a matter of fact, resisted entry into the gate and did not allow him to get inside," he said, adding that when the bomber saw that he could not enter, he detonated his bomb there. The bomber and the guard were killed.

"We don't know where he parked his car, but primarily he was on foot and trying to make forced entry into the hotel," Brigadier Cheema said.

Officials here said the bomber's remains would be examined by forensic investigators. He is believed to have been in his mid-20s, according to initial reports.

The blast shattered the glass of several vehicles parked in the nearby parking lot.

The police cordoned off the area, and security forces were put on high alert in the city. Three hotel staff members were wounded and hospitalized. No hotel guests were injured, according to a statement issued by the office of the District Magistrate in Islamabad.

Pakistani officials said it was too early to try to determine who might be behind the attack. Pakistan has experienced sporadic violence carried out by local militants and groups linked to Al Qaeda since President Pervez Musharraf allied himself with the United States in 2001 in the effort to curb terrorism.

International hotel chains like Marriott and Sheraton and branches of foreign companies like KFC and McDonald's have been targets.

"One should not speculate whether it's a reprisal or a continuation of what is going on in this country and region," Brigadier Cheema said.

The same view was echoed by Tariq Azim Khan, the minister of state for information and broadcasting. "It would be premature to judge the motives of the suicide bomber," he said.

Chinese Colonel Sees Arms In Space (WT/AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland -- A senior Chinese military officer predicts that weapons will be deployed in outer space despite her government's long-standing desire to prevent an arms race there.

Yao Yunzhu, a senior colonel in the People's Liberation Army, brought up China's recent successful test of an anti-satellite weapon during a World Economic Forum dinner Thursday.

"My wish is we really want to keep space as a peaceful place for human beings," she said, adding that China would like all countries to come to a consensus that space should be used only for peaceful purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0123784

"But personally, I'm pessimistic about it," said Col. Yao, 52, who directs the Asia-Pacific Office at the Academy of Military Science in Beijing. "My prediction: Outer space is going to be weaponized in our lifetime."

Col. Yao's remarks were the first time a member of the Chinese military has commented on the test. The only other official comment, from the Foreign Ministry, offered the barest confirmation and repeated stock positions about China's wish to keep space free of weapons.

"This isn't the act of a country who remains fiercely committed to peace and harmony in the world," said Adm. Timothy Keating, commander of U.S. Northern Command. "This is a cause for concern. ... In executing this test, they have created potential significant problems for international space flight."

Adm. Keating told the Associated Press in an interview this week there are ongoing worries that such tests have other consequences, "intended or otherwise," that China must realize, including potential damage to other satellites or the space station by debris.

He added that the United States does not now plan a direct response to the test, but "there are a number of things that are on the list of potential military options" if it happens again.

The Jan. 11 test sparked criticism from the United States and Japan, and created concerns over the rising militarization of space. Analysts said it also represented an indirect threat to U.S. efforts to remain predominant in space and on the ground, because it raised the possibility that the network of U.S. spy satellites could be shot down.

The U.S. military has had the capability to shoot down satellites since the 1980s. Russia has a similar capacity, and now China is the third potential military power in space.

China confirmed the test on Tuesday but did not provide details -- and neither did Col. Yao. The magazine Aviation Week, which first reported the test, said the satellite was hit by a kinetic kill vehicle launched from a ballistic missile.

China's long-standing policy has been to ban weapons in space, Col. Yao said, noting that Russia and China presented a draft outline for a treaty to prevent the deployment of weapons in space to the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva in June 2002.

The United States objected at the time, saying the 1967 Outer Space Treaty provided sufficient guarantees against the weaponization of space. The Russians countered that while the 1967 treaty banned weapons of mass destruction in space, it did not contain any legal barriers to putting other weapons in orbit around the Earth.

Without naming any country, but in an apparent reference to the United States, Col. Yao said if there's going to be "a space superpower, it's not going to be alone, and China is not going to be the only one."

"It will have company," she said.

Her rank of senior colonel is equivalent to that of a brigadier or one-star general in the U.S. military. She belongs to a small group of fluent English speakers the usually secretive People's Liberation Army uses to deal with foreigners.

Moscow Lashes Out At Georgia Over Uranium Sale (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 26 (AP) — Russia's foreign minister denounced on Friday the detention of a Russian man accused of trying to sell highly enriched uranium to Georgian agents, calling it a "provocation."

A government scientist, meanwhile, confirmed that a sample of the uranium sent to Russia was weapons-grade, but said the sample was too small to determine its origin, news agencies reported.

Igor Shkabura, deputy director of the Bochvar Inorganic Materials Institute, said the uranium sent by Georgia "could be used for military productions, including nuclear weapons," according to ITAR-Tass.

It was the first public comment by a named Russian official to claims by Georgia that it arrested and jailed a Russian man last year for trying to sell weapons-grade uranium to an agent posing as a rich foreign buyer.

The reports that emerged Wednesday, confirmed by United States officials, renewed concern about security at Russia's array of nuclear facilities. They also aggravated already high tensions between Russia and Georgia, which have been at odds for years over the status of South Ossetia and Abkhazia, two renegade regions of Georgia seeking either independence or absorption into Russia.

Georgian officials say their agent made contact with the man selling contraband uranium in South Ossetia, which is widely seen as a regional epicenter for smuggling.

Georgia's Foreign Ministry issued a statement late Thursday saying the uranium sting highlighted the need for international observer missions in both regions, a proposal that Georgia has been pushing in recent months. Russia has peacekeepers in both regions, which have been under the control of unrecognized separatist governments since fighting ended in the mid-1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0123785

The ministry statement said, “Georgia is far from politicizing these questions.”

Russia’s foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, said that he could see no reason for the detention of the man accused of smuggling the uranium.

“On the basis of the facts that I have at my disposal, I can say that this was a provocation,” he said, according to Interfax and RIA-Novosti.

Russia Calls Uranium Incident A Ploy (LAT)

By David Holley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

Georgia's news of an arrest is propaganda meant to tarnish Moscow's image, authorities say.

MOSCOW — Russian authorities on Friday rejected as an overblown propaganda ploy the announcement this week that one of their citizens was arrested last year in Georgia while allegedly trying to sell a small amount of weapons-grade uranium.

Russian national Oleg Khintsagov was arrested Feb. 1 after he smuggled about 3.5 ounces of the uranium into Georgia from his homeland, expecting to receive $1 million for it, Shota Utiashvili, chief of the analytical department of the Georgian Interior Ministry, said Friday in a telephone interview from Tbilisi, the Georgian capital.

Khintsagov, who thought he was dealing with "an extremely wealthy customer" wanting to buy nuclear bomb-making material, claimed that he would be able to provide up to 6.6 pounds at the price of $1 million for each 3.5 ounces, Utiashvili said.

Khintsagov was convicted for the attempted sale and is serving a sentence of at least eight years in a Georgian prison.

Some experts say that as little as 4 pounds of weapons-grade uranium could be sufficient to construct a bomb, but more common estimates are that even a highly sophisticated weapon would need several times that amount. Estimates of how much enriched uranium a terrorist organization would need to make a relatively crude bomb typically range from 35 to 50 pounds.

Utiashvili charged that Russia had not cooperated in the investigation of the incident, which was first made public this week by Georgian and U.S. officials. These officials said the CIA, the FBI and the Energy Department had assisted in the case.

"We think it is extremely dangerous that such material can get into the hands of terrorists," Utiashvili said. "We think it is in everybody's interests, and especially in the interests of Russia, to get to the bottom of it and assist us in this investigation."

Georgian-Russian relations have been strained since last year, and Russian authorities have blamed any lack of cooperation in the case on the Georgian side.

An official of the Russian Federal Atomic Energy Agency, who asked for anonymity because the agency was not yet issuing a formal statement on the case, said that shortly after the man's arrest, Georgia had provided a tiny sample of the seized material for testing in Russia.

The sample was sufficient for Russian scientists to determine that it was weapons-grade uranium but was not large enough to determine the origin of the material or the method of production, he said.

The agency requested a larger sample but did not get one, he added. The official said the affair "seems to us to be very strange, to say the least."

Russian officials and analysts said Friday that Georgia was using the incident to score propaganda points.

"It appears obvious that Georgian 'hawks' were consciously trying to deal a painful blow to the prestige of Russia in the international arena," the state-run Rossiyskaya Gazeta newspaper declared in an unsigned commentary.

Georgia's actions in the case were "a planned information provocation," said Andrei Cherkasenko, board chairman of Atompromresursy, a manufacturer of nuclear power industry equipment, according to RIA Novosti, the state-run Russian news agency.

Ivan Safranchuk, director of the Moscow office of the Washington-based Center for Defense Information, expressed doubt that Khintsagov really had access to the quantity of nuclear material he claimed.

"It reminds one very much of similar FSB sting operations in the early 1990s, when FSB agents, in order to produce some successful operations, provoked various low-rank employees and guards at companies that possessed nuclear materials," he said, referring to the main successor agency to the KGB.

"They would offer sums of money for stealing it and selling it to FSB agents posing as eager customers," he explained. "I think genuine serious terrorists would rather go to Pakistan if they wanted to lay their hands on nuclear materials. They must know better than to try to fish for that stuff in the waters of the former Soviet Union, where they most likely will end up stiffed, cheated and robbed rather than get back with the real thing.

"I don't think the international community should give much credit to this story and express serious concern about the situation," Safranchuk said.

Utiashvili said Khintsagov had previously been known to Georgian authorities as "a small-time smuggler specializing mostly in foodstuffs."

"When we received information that this man claimed to be in possession of some weapons-grade nuclear materials, we didn't really believe it was true, given the trade habits of this person," Utiashvili said. "But we decided to follow that trace anyway because we can't leave any information like this without proper investigation. So we set up an operation in which one of our men posed as an extremely wealthy customer who was interested in obtaining that material."

During the sting operation, Khintsagov was tracked from Russia through the Russian-backed Georgian separatist region of South Ossetia to the main part of Georgia controlled by the central government, Utiashvili said.

"We are completely convinced he brought the nuclear material from Russia," he said. "When the man and his three Georgian accomplices were arrested and the material was analyzed by our experts, we were shocked to hear that the material in question was indeed weapons-grade uranium-235."

Utiashvili said Georgia had requested help from the FSB, or Russian Federal Security Service, immediately after the arrests were made, but that the agency never responded.

"Unfortunately," he said, "Khintsagov never either during the investigation or during the trial testified where he got the dangerous material and who helped him get that in Russia."

Garry Kasparov: The Other Russia (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

NEW YORK -- As the longtime world chess champion, Garry Kasparov was a famously aggressive player. His latest game is politics, and his style is equally aggressive. "Our goal is to dismantle the regime," he says, speaking of the political coalition he leads to bring down Vladimir Putin.

Mr. Kasparov's Putin antipathy is well known to readers of this newspaper, of which he is a contributing editor. "I Was Wrong About Putin," was the headline on his Jan. 9, 2001, op-ed article for this page. One year into Mr. Putin's presidency, Mr. Kasparov sounded an early warning about a man whose "KGB roots have informed a style of governance that is neither reformist nor particularly democratic." Since then, Mr. Kasparov has scarcely let up, retiring from chess in March 2005 in part to devote himself to politics.

Mr. Kasparov's new occupation is not without its perils -- a thought that occurred to me as we arranged to meet earlier this month at his newly refurbished apartment in an art deco building on a smart street in Midtown Manhattan. It's a neighborhood replete with sushi bars -- of the sort that bring to mind, ghoulishly, the late Alexander Litvinenko, who was poisoned with polonium 210.

The doorman announces me, and Mr. Kasparov greets me at the door. We are old interlocutors -- I was present at his first meeting with the editorial board in March 1990 and was his editor at the Journal for years. So we kiss -- twice, once on each cheek, not three times, as is the custom in Moscow. After his wife serves tea -- in bone-china English cups, not à la Russe, in glasses -- I ask Mr. Kasparov about the risks: "Look," he says, "there are certain moments in your life when you should forget calculations and do what you believe is your moral duty. I knew that the choice would be dangerous. That's why our baby was born here. I'm prepared to take all the risk, but if I can avoid some, I do." The Kasparovs have a three-month-old daughter.

"The Other Russia" is the name of the unlikely left-right coalition conceived by Mr. Kasparov in 2005 and founded last year. It is composed of groups that would normally be at political odds -- democrats like Mr. Kasparov, nationalists, socialists, even Bolsheviks. Mr. Kasparov predicts that the Communist Party will join up before the end of the year. "There's still a lot of distrust," he says, with more than a modicum of understatement. "It's a problem, but I don't think it's insurmountable. The big advantage of the Other Russia, and I think it's our biggest accomplishment, is that we've established the principle of compromise, which was not yet seen in Russian politics. It was always confrontation. It was a mentality of a civil war. We eliminated it."

A declaration at the time of the Other Russia's organizing conference last summer reads, "We are gathering together because we are united in our disagreement with the current political course of the Kremlin and united in our alarm for the present and future of our country." The group's sole objective is to find a candidate to run -- and win -- in the March 2008 presidential elections. Or as Mr. Kasparov puts it with characteristic bluntness: "When a liberal democracy is re-established, everybody goes his or her way."

The Russian Constitution forbids Mr. Putin from running for a third term -- though that doesn't quell widespread speculation that the president will ignore the rule of law and do so anyway. He "has the administrative resources" to do so, Mr. Kasparov agrees, but it would be at the price of his legitimacy -- both in the West and at home. "I don't think Putin wants to take such a chance."

Mr. Kasparov believes Mr. Putin's "mentality is just to run away -- with all the Russian billionaires. This is the richest ruling elite in the world. They are way ahead of the Saudi princes. They are mega-rich. When you're so rich, you have to make sure that your funds are safe." But "if Putin goes, then who will be in charge? That's a big problem. Then it's instability. An authoritarian regime cannot have a successor while the big name [Mr. Putin] is still alive, much less well, young and strong."

As the new year unfolds, Mr. Kasparov predicts "a political crisis" in Mr. Putin's government, along with "less stability, more uncertainty." That's the opening for the Other Russia. "We should keep our group together, close to the wall, to get into the hall when it's broken. But not too close to be buried under the debris." And then? "If the Other Russia wins, who cares? The victory of the Other Russia candidate destroys the legacy of any institution built under Putin. You have to start from scratch. You have to call new [parliamentary] elections. You have to introduce new laws. You have to undergo judicial reform. You have to destroy censorship." In short, you have to start over, back to where Russia was before Mr. Putin took over, building democracy, block by block.

The next step for the Other Russia, Mr. Kasparov says, is to come up with a platform and work out the rules for selecting a presidential candidate, tasks that are on the agenda for a conference planned for April. The candidate will likely be chosen in another conference in September or October, Mr. Kasparov explains. At the moment Mikhail Kasyanov, a former prime minister, "looks most prominent."

And what about Garry Kasparov? Is he a candidate? It's the only time in 15 years of conversations with Mr. Kasparov that I've known him to be less than confident in a reply. "So far . . .," he says -- note the "so far" -- "so far, I don't think my personal participation helps the coalition because so far" -- another one! -- "I keep the position of moderator. . . . I keep balance of different forces. If I step into the game, that might jeopardize the whole coalition."

In the course of our discussion, Mr. Kasparov refers often to the lack of a free press in Russia. So how, then, will the Other Russia get its message across? "The role of Internet is growing," he says. "Mobile telephones are not unique anymore, not even in rural villages." But -- and the master chess player may have too much confidence in the analytic abilities of ordinary Russians here -- "more important is growing malcontent. People are getting really unhappy. And if they're unhappy, they'll listen."

Mr. Kasparov is far more worried about money, which is short; but "I think in 2007 we will see a major influx of our financial support from within Russia because people can see that the ground is shaky." The Other Russia won't touch "politically exposed money," he says -- and emphatically denies that exiled oligarch Boris Berezovsky is a donor. But in the end, he says, "You know, you can't buy political support. Either you are the right man at the right place at the right time or no money helps you." More political naïveté?

Our hour nearly at an end, conversation drifts back to the early '90s and the discussions we used to have about Russia and its future. Is there something the U.S. might have done differently back then, I ask, that would have helped keep Russia on the path to democracy?

Mr. Kasparov gives a wry smile. "I think the best thing [the U.S.] could have done was to get Saddam [Hussein] 15 years earlier," he says. "By going after Saddam in 1991, I think we could have saved Yugoslavia from a civil war and could have sent a message, a very powerful message, to many dictators. . . . In 1991, the United States was much stronger and everybody else was much weaker."

The decision to let Saddam stay in power happened under the watch of President George H.W. Bush, whom Mr. Kasparov isn't shy about criticizing. But he's far more scathing about President Bill Clinton. "During the Clinton years, the United States did virtually nothing in the international arena. . . . There were a lot of activities, but when you look at the core events, I think the influence was irrelevant. . . . Leadership. There was no leadership. . . . There was a big window of opportunity to show leadership, in 1992-93. In those years the whole world was in an ambiguous state after the Cold War. It was a new world, and it required leadership. The way Winston Churchill and [Harry] Truman showed it in World War II. . . . Missing this chance and playing sporadically -- you know, boom, boom, you play one move here, one move there. The United States was asleep."

What advice does he have for George W. Bush about helping Russian democracy today? "Stay neutral," comes the swift reply. The "worst thing" that happened to the democracy movement, he says, was the inclusion of Russia in the Group of 7 democracies, now the G-8, a designation he can't bring himself to utter. Now, Washington should take that position that "there must be an election under the Russian constitution. Putin must go, and elections should be held. Period. That's enough. There's no double standard. Obey the Constitution. That's it."

In addition to his work with the Other Russia, Mr. Kasparov continues to write books about chess -- he's up to Volume Six in a series about his great predecessors -- and he has a mass-market book coming out this year called "How Life Imitates Chess," about the decision-making process in chess, business, politics and history. But at least for now, politics has taken the place of chess as the big game in his life: "I just don't see any other choice for me," he says. "As I used to say for 25 years, I am defending the colors of my country. I'm still doing the same, just not at the chessboard. At a much larger board."

Kosovo To Declare Statehood In Months (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Neil Macdonald

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

Kosovo is to declare independence in the next few months, with the tacit support of the EU and Nato, in an effort to resolve the eight-year impasse on the status of the province at the heart of the 1999 war between Nato and Belgrade.

Senior western diplomats say the province will make its move and be recognised as independent by European Union and Nato countries once a United Nations resolution about its future – expected to stop short of granting independence – is agreed.

"It's for a state to determine whether it's a state and for others to recognise it or not, and that's what's going to happen," said a western diplomat. He added that although the EU would recognise Kosovo as independent, Serbia would not.

Western diplomats believe bilateral recognition of Kosovo's independence is the only way out of the dispute about the future of the province, but acknowledge they will have to work hard to prevent Serbia's objections destabilising the region as a whole.

The EU and US see Kosovo as the biggest remaining source of instability in the Balkans. They intend to avoid either more rioting among Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority like that in March 2004 or an attempt by Belgrade to partition the province, over which it claims sovereignty.

Russian opposition means the UN resolution will not declare Kosovo independent. But the EU and Nato believe the resolution is necessary to prevent the province spinning out of control.

Muhamet Hamiti, senior political adviser to Kosovo's ethnic Albanian leadership, confirmed the province was considering a unilateral declaration of independence but added it would prefer to work within the UN process: "We have been independent since 1999 but we need our sovereignty recognised by the international community. We don't expect our independence and sovereignty as a gift from anybody."

On Friday Martti Ahtisaari, UN chief mediator on Kosovo, presented proposals to the contact group of leading powers on Kosovo made up of the UK, France, Germany, Italy, the US and Russia. He plans to take his blueprint to the leaders of Serbia and Kosovo on February 2, to start negotiation before a UN Security Council resolution in March.

Moscow wants Mr Ahtisaari to take more time, arguing there is no permanent government in place in Belgrade.

U.N. Plan Expected To Pave Way For Kosovo Independence (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 26 — The United Nations mediator Martti Ahtisaari presented his proposals for the final status of Kosovo on Friday, most likely setting the tiny war-torn territory on its way toward independence.

Although that goal is still months away and subject to a vote at the United Nations, the presentation of a plan is an important and long-delayed step in resolving the still potentially explosive tensions that led to war in Europe eight years ago.

The recommendations would leave the former Yugoslav province free to declare independence from Serbia, according to Western diplomats who have seen the plan. But they say it would also impose international supervision, much like what exists in Bosnia, to provide protection for Kosovo's ethnic Serbs.

As a result, the proposals fall short of the full independence so hoped for by the territory's majority population of ethnic Albanians, according to Western diplomats.

Even with the promise of international involvement, the diplomats say, Russia, a Serbian ally whose support is a crucial element, remains cool to the plan.

The proposals foresee a strong international presence for the indefinite future, and include "a lot of measures to guarantee and promote the rights of the minority communities," Remi Dourlot, Mr. Ahtisaari's spokesman, said in Vienna, where the plan was presented.

NATO troops, which have kept peace in the country since fighting ended in 1999, will stay put for the time being. And while the United Nations mission governing the territory will pack up and leave, it will be replaced by another international organization that will have executive powers to annul any legislation that breaches Kosovo's obligations under United Nations agreements, diplomats said.

If the United Nations Security Council approves the plan, Kosovo is expected to quickly declare its independence and could expect swift recognition from its American and European supporters, even if Serbia rejected such a move.

But that step, diplomats caution, is probably months away.

"I foresee this process taking some time, and we might be in a wholly different situation," said one senior Western diplomat in Vienna who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to comment on the proposal until it is made public. "No one can predict the Security Council dynamic."

Mr. Ahtisaari handed his recommendations to representatives of the so-called Contact Group — the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Russia — during a meeting at a secret location in Vienna. It will be presented next Friday to the Serbian government in Belgrade and the Kosovo government in Pristina.

Serbia and Kosovo will have the opportunity to ask questions and suggest changes to the proposals. When Mr. Ahtisaari feels he has exhausted those negotiations, he is expected to present a plan to the Security Council for approval. Kosovo and Serbia remain far apart in their positions, and experts say it is unlikely that Mr. Ahtisaari can close the gap.

Already, Russia, which supports Serbia's efforts to keep Kosovo as a province, is pushing for the Security Council vote to be delayed until Belgrade has formed a government after recent elections, diplomats in Vienna say.

Serbia's nationalist Radical Party came in first with 28 percent of the vote this month, but the democratic parties that came in second and third have the best chance to form a coalition.

But four Western diplomats interviewed said they doubted that Serbia could prevail upon Russia to veto a resolution once the Security Council is presented with one.

Mr. Ahtisaari, a former Finnish president, has not said when he expected to send the proposals to the Security Council, but diplomats involved in the negotiations say they are pressing for it to happen this spring.

According to one diplomat familiar with the plan, it would give Kosovo the right to enter into some international agreements and join world organizations as a sovereign state.

NATO would train a civil defense force that could eventually become a Kosovo Army, though it is not clear what would become of the Kosovo Protection Corps, which includes former Kosovo Liberation Army fighters and has been accused of aiding ethnic Albanian rebels in Macedonia and other misconduct.

In other ways, Kosovo would remain subject to international community oversight. The European Union is already setting up a police force of more than 1,000 officers to monitor the territory's police, judges, prosecutors and even prison guards.

The most politically delicate part of the plan concerns treatment of the estimated 114,000 Serbs in Kosovo, most of whom adamantly oppose independence from Serbia.

To reassure the minority that their rights will not be overrun, some Serbian areas would reportedly be given autonomy, and be free to receive some Serbian government help in building hospitals and schools. Mr. Ahtisaari's plan also reportedly provides for the creation of several new municipalities where the concentration of Serbs is high.

Serbian legislators in the Kosovo Parliament, meanwhile, would be able to stop at least some legislation if they believe it discriminates against the Serbian minority, diplomats said. Serbian religious institutions would also be guaranteed special protection.

Kosovo, nearly the size of Connecticut, has about two million people, 90 percent of whom are ethnic Albanian Muslims, a legacy of Ottoman rule.

It was an autonomous region within the Yugoslav federation until 1989, when Slobodan Milosevic asserted Belgrade's authority over the territory. That led to a rebellion by ethnic Albanians that was brutally suppressed until NATO intervened with a bombing campaign against Mr. Milosevic's troops in March 1999.

The war ended that June 1 when Serbian forces withdrew from Kosovo and NATO peacekeepers moved in. Kosovo became a United Nations protectorate with the promise that its final status would be decided over time. NATO has recently warned that Kosovo Albanian patience in waiting for that solution is running thin.

Rift Widens Among Nations Over Kosovo (AP)

By William J. Kole, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2007

Russia is pressing for more time to examine a U.N. proposal for the future of Kosovo, Western and Russian officials said Friday, underscoring a widening rift between Moscow _ a key ally of Serbia _ and the United States and its European allies.

"Russia wants a longer period" to consider the plan, which U.N. special envoy Martti Ahtisaari presented in Vienna to diplomats from the so-called Contact Group _ U.S., Russia, Britain, France, Germany and Italy _ a Western official told The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0123790

Other members of the Contact Group insisted that "we've got to set a time limit" on the roadmap for the independence-minded province, said the official, who was not authorized to discuss details of the proposal and spoke on condition of anonymity.

Russia is a traditional ally of Serbia, which considers Kosovo the heart of its ancient homeland and insists that it remain part of Serbian territory. Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority has been pushing for outright independence.

The U.N. Security Council will have the final say on Ahtisaari's plan, which the former Finnish president will formally present to both sides on Feb. 2.

Moscow's apparent misgivings _ and its veto power at the U.N. _ have raised the possibility of a diplomatic showdown with the United States, which backs the province's drive for statehood.

The other members of the Contact Group "agreed that the plan should go to the parties" without delay, the Western official said. But a Russian diplomat told the AP that the Kremlin "would prefer to wait" at least until Serbia, which held parliamentary elections earlier this month, forms a new government.

"We would not favor hasty moves," the Russian official said. The Russian official also was not permitted to discuss the proposal publicly and spoke on condition of anonymity.

Ahtisaari's deputy, Albert Rohan, called Friday's meeting "very good and positive," but declined to provide details. The diplomats planned to take the document to their capitals for further review, spokesman Remi Dourlot said.

In Pristina, Kosovo Prime Minister Agim Ceku reacted with impatience to the Russian request, insisting: "There are no more reasons to delay the status process."

Ceku said he realized the proposal "may contain elements that are not that favorable _ not all will be what we want."

"But it will be an acceptable package, we believe, for the people of Kosovo," he said. "I am confident that Kosovo will be independent and that when Ahtisaari goes to the Security Council he will propose independence for Kosovo."

His deputy, Lufti Haziri, said the U.N. blueprint was crafted around "two main issues, two main principles: Kosovo's right to its future and Kosovo's obligations toward minorities."

But diplomats and officials have said the proposal likely will not mention the word independence, although it is expected to give Kosovo some attributes of a sovereign state, such as access to international institutions and provisions for a security force.

Kosovo has been under U.N. control since mid-1999 _ when NATO airstrikes ended former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic's crackdown on ethnic Albanian separatists _ and is currently patrolled by a 16,000-strong NATO-led peacekeeping force.

Ahtisaari has said his plan focuses on the protection of Kosovo's small Serbian minority and envisages a strong international presence backed up by the NATO peacekeepers.

International mediators have held yearlong talks between ethnic Albanian and Serbian leaders on issues such as giving self-rule to Serbs in areas where they form a majority, protecting their religious and cultural monuments and offering them constitutional guarantees so they are not overruled.

Oliver Ivanovic, a moderate Kosovo Serb leader from the ethnically divided city of Kosovska Mitrovica, said he was briefed earlier on key elements of the plan. He said Serbs "will have special rights in security, health services, education and cultural matters."

Diplomats said the plan also outlines post-status international supervision, with the European Union's top envoy in Kosovo likely to have veto power over laws and government decisions.

That would resemble the Dayton accords that ended Bosnia's 1992-95 war and established an international administrator to oversee that country's day-to-day affairs.

Tokyo Cuts Aid, And Hinterland Withers In Japan (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

YUBARI, Japan — Buried in chest-deep snow, History Village sprawled across a valley here, undisturbed by the tourists it was supposed to attract.

The place has gone bankrupt, as has its owner, this city on the northern island of Hokkaido.

No visitor could be seen the other day walking up the road, past the robot museum, the building with stuffed animals, the one dedicated to fossils, the one on life in the 1950s — “We were poor but happy in those days” — or the coal mine museum.

DOJ_NMG_0123791

During Japan's economic boom, Tokyo showered enormous subsidies on Yubari to build these huge though poorly thought-out tourist attractions, which drew few visitors, ran large deficits and saddled this city of 12,828 inhabitants with more than $500 million in debt.

At first it was a convenient arrangement: the hinterlands prospered, politically connected contractors had plenty of work and the government cemented the loyalty of rural voters. But the good times ended in the 1990s, and the government slowly closed the financial spigots, leaving Yubari and other rural cities increasingly desperate.

Yubari's plight has drawn nationwide attention, in part because it has become a precedent-setting test of wills between the city and the national government. How closely will Tokyo — which has always bailed out communities and companies — hew to its new policy of weaning rural Japan from the central government?

The evidence of growing hardship is hard to miss. Museums with little to exhibit, roads that lead nowhere and other white elephants litter the rural landscape, even as their upkeep drains local communities' shrinking resources. In fact, municipal finance experts say, other localities are in even worse financial shape than Yubari, but the day of reckoning has come here first.

As part of its plan to file for bankruptcy, place itself in the hands of Tokyo and repay its debts over 20 years, Yubari has put History Village and about 20 other tourist attractions up for sale. About half of the 300 city workers are leaving, and those who stay face salary cuts ranging from 30 percent to 70 percent.

The city's 11 schools will be consolidated into three or four; its hospital will become a clinic; its library, city hall branches and public baths will be shuttered. City bus discounts for the elderly will be reduced. Local taxes will rise. Already, snowfalls now have to total six inches, rather than four, before they are cleared.

No cost-cutting measure has been deemed too small. The toilet at the Yubari train station has been closed, forcing travelers to sneak into the adjoining hotel.

The imminent drop in the quality of life has led to recriminations and finger-pointing: at local politicians for lack of foresight, at Tokyo for feeding the rural addiction to public works. So far the government has not budged at reports that Yubari's little old ladies will not be able to afford to ride the bus any longer. It has said it shares no "responsibility" for Yubari's troubles, and the internal affairs minister, Yoshihide Suga, has pressed for even deeper cuts.

Yubari's mayor, Kenji Goto, said, "There are many local governments besides Yubari that are in dire financial straits, so I guess Tokyo has to take a hard stance against us."

Tokyo's attitude has led to anger here that the central government is singling out Yubari as a warning to the countless other Yubaris across Japan. If the Yubaris can no longer count on the government to rescue them, the reasoning goes, they will start cutting costs on their own.

"It's Tokyo that handed us all this money, without saying a word, and now they're saying it was wrong," said Kazuko Kudo, 77, a longtime resident. "No one expected that all of a sudden they'd make an example out of us."

Once a prosperous coal mining town with a population that peaked at 120,000 in the 1960s, Yubari extends for 20 miles up a single road, flanked by mountains. To advertise a local film festival, the city has put billboards of classic movies, like "Gone With the Wind," on buildings throughout the city, adding color to the city's general grayness.

Yubari began trying to transform itself into a tourism destination in the 1980s as the mines closed. It received generous subsidies from Tokyo for years; its former six-term mayor, Tetsuji Nakata, was famous for winning projects from the central government.

Some tourists came during Japan's economic heyday in the 1980s, and the city also became famous for its expensive melons. Yubari continued building tourist sites even after the collapse of Japan's economic bubble, as the nation tried to spend its way to recovery during the 1990s.

But the tourist attractions drew few repeat visitors, and the city was falling into the red — even though city officials fudged accounting figures to mask budget deficits.

"Whenever I'd pass by the tourist sites, I never felt there were that many visitors," said Mie Kosugi, 60. "So I wasn't surprised when they announced the truth, but I was shocked at the amount."

The reality was indeed dire: Yubari had $296 million in debts and $224 million in outstanding local government bonds. Its biggest employer was the municipal government, and 40 percent of the population was 65 or older. History Village, especially the robot museum, was now the object of widespread ridicule.

Mitsuo Okazaki, the city council leader now in his fourth term in office, said Yubari would have already become a ghost town had it not tried its hand at tourism.

"When we switched from coal mines to tourism, Tokyo kept coming at us with money to invest," Mr. Okazaki said. "So what we did was to accept their offer, and we kept building public works projects. But we were left with debts."

DOJ_NMG_0123792

Mr. Okazaki said the biggest reason Yubari could no longer make its debt payments was simply that subsidies from Tokyo had fallen. As part of its plans to decentralize and cut waste, the Japanese government in recent years has given greater tax collecting authority to local governments and reduced subsidies.

For Japan, the most indebted government in the developed world, decentralization means lessening a financial burden it can no longer bear. But critics say it will merely widen the gap between thriving urban centers, like Tokyo and Nagoya, and a rural Japan with an increasing number of elderly residents and an outflow of young taxpayers.

Misao Yamamoto, 32, who was shopping at a Yubari convenience store with her 2-year-old, said her neighbors had packed up and left, even though they had built a house recently. Her family is thinking of doing the same, since her husband has lost his job at History Village.

"My third-grade son watches TV and says he's fed up with how this place is about deficit this, deficit that," Mrs. Yamamoto said, adding that the older boy wanted to move to a neighboring city. "He says he's just fed up with Yubari."

Venezuela: U.S. Envoy Says Bags Are Packed (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

Diplomatic relations with the United States appeared to become more fragile as William Brownfield, the American ambassador, responded to a threat of expulsion from President Hugo Chávez by saying, "My bags are always packed and ready." Mr. Brownfield, in a visit to Maracaibo, also emphasized that he hoped to avoid further confrontation and to focus instead on issues of political and economic importance to both Caracas and Washington. Mr. Chávez, who has threatened to expel Mr. Brownfield before, said on Thursday night that he could declare the ambassador "persona non grata" if he continued to comment on such issues as Venezuela's plan to nationalize companies controlled by foreign investors.

Venezuela's Satellites (WP)

AREMARKABLE year of democracy in Latin America has left the region generally stronger. Presidential elections were held in 11 countries in the past 13 months, and political moderates won seven of them, including those in the four largest countries: Brazil, Mexico, Colombia and Peru. Throughout most of the hemisphere, the elections reinforced a consensus that continued growth must depend on free markets and free trade but that governments should concentrate on narrowing the large gap between rich and poor.

The new year nevertheless has begun with attention focused on a handful of countries where democracy is dead, dying or in danger. Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez began his term this month with a flurry of authoritarianism, promising to cancel the license of the largest independent television station and seeking authority to rule by decree. He then rushed to attend the inaugurations of Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega and Ecuador's Rafael Correa, whom he hopes to convert into satellite leaders in a Venezuelan-led "socialist" bloc. Bolivia's Evo Morales and an ailing Fidel Castro are already in Mr. ChÃ¡vez's orbit; thanks to Venezuela's petrodollars, Cuba's totalitarian system may survive Mr. Castro's demise.

Mr. ChÃ¡vez's best chance may lie with Mr. Correa, who distanced himself from the Venezuelan and his policies to win the election, then swung back to his side on inauguration day. Mr. Correa denounced globalization and called the United States an "empire." More ominously, he adopted Mr. ChÃ¡vez's political strategy, calling for a constituent assembly to bypass Congress and rewrite the constitution -- a step Mr. ChÃ¡vez used to begin dismantling Venezuela's democracy seven years ago.

Mr. Morales's attempt to use the same tactics in Bolivia is foundering, but it is also pushing the country closer to another crisis. The Bolivian constituent assembly is deadlocked over voting rules; meanwhile, opposition governors in the relatively prosperous eastern lowlands are mobilizing masses against the president and his Venezuelan tutors. If he presses forward, Mr. Correa may encounter similar resistance.

Interestingly, Mr. Ortega is moving with considerably more caution, though he, too, has been showered with promises of Venezuelan aid and graced with an inaugural visit by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Elected with just 38 percent of the vote, the former Marxist dictator has avoided anti-American rhetoric and promised not to tamper with the Central American Free Trade Agreement. His new finance minister told the Financial Times that socialism is not the government's program.

At 61, Mr. Ortega may understand something that Mr. ChÃ¡vez, 52, and his would-be followers have yet to learn: Socialist economics are a recipe for impoverishment, while political power grabs tend to boomerang. The mini-bloc of Latin outliers poses little threat to the United States or the region's overall stability. But even as their neighbors consolidate democratic institutions and unprecedented prosperity, the people of Venezuela, Bolivia, Ecuador and Cuba may be headed for a miserable year.

Ground Zero In Bolivia's Dispute (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0123793

By Patrick J. McDonnell

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

COCHABAMBA, BOLIVIA — Embattled President Evo Morales launched his second year in office this week, mocking his political opponents and vowing that "this Indian is going to be around for a while."

But recent turmoil in this city long regarded as a bastion of support for Morales, Bolivia's first indigenous president, has raised new questions about his leftist government's ability to serve out its five-year mandate.

Days of protests culminated Jan. 11 in violent clashes between pro- and anti-Morales factions that transformed this normally bustling agricultural center 140 miles southeast of La Paz, the nation's administrative capital, into an anarchic battleground. The fighting left two dead, scores injured and the capitol building and other structures burned.

The tear gas has dissipated and a sense of normalcy has returned to Cochabamba, though riot police still stand watch near the quaint central plaza. But the paroxysm of rage has reverberated in national politics at a time when Morales' "democratic revolution" was already facing fierce resistance.

"If you'd asked me six months ago if Evo's government would survive, I'd have replied, 'Yes, absolutely,' " said Jim Shultz, a Californian who works with a nonprofit pro-democracy organization here. "I still say 'yes' today, but the possibilities of 'no' are rising."

Bolivia has a long history of forced ousting of governments, including many military coups. Morales won the presidency after protests chased out two previous presidents.

Today, even some of his longtime supporters have assailed the president for failing to quell the festering crisis in Cochabamba and instead opting to heap the blame elsewhere — mostly on his chief political rival here, Gov. Manfred Reyes Villa, a once-defeated presidential candidate now seemingly positioned for a future run.

Pro-Morales demonstrators, many of them Indian coca-leaf growers brought in from the countryside, unsuccessfully attempted to force Reyes out of office and install a "revolutionary committee" headed by an ex-guerrilla leader once known as Comandante Loro — Commander Parrot.

The hardscrabble protesters fought pitched street battles with Reyes supporters, largely middle-class, mixed-race residents fed up with what many view as the president's snubbing of their needs as he exalts Bolivia's long-ignored indigenous masses. It is a bitterness voiced well beyond Cochabamba.

"Evo has basically turned his back on the Bolivian middle class," said Gonzalo Lema, a well-known author here.

By all accounts, crossover support from the middle class helped propel Morales into the presidency in the December 2005 election with almost 54% of the national vote. Yet the president seldom acknowledges the existence of a non-indigenous Bolivia, except as a nefarious force opposing his efforts to rewrite the constitution.

"Evo has lost a chunk of his mandate because of rhetoric, and that's needless," said Shultz. "What would it cost him to get on TV on a regular basis and talk about the problems of people who aren't indigenous?"

Keen to capitalize on the dissatisfaction is Reyes, a former army captain and longtime mayor who has been catapulted into a leadership position in the nation's opposition.

"They're trying to impose a totalitarian regime," the governor said of Morales' government during an interview at a relative's penthouse suite in this city of 500,000. "Democracy has taken a blow in Cochabamba."

The president's response to the crisis here was typically pugnacious: He called for a new "people's" law to allow recall votes against elected officials such as Reyes. "If the people knew that they could remove an official with their vote, we would avoid this type of confrontation," Morales explained.

Detractors see a Morales power play to wrest control of Cochabamba and other opposition-dominated provinces — including La Paz, which also has a rival governor — at a time when the president's Movement Toward Socialism party only holds three of nine statehouses.

"Things got out of hand in Cochabamba because it is part of the larger national controversy," said Fernando Mayorga, an analyst here.

The lightning rod is the demand for autonomy emanating from the resource-rich, lowland "half moon" regions to the east, south and north of La Paz. The lowland zone is geographically, ideologically and culturally removed from Morales' base in the Andean high plains and nearby coca-growing tropics, where he got his start as a labor leader. The raging autonomy debate has become a proxy for the broader question of the country's future.

For his part, Morales equates autonomy with Bolivia's breakup and has vowed to fight it.

"No caballero will be able to split apart Bolivia," Morales said near Lake Titicaca this week, using a term identified with white colonizers, as cheering "red poncho" indigenous volunteers pledged to resist alongside their Aymara kinsman, the former llama herder who became president.

DOJ_NMG_0123794

The volatile ethnic and class issues are somewhat of a diversion, some analysts say. In Bolivia, autonomía has relatively little to do with language, culture, religion or the other core issues that have animated autonomy controversies in other lands. Here, it is mostly about money and resources — specifically, who controls Bolivia's valuable natural gas reserves, second largest in South America after Venezuela's.

From Morales' standpoint, it is an unfortunate quirk of fate that much of Bolivia's gas and petroleum wealth is concentrated far from his base of support. The president has repeatedly charged that rich landowners and businesspeople from the eastern city of Santa Cruz, an anti-Morales stronghold, were fomenting and funding the autonomy movement in a bid to grab national resources.

Now Cochabamba, a geographic and cultural bridge between the pro-autonomy lowlands and Morales' Andean base, has been thrust front and center into the autonomy fight. Seven years ago, a "water revolt" in Cochabamba against foreign distributors helped change the national political landscape.

What Reyes tried to do is ally Cochabamba with the four existing pro-autonomy provinces of the "half moon" region. That is an apparent red line for Morales, who would then be facing pro-autonomy forces in a majority of Bolivia's nine states, or departments.

Voters in Cochabamba firmly rejected autonomy last year in a nationwide referendum. But Reyes pushed for a new vote, arguing the government misled residents. "People thought autonomy meant you would need a passport to travel from one province to another," Reyes said.

The governor's pro-autonomy push ultimately was the spark that ignited this month's riots. The conflict featured Morales' alleged shock troops, coca-growers from the nearby Chapare valleys, who descended on the city to demand Reyes' ouster. Whether Morales, who still heads the coca-growers federation, personally ordered the protests remains unknown.

It is clear, however, that the president did not use his considerable influence to head off swiftly the predictable trouble that followed.

Waves of police and supporters of the governor confronted the pro-Morales masses who occupied Cochabamba's paralyzed city center. Both sides brandished sticks and rocks.

"Suddenly we were surrounded by police," recalled Ernesto Marin, 18, a pro-Morales union man from the Chapare, who is being treated by doctors to retain his eyesight, at risk after he was hit by a rubber bullet. "The union told us to come here, and we came."

The two dead included a fatality from each camp. The violence has left hard feelings on all sides, and a widespread sense that this is not the end of it.

"I could care less whether the governor stays or leaves," said Edgar Lopez, a merchant here. "But it appears the government wants to divide Bolivians. And in that it is succeeding."

Ghana Looks To Annan To Lead (WT)

By Karen Palmer

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

ACCRA, Ghana -- If Kofi Annan's compatriots have their way, his retirement from the United Nations will have less to do with golf and grandchildren and more to do with presidential politics.

Ghana's most celebrated statesman sounded every bit like a candidate this week as he gave his first public address since stepping down as U.N. secretary-general last month.

Mr. Annan spoke of the promise of Africa, the spirit of change and prosperity enveloping the continent and the continued challenges that hamper its development.

"It is an exciting but challenging time to be African," he said. "I am joining hands with my fellow citizens to help lift Ghana to the bright future that can and must be ours."

The only thing he didn't say would be the words many Ghanaians long to hear -- that he will run in next year's presidential elections.

Mr. Annan, who led the United Nations for a decade, has explicitly and repeatedly denied having any interest in turning to politics. He has said previously that he will split his time between his West African homeland and Sweden, the birthplace of his wife, Nane Maria.

With a hero's welcome and a reception far warmer than any visiting head of state, Mr. Annan has been getting not-so-subtle pressure from all quarters of his birth country.

DOJ_NMG_0123795

"Retirement is overrated," joked Daniel Adzei-Bekoe, the chairman of the council of state, as he invited Mr. Annan to deliver a speech as part of Ghana's Golden Jubilee, a yearlong celebration marking the 50th anniversary of Ghana's independence from Britain.

An anonymous group has even started a Web site urging Mr. Annan to take up the leadership challenge. The online petition at www.draftkofiannan2008.com is meant to encourage Mr. Annan to put his U.N. experience endorsing peace, development and good governance to use as Ghana's next head of state.

The field already is crowded with candidates, as President John A. Kufuor prepares to step down next year. Many political analysts predict winning would be a shoo-in for Mr. Annan, especially with the opposition party split in two.

Mr. Annan is the kind of candidate who would send even seasoned campaign managers into a swoon. As a Nobel Peace Prize winner and two-term U.N. secretary-general, he has unprecedented name recognition. And as Ghana's most beloved son, he has enormous approval ratings.

Born as a twin in Kumasi in 1938 to a Fanti chief who became a regional politician and a mother who sold bread, Mr. Annan left Ghana in pursuit of his undergraduate degree, leaving the tropical climate of equatorial Africa for the challenging cold of a Minnesota winter.

More than 10 years ago, as Mr. Annan was working his way up the U.N. hierarchy, tribal elders approached him to take over as paramount chief, but he declined.

In a 2003 interview with the Smithsonian magazine, Mr. Annan was quoted as saying he might have stayed in Ghana if the country's economy had been stronger when he was leaving college and might have considered entering politics in his later years.

In his speech Thursday night, Mr. Annan said he is cautiously optimistic about Africa's future, noting that the number of conflicts has dropped and more countries are proving successful at paying off debt and managing inflation.

"But with the magnitude of Africa's needs, there is little room for complacency," he said.

Sounding like a political challenger, he said African leaders must "think faster and act quicker," while encouraging them to adopt three pillars -- peace, development and security.

U.N. Approves Resolution Condemning Holocaust Denying (WP)

By Bill Brubaker, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

The United Nations General Assembly today approved a resolution, drafted by the United States and co-sponsored by 103 countries, that condemns denials of the Holocaust.

The resolution came six weeks after a conference in Tehran, organized by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, questioned whether six million Jews were exterminated during World War II.

Ahmadinejad and the conference were not mentioned in the resolution, which "condemns without any reservation any denial of the Holocaust" and "urges all member states unreservedly to reject any denial of the Holocaust as a historical event, either in full or in part, or any activities to this end."

The conference, which drew 67 Holocaust skeptics and deniers from 30 nations, including former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke, was widely denounced.

"The Iranian regime perversely seeks to call the historical fact of those atrocities into question and provide a platform for hatred," the White House said in a statement last month.

Iran disassociated itself from today's resolution, calling it a political exercise to deflect attention from Israel's "atrocious" crimes. He said the resolution should have included other cases of genocide such as Hiroshima and Nagasaki, where the U.S. dropped atomic bombs, according to a U.N. news release.

The acting U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Alejandro D. Wolff, told reporters he was disappointed that more of the 192 U.N. delegates did not attend today's General Assembly session.

"Those who would deny the Holocaust -- and, sadly, there are some who do -- reveal not only their ignorance but their moral failure as well," Wolff said in a statement.

A statement from U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon's office said the resolution "reflects the prevailing view of the international community. The Secretary-General reiterates his conviction that the denial of historical facts such as the Holocaust is unacceptable."

Ahmadinejad has repeatedly cast doubt on the Holocaust, calling it a "myth."

"Those having supported the Zionist regime during their lifetime should be aware that its lifetime will be over, and their interests as well as reputation will be endangered," Ahmadinejad said last month, according to the Islamic Republic News Agency. "Just as the ground was prepared to assign such a regime, the Zionist regime will be overthrown by its supporters."

DOJ_NMG_0123796

Iran's United Nations ambassador, Mansour Sadeghi, told the assembly today "there is no justification for genocide of any kind, nor can there be any justification for the attempt made by some -- particularly by the Israeli regime -- to exploit the past crimes as a pretext to commit new genocide and crimes," according to [a] news service.

In response, Israel's U.N. Ambassador Dan Gillerman referred indirectly to Iran's program to enrich uranium, a key ingredient in a nuclear bomb.

"While the nations of the world gather here to affirm the historicity of the Holocaust with the intent of never again allowing genocide, a member of this assembly is acquiring the capabilities to carry out its own," Gillerman said, according to [a news company]. "The president of Iran is in fact saying, 'There really was no Holocaust, but just in case, we shall finish the job."

Partnership Announces $500M Health Initiative For Developing Nations (LAT)

By Charles Piller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland — A multinational health group announced here today that it would commit $500 million over three years to strengthen healthcare systems and train health workers in developing nations, addressing a key problem for implementing its vaccination programs.

The GAVI Alliance, formerly called the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization, is moving to counter a massive outflow of health workers in developing nations where its training and immunization programs have proved most effective. Doctors and nurses, particularly from Africa, often seek higher wages in developed nations that also face shortages of health professionals.

GAVI is a partnership that includes national governments, the United Nations, World Bank, the vaccine industry and the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. It was launched at the World Economic Forum in 2000 with a $750-million grant from the Gates Foundation, which gave the organization the same amount in 2005.

GAVI announced the move at this year's session of the World Economic Forum, an annual gathering of businesspeople, political leaders and others to discuss international problems and their solutions.

Since its inception, GAVI has prevented 2.3 million deaths from diseases for which vaccines are available, including 600,000 lives saved last year, according to World Health Organization data released today. The organization said GAVI had boosted vaccination rates among African children to 73% for one or more diseases.

"We know the impact of saving those lives has a lot of other benefits," improving standards of living and quality of life and reducing population growth, Bill Gates, chairman of Microsoft Corp. and a co-founder of the foundation, said at a news conference. "Vaccines are a miracle."

As new vaccines are developed for tuberculosis and HIV/AIDS, training and support provided by GAVI would help developing nations deliver them, Gates said.

But as the vaccination programs proceed, healthcare systems in Africa are crumbling, partly because of the loss of medical professionals trained by global aid programs. Malawi has lost 64% of its nurses and 85% of its doctors in recent years, many going to work for aid groups or the U.S. or British governments, which pay much higher salaries than local governments, according to a recent analysis in the journal Foreign Affairs.

Dr. Tadataka Yamada, who directs the Gates Foundation global health efforts, said in an interview that the role aid agencies and developed nations play in the outflow of medical talent from poor countries may be overstated. The larger reasons may be problems in the local economies.

"If you don't have places for physicians to work, if you don't have salaries to pay them, then there is no place for them to go," Yamada said.

The Gates Foundation is now seeking ways to improve conditions for local health workforces, he said.

"How do we create opportunities for this Diaspora to come home?" Yamada asked.

Julian Lob-Levyt, executive secretary of GAVI, called the problem in sub-Saharan Africa, where millions of children still die each year from diseases preventable with vaccines, a "capacity crisis."

He said the effort announced today was a tactical response.

"Instead of just training sophisticated doctors and nurses, we will train paramedics" to administer vaccines, Lob-Levyt said in an interview. The technicians would be more cost-effective to train and support, he said, and would more likely remain in their home nations because their skills would not be in demand in wealthier nations.

One such model may come from Ghana, said Anne M. Veneman, executive director of UNICEF, in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0123797

"They put together a vocational program for community-based health workers" who can give immunizations and basic care, she said, adding that the program offers an incentive for advancement once the workers become ensconced in local jobs. "Later on they can get additional training and become full nurses," she said.

GAVI has raised $3.8 billion, nearly all from the Gates Foundation and national governments, and hopes to raise $1.3 billion more by 2015. The $500-million effort, which also will be spent on systems to distribute vaccines and drugs, needs new cash infusions from governments, Lob-Levyt said.

What North Korea Really Wants (WP)

By Robert Carlin, John W. Lewis

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Those who think that dealing with North Korea is impossible are wrong. Unfortunately, those who think that it is, in fact, possible to deal with North Korea often are not much closer to the truth. The basic problem is that people of both views simply haven't figured out what it is that the North really wants.

We tend to confuse North Korea's short-term tactical goals with its broader strategic focus. We draw up list after list of things we think might appeal to Pyongyang on the assumption that these will constitute a "leveraged buyout," finally achieving what we want: the total, irreversible denuclearization of North Korea.

But this list of "carrots" (energy, food, the lifting of sanctions) does not include what the North thinks it must have. It can, of course, help keep the process on track and moving ahead, and it could help cement a final deal and hold it together through the inevitable political storms. But these things are not the ends that North Korea seeks.

North Korea feeds our misperceptions by bargaining so hard over details and raising its initial demands so high. For our part, we tend to be taken in by Western journalists' repetition of stock phrases about it being "one of the poorest nations," "one of the most isolated," "living on handouts." Accurate or not, these factors are irrelevant to Pyongyang's strategic calculations.

Those who realize that North Korea does not have visions of grand rewards sometimes move the focus to political steps that many see as "key" to a solution. These include replacing the armistice with a peace treaty, giving the North security guarantees, discussing plans for an exchange of diplomats. But these, like the economic carrots, are only shimmering, imperfect reflections of what Pyongyang is after.

What is it, then, that North Korea wants? Above all, it wants, and has pursued steadily since 1991, a long-term, strategic relationship with the United States. This has nothing to do with ideology or political philosophy. It is a cold, hard calculation based on history and the realities of geopolitics as perceived in Pyongyang. The North Koreans believe in their gut that they must buffer the heavy influence their neighbors already have, or could soon gain, over their small, weak country.

This is hard for Americans to understand, having read or heard nothing from North Korea except its propaganda, which for years seems to have called for weakening, not maintaining, the U.S. presence on the Korean Peninsula. But in fact an American departure is the last thing the North wants. Because of their pride and fear of appearing weak, however, explicitly requesting that the United States stay is one of the most difficult things for the North Koreans to do.

If the United States has leverage, it is not in its ability to supply fuel oil or grain or paper promises of nonhostility. The leverage rests in Washington's ability to convince Pyongyang of its commitment to coexist with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, accept its system and leadership, and make room for the DPRK in an American vision of the future of Northeast Asia. Quite simply, the North Koreans believe they could be useful to the United States in a longer, larger balance-of-power game against China and Japan. The Chinese know this and say so in private.

The fundamental problem for North Korea is that the six-party talks in which it has been engaged -- and which may reconvene soon -- are a microcosm of the strategic world it most fears. Three strategic foes -- China, Japan and Russia -- sit in judgment, apply pressure and (to Pyongyang's mind) insist on the North's permanent weakness.

Denuclearization, if still achievable, can come only when North Korea sees its strategic problem solved, and that, in its view, can happen only when relations with the United States improve. For Pyongyang, that is the essence of the joint statement out of the six-party talks on Sept. 19, 2005, which included this sentence: "The DPRK and the United States undertook to respect each other's sovereignty, exist peacefully together, and take steps to normalize their relations subject to their respective bilateral policies."

And that is why the North so doggedly seeks bilateral talks with Washington. It desires not "drive-by" encounters, not a meeting here and there, but serious, sustained talks in which ideas can be explored and solutions, at last, patiently developed.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Sen. Specter Presses Gonzales On Surveillance Program (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 26, 2007

Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, initiated a fast-paced oversight inquiry late Friday, asking Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a Monday meeting to explain reports of controversial legal maneuvers employed by the Justice Department in civil lawsuits against the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program.

Justice officials have blocked access to court filings in several suits against the warrantless surveillance conducted by the National Security Agency, on the grounds that the information to be filed is classified, according to report in Friday's New York Times.

Although the administration is seeking dismissal of one court challenge to the surveillance, citing a White House announcement last week that future wiretapping efforts will be conducted only with a judge's consent, senators from both parties are skeptical that the move eliminates the need for future oversight.

In a Friday letter to Gonzales, Specter voiced "deep concern" about what he deemed "extraordinary procedures" allegedly utilized by Justice.

"If the Times story is correct, the Department of Justice may have a conflict of interest in limiting access to key evidence on national security grounds as a means of controlling the outcome in these cases and obstructing the federal courts in their adjudications," Specter wrote, adding that he had attempted to reach Gonzales by phone before drafting the letter.

Specter made the request of Gonzales without the signature of Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), who is out of the country, according to the letter. "…I believe he would authorize" a request for Gonzales' presence on the Hill during the Senate's next business day, Specter wrote.

Rockefeller Says He May Subpoena Documents On Spying (BLOOM)

By Jeff Bliss

Bloomberg, January 26, 2007

Jan. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Jay Rockefeller said he may subpoena Bush administration documents on its controversial domestic surveillance program.

Rockefeller, a West Virginia Democrat, vowed he'll get details on a secret court's approvals of the program that targets suspected al-Qaeda members in the U.S.

``I don't trust what they're doing," Rockefeller said in an interview on ``Political Capital With Al Hunt" airing this weekend on Bloomberg TV. ``If I can't get the information," he said, ``I will not shy away from subpoenaing" it.

The Justice Department on Jan. 17 publicly reversed its opposition to letting the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court supervise the eavesdropping yet has declined to say how that oversight works.

Rockefeller said it's ``not acceptable" if the court doesn't review each instance of the electronic surveillance carried out by the National Security Agency.

``In the end, every single wiretap has to have a warrant," he said. ``I can't trust" what the administration says.

DOJ_NMG_0123802

The Justice Department indicated Jan. 24 that it was reluctant to share the rulings.

``The executive branch does not publicly release classified information concerning methods, means and operational details of ongoing, clandestine surveillance activities," department lawyers wrote in court papers filed with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati. ``More to the point, the longstanding practice is that FISA Court orders remain classified and not subject to public dissemination," they wrote.

Revelations about the program in December 2005 caused a public furor over privacy rights and led to calls that the program be disbanded.

Provoking Iran

Rockefeller also said he suspects that Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials are trying to provoke a military conflict with Iran.

``I don't know that, but I assume that," he said.

The senator said he's skeptical that President George W. Bush's program to kill Iranian operatives in Iraq has uniform support within the administration.

``The president has given the order," Rockefeller said. ``I'm not sure that it's even clear within the administration that it's a justified policy."

`We Will Stop Them'

Bush said today he's given the go-ahead for the military to stop suspected Iranian agents in Iraq from attacking civilians or American troops.

``If somebody is trying to harm our troops, or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, we will stop them," Bush told reporters after meeting with his top military commanders at the White House.

Bush backed the killings as a way of putting pressure on Iran to stop aiding Iraqi Shiite militias who are taking part in the country's sectarian fighting, according to a story in today's Washington Post. Some administration officials are concerned the program will prompt Iran to retaliate with similar actions against U.S. forces, the paper said.

Rockefeller saved some of his harshest criticism for Cheney, who he said tried to block the committee's efforts to get information on intelligence operations.

``He's doing everything possible to stop that," he said.

A spokeswoman for Cheney couldn't be reached immediately for comment.

Rockefeller said he hopes the next administration will be headed by someone who ``can do as good or better a job."

While declining to make an endorsement, he said he wouldn't discount first-term Democratic Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who said Jan. 16 that he's exploring a presidential bid.

``Experience is incredibly important," Rockefeller said. ``It also can be overrated."

What's more important is a president ``who is very bright, somebody who in this town can so easily surround himself with incredibly thoughtful people who are wise," he said.

ACLU Wants Access To Sealed Wiretap Filings (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

The American Civil Liberties Union asked a federal court Friday to unseal secret documents filed by the Bush administration in support of its warrantless domestic surveillance program.

The administration announced last week that it was suspending the electronic surveillance program and says the ACLU case challenging its constitutionality should therefore be dismissed. It has filed some of its arguments under seal, preventing the ACLU from seeing them.

A hearing on the case is scheduled for Wednesday at the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit held that the wiretapping program violated the 1st and 4th Amendments, which respectively protect free speech and prohibit unlawful searches.

The government appealed and Taylor's ruling was stayed pending the appeal, which is to be heard by a three-judge panel.

Last week, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales announced that the administration had suspended the program. He also announced that the court set up by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act had issued secret orders Jan. 10 approving the surveillance.

Justice Department officials have declined to say whether the FISA court approved a specific warrant or approved the surveillance program in broad terms.

U.S. officials have said that under the secret program, the National Security Agency electronically monitored telephone calls and e-mails between people in the U.S. and those in foreign countries suspected of having ties to terrorist organizations.

DOJ_NMG_0123803

On Thursday, Justice Department attorneys filed a motion at the 6th Circuit, asking the court to drop further consideration of the case.

The lawsuit "no longer has any live significance," said a brief filed by six department attorneys led by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement.

"The surveillance activity they challenge … does not exist. And the specific relief they sought and were awarded … cannot redress any claimed injury because no electronic surveillance is being conducted under the [Terrorist Surveillance Program]."

The Justice Department also said that the secret intelligence court was reviewing the program and that it would oppose release of the Jan. 10 authorization order. "The long-standing practice is that FISA court orders remain classified and not subject to public dissemination," the Justice Department said in its brief.

ACLU attorneys, led by Associate Legal Director Ann Beeson, emphasized in their filing Friday that President Bush still claimed he retained the "inherent authority" to engage in wiretapping without FISA court oversight.

"Presumably to protect that supposed power, the government has declined to stipulate that it will comply with the district court's injunction in this case, which merely requires the government to comply with FISA," Beeson wrote. "Moreover, while a judge on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court has apparently approved some form of the government's spying program, the government has refused to disclose the [FISA] judge's orders. Whatever those orders do, they do nothing to resolve the ultimate issue in this case: whether the president may lawfully conduct electronic surveillance outside of FISA.

"The government cannot have it both ways," Beeson wrote. "It cannot argue that the case is moot because the government is currently in compliance with FISA, and at the same time expressly retain the authority to violate FISA tomorrow. Because nothing prevents the government from ignoring FISA's requirements after the threat of this litigation has passed, the government has failed to satisfy its heavy burden of showing that this case is moot," Beeson added.

In addition, Beeson wrote that without more information about what the FISA court had authorized, there was no means of determining whether the National Security Agency's current activities were lawful.

Twice in the last week, the government informed the ACLU that it had filed secret material in the case, disclosing only that it bore on the case. On Friday, Beeson asserted that those materials were improperly classified and should be made available to the ACLU in order to give the organization an adequate opportunity to respond.

"Recognition of the 1st Amendment right of access is of particular importance" in this case "because of the extraordinary public interest, and significance of, the issues presented in this appeal," Beeson wrote. "The secrecy surrounding the FISA judge's Jan. 10 orders, and the government's continued assertion of authority to disregard FISA and the Constitution, have only deepened public interest and concern."

Along the same line, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, sent a letter Friday to Gonzales asking for a meeting on the issue and expressing "deep concern … about extraordinary procedures taken by the Department of Justice in the 6th Circuit" and in another case involving the Terrorist Surveillance Program pending in U.S. District Court in Portland.

"The Department of Justice may have a conflict of interest in limiting access to key evidence on national security grounds as a means of controlling the outcome of these cases and obstructing the federal courts in their adjudications," Specter said in the letter.

ACLU Keeping Spy Case Alive (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

U.S. argues challenge to domestic surveillance moot, court now monitors it

CINCINNATI - The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday urged a federal appellate court to keep alive its challenge to the Bush administration's domestic spying program, saying the president still asserts the authority for the warrantless surveillance.

The Bush administration said Thursday the case is moot and should be dismissed because a secret court now monitors the surveillance.

``The government continues to insist, however, that the president had and continues to have the authority to conduct the program outside'' the secret court, said an ACLU brief filed with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

The government appealed to the court after a federal district judge ruled that the program was unconstitutional. Oral arguments are set for Wednesday.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the secret panel of judges who oversee the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is reviewing and approving applications to spy on people believed to be linked to al-Qaida.

``There is, therefore, no longer any live genuine controversy to adjudicate,'' the Justice Department wrote in its brief filed Thursday.

But the ACLU said that without more information about what the secret court has authorized, it can't determine if current activities are lawful. It said the Bush administration might return to surveillance outside the secret panel without a court order against it.

The ACLU also asked the court Friday to make public or give ACLU lawyers access to secret materials in the case filed by the government as classified.

The National Security Agency program, secretly launched in 2001, monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States when one party is believed to have terrorist links. It became public in December 2005.

The administration says the program has been an important tool in the fight against terrorism and has helped prevent attacks.

The ACLU sued last year, and a federal judge in Detroit ruled in August that the program was unconstitutional, violating free speech and privacy rights and the separation of powers. A 6th Circuit panel in October ruled that the administration could keep the program in place while it appealed.

The Bait-and-Switch White House (NYT)

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

We often wonder whether there is a limit to the Bush administration's obsession with secrecy, its assault on the rule of law, its disdain for the powers of Congress, its willingness to con the public and its refusal to heed expert advice or recognize facts on the ground. Events of the past week suggest the answer is no.

In his State of the Union speech, Mr. Bush stuck to his ill-conceived plans for Iraq, but at least admitted the situation was dire. He said he wanted to work with Congress and announced a bipartisan council on national security.

That lasted a day. By Wednesday evening, Vice President Dick Cheney was on CNN contradicting most of what Mr. Bush had said. We were left asking, once again, Who exactly is running this White House?

While Mr. Bush has been a bit more forthright lately about how badly things have gone in Iraq, Mr. Cheney spoke of "enormous successes" there and refused to pay even curled-lip service to consulting Congress. Whatever votes Congress takes on Iraq, Mr. Cheney said, "it won't stop us."

Whenever the vice president does this sort of thing, and it's pretty often, Americans are faced with an unpleasant choice: Are Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney running a bait-and-switch operation, or does the vice president simply feel free to cut the ground out from under Mr. Bush?

All of that was distressing enough. But in Friday's Times, Adam Liptak gave an account of the way the administration — after grandly announcing that it was finally going to obey the law on wiretapping — is trying to quash lawsuits over Mr. Bush's outlaw eavesdropping operations by imposing outrageous secrecy and control over the courts.

Justice Department lawyers are withholding evidence from plaintiffs and even restricting the access of judges to documents in cases involving Mr. Bush's decision to authorize the warrantless interception of e-mail and phone calls. In one suit, Justice Department lawyers tried to seize computers from the plaintiffs' lawyers to remove a document central to their case against the government.

In response to these and other serious concerns, the Justice Department offered only the most twisted excuses, which a federal judge rightly compared to "Alice in Wonderland."

When government lawyers tried to take back a document that has circulated around the world, the judge asked a Justice Department lawyer, "Who is it secret from?" The answer: "Anyone who has not seen it."

These are not isolated events. The government has made the same Orwellian claims of secrecy in a lawsuit over the president's decision to create secret C.I.A. prisons for terrorism suspects. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales routinely stonewalls legitimate Congressional requests for documents and information on a wide range of issues. He negotiated a secret agreement to give supposed judicial oversight to Mr. Bush's wiretapping program, with a court that does not permit anyone into its hearings to argue against the government.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney claim that they are protecting the powers of the presidency. At least that's the bait they use to explain their trampling on civil liberties and the constitutional balance of power. But by abusing the government's legitimate right to claim secrecy in court hearings, they will make it harder for other presidents to do that when it is actually justified. And with that switch, they have done grievous harm to the credibility of the Oval Office and the country.

Tardy Compliance (WT)

By Jacob Sullum

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123805

The skeptics who doubt that 21,000 more troops will be the difference between war and peace in Iraq may be underestimating the Bush administration, which recently demonstrated it can do the impossible. This month, after violating the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) by eavesdropping on Americans without warrants for five years because obtaining judicial approval would have endangered national security, the administration somehow found a way to obey the law without sacrificing our safety.

By exposing the hollowness of President Bush's national security justification, his tardy compliance with FISA demonstrates more contempt for the rule of law than continued defiance would have. Since the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program was publicly revealed in December 2005, the administration has maintained "it was absolutely necessary to protect the security of our country," as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee on Jan. 18. Now we know that's not true.

From now on, Mr. Gonzales said, NSA surveillance of international e-mail and phone calls involving people on U.S. soil "where there is probable cause to believe that one of the communicants is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an associated terrorist organization" will be "subject to the approval of the FISA court." Although the Bush administration publicly insisted for a year that such a concession would compromise national security, Mr. Gonzales promised "the country will not be any less safe" now that the president has deigned to follow the law.

According to Mr. Gonzales, the Justice Department managed to square this circle by coming up with a "complicated" and "innovative" approach that complies with FISA yet allows the "speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat." Since the statute explicitly permits retroactive approval of surveillance in emergencies up to 72 hours after the fact, it's not clear what additional leeway the government thought it needed.

Nor is it clear how the government was able to get that extra flexibility without asking Congress to change the law (something Congress has been happy to do in the past). Mr. Gonzales refused to clarify whether the FISA court orders cover particular individuals (as the Justice Department has implied), groups of suspects or the program as a whole, although it's hard to see how answering that question would jeopardize national security.

Mr. Gonzales also failed to explain why complying with FISA was not possible until now. Although Bush administration officials discussed it "from time to time" over the years, he said, negotiations with the FISA court did not begin until 2005, in response to "the concerns raised" by members of Congress who knew about the program before the New York Times publicly disclosed its existence. He insisted the administration's reversal had nothing to do with the Times story, the ensuing criticism, or the lawsuits challenging the program's legality.

Whether you buy that or not, the reason for the delay in complying with FISA is clear: When it comes to fighting terrorism, the president considers obeying the law optional. As Mr. Gonzales emphasized, the administration still maintains the president is not obligated to follow FISA; he is doing so only because he has decided that "involving all branches of government on such an important program is best for the country." Given the president's view of his "inherent" powers, he could go back to evading the courts and flouting the will of Congress any day.

Mr. Bush is vague about the limits of the powers he claims -- whether, for instance, they include the authority unilaterally to order the opening of mail or the surveillance of purely domestic phone calls. Worse, he asks us to accept blindly his word that in any given case the terrorist nexus that supposedly justifies these extraordinary measures is in fact present. The danger of such unchecked power is the reason that, under our Constitution, "involving all branches of government" is not just a good idea; it's the law.

Limits On Power? Bush Won't Hear Of It (HONADV)

Honolulu Advertiser, January 27, 2007

Americans who are worried about the Bush administration's tight grip on the reins of power can't be happy with the news from Capitol Hill.

First, the president signals that he's now ready to end the practice of conducting warrantless wiretapping, announcing that any such operations will now meet requirements for court orders under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. This administration's turnabout resulted from negotiations with the FISA court.

But just when some critics felt ready to turn handsprings, others — including several U.S. senators — fired off pointed questions.

New York's Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer asked whether these warrants were blanket approvals or broad brushstrokes enabling generic roundups.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales owes us an answer.

DOJ_NMG_0123806

In later grillings about federal prosecution of terrorists, Gonzales' message to the Senate was clearer — but even more disturbing. Habeas corpus — the right to go to federal court and challenge one's imprisonment — is not protected by the Constitution.

Even veteran Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Arlen Specter was incredulous, quoting a section in the Constitution barring suspension of habeas. How, he argued, can you ban the suspension of a right that doesn't exist?

Good question.

If the voters tried to communicate a need for some limits to executive power, the president wasn't hearing it.

Editorial: A Stunning Assertion (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, January 27, 2007

Yes, the right of habeas corpus does exist

It's been part of the Anglo-American legal tradition since the Magna Carta in 1215. And the U.S. Constitution explicitly says that it cannot be suspended, except in the case of rebellion or invasion. Yet Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee this week that he believes people in the United States have no constitutional right to habeas corpus.

The writ of habeas corpus -- literally, "produce the body" -- has been a bulwark of personal liberty for more than 800 years. It requires that any time a person is detained, the government must produce the prisoner in person and state why he or she is being detained. A person taken into custody must either be charged or released.

But there was Gonzales, testifying before the Judiciary Committee that "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution; there is a prohibition against taking it away."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., was flabbergasted: "Now, wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away, except in the case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have a right of habeas corpus, unless there is an invasion or rebellion?"

Gonzales dug in: "I meant by that comment, the Constitution doesn't say, 'Every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas.' It doesn't say that."

Specter was justifiably appalled: "You may be treading on your interdiction and violating common sense, Mr. Attorney General."

Unfortunately, this was not merely a theoretical exchange. The Bush administration already has been detaining people without charge. For example, Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen, was detained in 2002 at a Chicago airport and then held for 3½ years without charges at a U.S. Navy brig in South Carolina.

The Bush administration forces us to learn anew the hallowed principles of our legal tradition -- and to defend them. Habeas corpus continues to be a basic human right worth fighting for -- to prevent a king or any government from arbitrarily throwing people into prison without charges.

Canada To Pay $9.75 Million To Man Tortured In Syria (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

OTTAWA, Jan. 26 — Maher Arar, the Canadian software engineer who was detained by American officials in 2002 and deported to Syria, where he was jailed and regularly tortured, will receive 11.5 million Canadian dollars ($9.75 million) in compensation from the Canadian government, under a settlement announced Friday.

The compensation ends a lawsuit brought by Mr. Arar and follows a recommendation from a judicial inquiry into his case. That inquiry said the expulsion to Syria was caused by false assertions made by the Canadian police to United States officials, saying that Mr. Arar was an Islamic extremist linked to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Arar, traveling on a Canadian passport, was pulled aside by immigration agents in New York as he changed planes on his way home to Ottawa from Tunisia. He was instead flown to Syria, his birthplace.

The Canadian judicial inquiry cleared Mr. Arar of any terrorism connections in September 2006, and concluded that anonymous Canadian officials had orchestrated a defamation campaign against him after his return from Syria in October 2003.

As he announced the settlement on Friday, Prime Minister Stephen Harper offered a formal apology to Mr. Arar and his family for their “terrible ordeal.”

Mr. Arar, whose career was destroyed by the episode and who has suffered emotional problems since returning to Canada, said the government’s apology was more important for him than the financial settlement.

“The government of Canada and the prime minister have acknowledged my innocence,” Mr. Arar told a news conference. “This means the world to me.”

DOJ_NMG_0123807

After apologizing, Mr. Harper renewed calls for the United States to remove Mr. Arar from its terrorist watch list. “Canada fully understands and appreciates and shares the United States’ concerns with regard to security,” he said. “However, the Canadian government has every right to go to bat when it believes one of its citizens has been treated unfairly by another government.”

The case has strained the otherwise cordial relationship between Mr. Harper’s Conservative government and the Bush administration.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, have told Canadian officials that Mr. Arar is still on the watch list because of independent information about him obtained independently by law enforcement agencies in the United States.

After reviewing a confidential file concerning Mr. Arar, however, Stockwell Day, Canada’s public safety minister, said that it contained “nothing new” that justified blocking Mr. Arar from entering the United States.

This week, David H. Wilkins, the United States ambassador to Canada, publicly rebuked Mr. Day. “It’s a little presumptuous for him to say who the United States can and cannot allow into our country,” Mr. Wilkins said at a news conference in Edmonton, Alberta.

Mr. Arar has been unemployed since his ordeal in Syria, where he had been held for 10 months in a 3-by-6-foot cell and beaten repeatedly, often with a frayed electrical cable.

According to Mr. Harper, the settlement amount was based on an estimate of what a court would award Mr. Arar, and includes about $850,000 for legal costs.

Mr. Arar said: “I wish money could buy my life back. That’s my biggest wish.”

He has also sued American officials and agencies. A United States District Court judge in Brooklyn dismissed the suit last February, largely on jurisdictional grounds, but the decision is being appealed.

Tortured Man Gets Apology From Canada (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

MONTREAL, Jan. 26 -- The prime minister of Canada apologized Friday to Maher Arar and agreed to give $9 million in compensation to the Canadian Arab, who was spirited by U.S. agents to Syria and tortured there after being falsely named as a terrorism suspect.

Arar, 36, a former computer engineer who was detained while changing planes at a New York airport in 2002 and imprisoned in a Syrian dungeon for 10 months, said after the announcement that he "feels proud as a Canadian."

"We cannot go back and fix the injustice that occurred to Mr. Arar," Prime Minister Stephen Harper said in issuing the formal apology in Ottawa. "However, we can make changes to lessen the likelihood that something like this will ever happen again." The head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police resigned over the affair, and the government has pledged to increase oversight of its intelligence agencies.

Harper and Arar both criticized the United States for its refusal to accept the exhaustive Canadian inquiry that found Arar was an innocent man. Public resentment in Canada has swelled this week over U.S. officials' insistence that Arar should remain on its "watch list" of potential suspects, as well as the testy comments of U.S. Ambassador David Wilkins, who said Canada had no business questioning who was on the list.

The United States has never acknowledged it made a mistake in the Arar case, which has become one of the most public embarrassments in the U.S. practice of "extraordinary rendition" of suspects to other countries for interrogation and imprisonment. Last week, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) demanded an explanation for the administration's stance. He complained that American officials "knew damn well, if he went to Syria, he'd be tortured. It's beneath the dignity of this country to send somebody to another country to be tortured."

The financial compensation settles a claim Arar made against the government for having provided exaggerated and false information to the United States that identified him as a terrorist suspect. Harper said the amount "is within this government's realistic assessment of what Mr. Arar would have won in a lawsuit." His attorneys also were awarded about $870,000 in legal fees.

"The evidence is clear that Mr. Arar has been treated unjustly. He should not be on a watch list," Harper said.

Reacting at a separate news conference in Ottawa, Arar thanked Canadians for siding with him in the campaign, which he began with a news conference when he was finally returned from Syria uncharged.

"I cannot begin to tell you how important it is today that Prime Minister Harper and his government have followed through" on the recommendations of the inquiry commission, he said. "In doing so, the government of Canada and the prime minister have acknowledged my innocence. This means the world to me."

DOJ_NMG_0123808

"The struggle to clear my name has been long and hard," he said. "My kids have suffered silently, and I think I owe them a lot. I feel now I can devote more time to them, more time for being a good father and to rebuild my life."

Canada Compensates Man U.S. Deported To Syria (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

OTTAWA, Canada (AP) -- Canada's prime minister apologized to Maher Arar on Friday and announced the government would compensate him C$10.5 million (US$8.9 million) for its role in his deportation from the U.S. to Syria, where he was tortured while held in prison for nearly a year.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper again called on the U.S. government to remove the Ottawa telecoms engineer from any of its no-fly or terrorist watchlists and reiterated that Ottawa would keep pressing Washington to clear Arar's name.

"We think the evidence is absolutely clear and that the United States should in good faith remove Mr. Arar from the list," Harper told a news conference in Ottawa. "We don't intend to either change or drop our position."

The U.S. government has repeatedly insisted it has reasons to leave the 37-year-old on its watchlists. The issue has grown into an unpleasant diplomatic row between the world's largest trading partners and closest allies.

The Syrian-born Arar, who moved to Canada with his family when he was 17, is the best-known case of rendition, a practice in which the U.S. government sends foreign terror suspects to third countries for interrogation.

Arar thanked the Canadian government at a news conference Friday.

"The struggle to clear my name has been long and hard; my kids have suffered silently and I feel that I owe them a lot," said Arar, who also thanked Canadians for standing by him.

"Without the support of the Canadian people, I may never have come home and I would not have been able to stay strong and push for the truth," he said.A 'terrible ordeal'

Arar was detained at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport in 2002 during a stopover on his way home to Canada from a vacation with his family in Tunisia.

He said he was chained and shackled by U.S. authorities for 11 days during interrogation and then flown to Syria, where he was tortured and forced to make false confessions.

He was released 10 months later, with Syrian officials saying they had no reason to hold him further.

"On behalf of the government of Canada, I want to extend a full apology to you and Monia as well as your family for the role played by Canadian officials in the terrible ordeal that you experienced in 2002 and 2003," Harper said. Arar and his wife, Monia Mazigh, and their young son and daughter now live in Kamloops, British Columbia.

"I sincerely hope that these words and actions will assist you and your family in your efforts to begin a new and hopeful chapter in your lives," Harper said, adding the compensation package would also pay for his estimated $1 million in legal fees.

Arar was exonerated last September after a two-year public inquiry led by Associate Chief Justice of Ontario Dennis O'Connor.

It found that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police wrongly labeled Arar as an Islamic fundamentalist and passed misleading and inaccurate information to U.S. authorities, which very likely led to Arar's arrest and deportation.

The report pointed out that Arar's inability to find work since his return from Syria has had a devastating economic and psychological impact on him and his family.

O'Connor urged the RCMP to usher in a raft of policy changes on information sharing, training and monitoring of security probes. In the aftermath, RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli resigned over his handling of the file.Cross-border tensions

The U.S. District Court of Appeals last February dismissed Arar's lawsuit against U.S. government officials, ruling the deportation of the dual Syrian-Canadian citizen was protected on national security grounds. His attorneys with the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights filed an appeal in December.

"We are grateful that the Canadian government has had the humanity to try to right the terrible wrong that was done to Maher," CCR Attorney Maria LaHood said in a statement Friday. "We still hope the U.S. government will follow Canada's lead."

The new Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy, earlier this month publicly scolded U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for refusing to explain why the United States had sent a Canadian citizen to Syria.

"The Canadian government now has taken several steps to accept responsibility for its role in sending Mr. Arar to Syria, where he was tortured," Leahy said in a statement Friday. "The question remains why, even if there were reasons to consider him suspicious, the U.S. government shipped him to Syria where he was tortured, instead of to Canada for investigation or prosecution."

He said the U.S. Justice Department intended to respond to his demands next week.

U.S. Ambassador to Canada, David Wilkins, on Wednesday chastised Canadian Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day for continuing to press Washington on the Arar matter.

DOJ_NMG_0123809

"It's a little presumptuous of him to say who the United States can and cannot allow into our country," Wilkins said.

In a recent letter to Day, U.S. Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and Gonzales said U.S. files on Arar indicate the decision to keep Arar on watchlists is "appropriate."

"Our conclusion in this regard is supported by information developed by U.S. law enforcement agencies that is independent of that provided to us by Canada with regard to Mr. Arar," the letter said, adding that they wished to thank Canada for its cooperation in fighting terrorism.

Arar said his case has forced some Canadians to question their relationship to the United States, noting U.S. authorities declined to participate in Canada's federal inquiry.

"It's a question that touches all Canadians," Arar said. "Can we really trust the Americans to be our partners in the fight against terrorism?"

Canada To Compensate Torture Victim (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

NEW YORK — Canada's prime minister apologized and offered $8.9 million in compensation Friday to Maher Arar, a Canadian software engineer who, based on incorrect information, was deported by U.S. officials to Syria in 2002, where he was imprisoned and tortured for a year.

After being identified by Canadian police as an Islamic extremist in faulty intelligence shared with U.S. authorities, Arar was detained by American agents during a stopover at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport. They interrogated him for 11 days, then sent him to his native Syria, where he was tortured into making false confessions that he was involved with the Al Qaeda terrorist network.

The compensation, valued at $10.5 million in Canadian dollars, was announced by Prime Minister Stephen Harper in a televised news conference. It was recommended last fall by a Canadian judicial inquiry, which cleared Arar of terrorism links and determined that the Canadian government had passed along faulty intelligence and did not make adequate efforts to correct it.

The United States has refused to remove Arar from a terrorism watch list, however, and Harper said he had asked President Bush to clear him.

"We were clear, we don't believe Mr. Arar should be on the watch list," he said. "We will not drop this matter just because there is a disagreement and they don't like our position."

Harper also formally apologized to Arar, his wife and two children.

"On behalf of the government of Canada, I wish to apologize to you, Monia Mazigh and your family for any role Canadian officials may have played in the terrible ordeal that all of you experienced in 2002 and 2003," Harper said.

The settlement includes an additional $1.1 million to cover Arar's legal fees.

"We cannot go back and fix the injustice that occurred to Mr. Arar. However, we can make changes to lessen the likelihood that something like this will ever happen again," the prime minister said.

Arar accepted the apology at a separate, emotional news conference, saying the official acknowledgment of his innocence "means the world to me."

"The struggle to clear my name has been long and hard," he said, with 10 Canadian flags behind him and his lawyers at his side. He said he would like to use the compensation money somehow to help ensure that others don't end up in the same situation.

"This struggle has taught me how important it is to stand up for human rights," he said. "I feel proud as a Canadian, and I feel proud of what we've been able to achieve."

Arar's case has become one of the best-known examples of what is known as extraordinary rendition, a covert U.S. practice of sending terrorism suspects to other countries for detention and interrogation. Often those countries have more relaxed rules regarding the use of torture than the United States.

U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff have told Canadian officials that Arar will remain on the U.S. watch list because of information about him obtained independently by American authorities. Arar's wife and children are also on the list, and all are banned from flying into or over U.S. territories.

Canada's minister of public safety, Stockwell Day, reviewed the confidential U.S. file and said that it contained "nothing new" that would justify continuing to treat Arar as a terrorism suspect.

Arar tried to sue American officials and agencies over his detention and deportation, but the U.S. District Court of Appeals dismissed his suit last February, ruling that the action was protected on national security grounds. Arar is appealing the decision.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

In New Batch Of 9/11 Calls, Confusion And Courage (NYT)

By Jim Dwyer

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

The city yesterday released 19 recordings of telephone calls made to 911 operators from the World Trade Center on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001.

While the calls included a rich example of the valor of the day, they also showed that the emergency response agencies worked as separate fiefdoms, with callers having to tell their stories multiple times as they were transferred from police operators to fire dispatchers or to Emergency Medical Service.

And no one in the 911 system passed along what could have been a life-saving order that had been issued by fire chiefs on the scene: to evacuate the buildings.

Among the recordings was a phone call from the lobby of the south tower by a building employee, trying to get medical help for people who had been injured. The employee, Larry Boisseau, called 911 about six minutes before the building collapsed. In a calm voice, he gave explicit instructions to the operator.

"Yes, 2 World Trade Center, we have injured people in the lobby of the building, they need medical attention," Mr. Boisseau said. "They're on the south side of the building. However, they're not going to be able to come in that way. They'll have to figure another way in here. Because we've got debris all over the outside of the building."

Mr. Boisseau worked as a fire safety director for O.C.S. Security. As with just about everyone dialing 911 for help, after he explained the situation once, the first operator, a police department employee, tried to transfer his call to a dispatcher with the emergency medical service, a fire department employee.

While all calls come into the Police Department, the city has separate dispatchers for police, fire and medical response. Each agency has its own computer system, and they are not integrated.

As Mr. Boisseau waited on the line, the emergency medical phone rang and rang. Finally, the police operator stated the obvious: "E.M.S. is not picking up."

Mr. Boisseau replied, "O.K., well, maybe you can keep trying. I gave you my information. I kind of got to get going. This is my job, fire safety."

The operator signed off, wishing him luck. Mr. Boisseau, 36, died in the collapse of the tower.

The 19 recordings — said by city officials to be the last that will be made public — were released in response to requests made five years ago by The New York Times under the Freedom of Information Act. Both the Police and Fire Departments denied the requests, and The Times sued the city. In 2005, the state's highest court ordered that the tapes be made public, with the voices of civilian callers edited out. Last March, the Fire Department released its tapes. City officials initially maintained that the Police Department's portions of the tapes were not covered by the court order.

Most of the tapes released yesterday were electronically edited to block the callers' voices. The full content of Mr. Boisseau's call was released because he was working as a fire safety officer, city officials said.

City Releases New 9/11 Emergency Calls... "EMS Is Not Picking Up" (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

Seven minutes before the World Trade Center's south tower collapsed, Larry Boisseau called a 911 operator from the lobby, asking for help for injured people. He stayed on the line while the phone to paramedics rang about a dozen times.

"EMS is not picking up," the operator told Boisseau, 36, of Freehold, N.J., according to a tape of new 911 calls from Sept. 11 that were released by the city Friday.

"OK," Boisseau said, exasperated. "Maybe you can keep trying. ... I kind of gotta get going. This is my job. Fire safety." The call, less than three minutes long, was one of 19 the city released Friday following a lawsuit filed by The New York Times and some victims' families.

Boisseau, fire safety director for OCS Security, was one of two victims identified on the calls because he was on the job. The other victim was Melissa Doi, whose call was made public because it was played at the trial of Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui.

The rest of the calls released Friday only played the operator's side of the conversation, and recalled eerie tableaus presented in earlier released tapes: operators trying to calm down callers trapped on the 84th floor, the 89th floor, the 93rd floor, the 105th floor. Some operators became exasperated, and others weren't sure how to advise trapped callers.

“He wants to know what to do,” one police operator asked a colleague after taking the call of someone on the 105th floor of the south tower. “Should he break the windows?” Boisseau called a police operator at 9:52 a.m.

“Two World Trade Center. We have injured people in the lobby of the building. They need medical attention,” he said calmly.

“They’re not going to be able to come in that way,” he added. “We’ve got debris all over the outside of the building.

“Hold on, sir, OK?” the operator asks. “OK,” he said.

In the background, another voice can be heard. “The Pentagon’s on fire, too. I don’t know if that’s true.” Boisseau says, “Wow,” while the phone for paramedics continues to ring.

The director later describes the exact location of the burning south tower — “It’s between Liberty Street and Church Street” — before eventually signing off. The operator wishes him “good luck” three minutes before the building collapses.

In recent years, the city has released hours of emergency calls that were made amid the chaos of Sept. 11. In March, the city released transcripts of 130 calls from people trapped in the towers, including only the voices of operators and other public employees.

In August, more than 1,600 previously undisclosed calls were released. And a year earlier, thousands of pages of emergency workers’ oral histories and radio transmissions were made public.

The New York Times and families of Sept. 11 victims sued the city for access to the emergency calls and firefighters’ oral histories. Attorneys said they wanted to find out what happened in the towers after two hijacked jetliners crashed into them and what dispatchers told workers and rescuers in and around the buildings.

The latest calls were made first to police operators; 15 of them were later transferred to the Fire Department.

Boisseau, Doi and five other trade center victims could eventually be identified on the calls, city officials said. The complete recordings of the five victims who weren’t identified were sent to their families, who could later decide to make the other side of the calls public.

In Katrina's Wake: Where Is The Money? (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

In August, 2005, Hurricane Katrina flattened two bridges, one for cars, one for trains, that span the two miles of water separating this city of 8,000 from the town of Pass Christian. Sixteen months later, the automobile bridge remains little more than pilings. The railroad bridge is busy with trains.

The difference: The still-wrecked bridge is owned by the U.S. government. The other is owned by railroad giant CSX Corp. of Jacksonville, Fla. Within weeks of Katrina's landfall, CSX dispatched construction crews to fix the freight line; six months later, the bridge reopened. Even a partial reopening of the road bridge, part of U.S. Highway 90, is at least five months away.

"It shows the difference between the private sector and the public sector," says Harold "Buz" Olsen, chief administrative officer of Bay St. Louis, who displays a photograph of the train bridge in the city council chambers as a reminder. "By the time CSX was done with their bridge, we were just getting around to letting the contract on ours."

It's been almost 17 months since Hurricane Katrina pounded coastal Mississippi and southeast Louisiana, and about a year since Congress authorized the bulk of its rebuilding aid for the region. More than four months have passed since President Bush visited New Orleans on the anniversary of the storm and extolled the "amazing" reconstruction effort.

But a review of the devastated region shows that rebuilding is in a deep stall. Tens of thousands of residents remain displaced as authorities dither over how to disburse housing assistance. Many crucial infrastructure projects have yet to start. Of the tens of billions appropriated by Congress, half remains unspent.

There are many culprits. Among them: the size of the disaster, which continues to overwhelm agencies charged with rebuilding; the crush of competing bureaucracies, which has delayed many projects including the Bay St. Louis bridge; and weak local leadership.

In addition, many reconstruction efforts are ensnarled in spools of red tape spawned by a bevy of old and new government procedures. A prime example: an obscure set of 30-year-old Congressional rules designed to combat corruption known as the Stafford Act.

According to the White House, the federal government has provided $110 billion for the Gulf Coast region. But nowhere near that amount of actual cash has been made available. The total is spread over five states and covers damage done by three separate storms. Some of it consists of loans. A chunk comes from government insurance payouts that ultimately derived from premiums paid by homeowners themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0123812

Of $42 billion given to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the agency has spent only $25 billion, federal records show. Most of that went to temporary housing, debris removal and emergency operations in the early days of the disaster. It has spent more than $4 billion on administrative costs.

Louisiana says the Army Corps of Engineers has spent only about $1.3 billion of the $5.8 billion it received to repair the levees in and around New Orleans. Only about $1.7 billion of the $17 billion received by the Department of Housing and Urban Development has made its way to the streets, the agency says.

In New Orleans, officials say they have received only about 14% of the estimated $900 million in reconstruction money they estimate is needed to fix the ruined city. "We have lots of meetings," says Cynthia Sylvain-Lear, the city's liaison with FEMA.

The state and federal anti-corruption regulations offer a glimpse as to why reconstruction efforts are going so slowly.

The White House has kept in force a set of rules known as the Stafford Act. Under its guidance, rebuilding funds must be accompanied by a 10% match from local governments, on the theory that localities won't misspend if their money is also on the line. Similarly, FEMA will cover only 75% of a project's cost until the job is complete.

The requirement has delayed projects while cash-strapped towns in two of the U.S.'s poorest states try to rustle up financing.

Meanwhile, both Louisiana and Mississippi have been so keen to burnish their images that they created their own set of lumbering regulatory bureaus and antifraud audit shops. The Stafford Act has been waived in the past -- it didn't apply to Manhattan in September 2001 or South Florida following Hurricane Andrew in 1992 -- but it remains in place along the Gulf. President Bush dropped the Act for a time for certain projects, such as emergency repairs and debris removal, only to reinstate it later.

The region's reputation for corruption is one reason why. Influence peddling on the coast has a long history, from 1930s Louisiana Gov. Huey Long to Edwin Edwards, a three-term governor currently serving a 10-year prison sentence. Recently, Mississippi was named the most corrupt state in the nation by Corporate Crime Reporter, a Washington, D.C., publication.

"The question is not whether Congress should provide for those in need, but whether state and local officials who have been derelict in their duty should be trusted with that money," Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican, wrote in a 2005 letter to then-House Speaker Dennis Hastert. "Their record during Hurricane Katrina and the long history of public corruption in Louisiana convinces me that that they should not."

The result of this vigorous policing: In Louisiana, projects to rebuild a hospital along the western coast, a school-board building in suburban New Orleans and a prison south of the city remain suspended, the state says, as locals hunt for matching cash.

Meanwhile, a $7.5 billion pot intended for washed-out homeowners sits virtually untouched as applicants are forced to run a gauntlet of requirements, this time imposed by Louisiana. To prevent false claims, applicants must attend two personal meetings with state bureaucrats, provide fingerprint verification and mug shots, as well as supporting documentation, including letters from insurance companies and banks.

To date, Road Home, as the program is called, has drawn nearly 100,000 applicants. As of this week, it had disbursed only 258 grants for a total of $14.4 million. Mississippi, which operates a similar but far less restrictive grant program, has distributed $665 million to 11,827 homeowners.

In January 2006, Alan Rubin, a retired businessman, applied to Road Home on behalf of his elderlyparents, whose $200,000 house in New Orleans's fashionable Lakeview neighborhood took on 12 feet of water. They didn't have flood insurance.

After completing a 40-question questionnaire, Mr. Rubin had a four-hour interview with a screener in September, he recalls. Ten weeks later, a state-contracted appraiser visited the property. Eleven months after the initial application, the state came back with a compensation figure: $550.

Mr. Rubin complained to his local newspaper, the Time-Picayune, which chronicled his experience in late December. The day the story was published, Mr. Rubin received a call from an employee with ICF International Inc., the Arlington, Va., company that manages Road Home under a $750 million contract. He says the employee blamed a computer error -- his parents were in fact entitled to $150,000.

Carol Hector-Harris, a spokeswoman for ICF, declines to discuss Mr. Rubin's case other than to say the family "is very satisfied at this point." Mr. Rubin qualifies that: He's still waiting for the check. "I'm told that it's somewhere in the process."

Andy Kopplin, executive director of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which promulgated rules governing the Road Home grants and other federal money pots, defends his state's antifraud procedures. "The subtext in Washington was, 'We couldn't trust folks in Louisiana to spend the rebuilding money wisely,'" Mr. Kopplin says. "One man's red tape is another man's accountability."

At the federal level, Bush administration officials defend their rules. "Some people see the Stafford Act as overly cumbersome, but the provisions of the act are there for a reason, and that reason is to ensure that taxpayer money is spent properly," says Taylor Beery, director of policy for Donald Powell, the administration's rebuilding czar, in a written statement.

Running against the tide is Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu, a Democrat, who has promised to try rejiggering Stafford Act rules to make them more flexible. She's now chairman of a Senate committee overseeing reconstruction. "I'm not saying we don't need oversight -- I'm saying we need common-sense oversight," Ms. Landrieu says.

There have been many complaints about misspending in Katrina's aftermath, but most finger the federal government, not state and local agencies. In October, Louisiana sued FEMA, contending that the federal agency had tried dunning Baton Rouge for $61 million in improper or undocumented expenses. Last month, the Government Accountability Office said FEMA had misspent nearly $1 billion in recovery money since Katrina struck. Local examples of fraud have been on a much smaller scale.

Aaron Walker, a FEMA spokesman, declines to comment on the lawsuit, but says in general, "we acknowledge there are business practices we can improve on." Mr. Walker also says the agency disputes the GAO's accounting.

It is in the small towns along the Mississippi Gulf Coast where the constipated spending system is most apparent. Bay St. Louis, a town once dotted with ancient oaks and antebellum homes, remains a museum of disaster. The city lost virtually its entire underground sewer system and much of its gas grid. It needs $100,000 in street signs and nearly $4 million in secondary road repairs.

Antifraud rules have slowed tasks as basic as ditch digging. Hurricane Katrina silted in most of Bay St. Louis's ditches, which once drained the town's streets. They were later filled with debris by cleanup crews.

In late 2005, the city hired an engineering firm to survey the ditch network and work up a cost estimate in the form of a "project worksheet," a FEMA requirement. The estimated cost to clean and regrade the ditches: $3.2 million. Bay St. Louis scrounged $320,000 as part of its obligations under the Stafford Act. After three months, FEMA blessed the project.

But before work could start, the city had to send the engineering report to the Mississippi Emergency Management Agency, which reviewed the job. State approval took a month. It took three more months to solicit bids and award the contract. Work started in mid-August 2006.

After the first crew started, the state began a full audit of the project. "They call it testing," says Les Fillingame, recovery director for Bay St. Louis. The oversight called for scrutinizing each individual invoice associated with the work. In the case of the ditch mucking, that included hundreds of bills known as "load tickets," paperwork that tallied each truck load of debris. Each load ticket passed through four levels of state bureaucracy before being approved for payment.

Sitting in his office, Mr. Fillingame pulled down a ditch-mucking file, four inches thick, from his bookshelf, and let it land on his desk with a thump. "That's every load ticket," he says.

Interspersed with the paperwork scrutiny were surprise inspections. Mr. Fillingame says the state and FEMA dropped in on ditch crews to ensure there was no featherbedding.

Start to finish, it took just over a year to complete a job that involved only about a month of actual shovel work. It's a process that will be repeated at least 56 more times; Bay St. Louis has that many projects on the drawing board, most of them more complex than ditch clearing.

Michael Womack, executive director of the Mississippi Emergency Management Agency, says the process is necessary. "The governor -- he knows what the perception is outside the state of Mississippi," Mr. Womack says. "It's a perception that there's a huge amount of corruption in local government."

Mr. Womack estimates that the state's freshly minted antifraud regime could soak up $100 million in reconstruction aid. "There are lots of contractors that are trying to rip the government off. Are we preventing $100 million in fraud? Unfortunately, I think that's the case."

Adding to the burdens of dealing with antifraud regulations, Bay St. Louis must also deal with an army of sometimes impenetrable federal agencies. The $50 million reconstruction of Beach Drive, the city's long-admired main drag, has yet to start, even though it has the attention of the state highway department, the state attorney general's office, the federal highway commission, FEMA and the Army Corps.

The street can't be rebuilt until an associated seawall and the adjacent pier are reconstructed. FEMA calculates the pier alone will cost exactly $1,370,256.22.

To the surprise of locals, the Corps didn't request a congressional appropriation until November, more than a year after the storm. Spokesman Patrick Robbins says the project was submitted to Congress as part of a package of other jobs, following agency policy.

"So here we are: The whole rebuilding of downtown Bay St. Louis is contingent on this seawall, and we don't even know if it'll be funded," says Mr. Fillingame. As for the nearby unfinished auto bridge, rebuilding was slowed by labor shortages, the need for public hearings and some local squabbles.

DOJ_NMG_0123814

As he piloted his mud-spattered truck down what remains of Beach Road, Bay St. Louis Mayor Eddie Favre pointed out local landmarks. There's the once-gracious home of local Congressman Gene Taylor, now a slab of buckled concrete. Bouncing over the rutted berm, recently graveled by the state, more than a year after the storm, Mr. Favre passed his own homesite, also little more than slab. He now lives in a trailer near City Hall.

In the aftermath of Katrina, Mr. Favre promised constituents that until the city was rebuilt, he would forgo long pants and instead wear shorts, just as he had the day Katrina hit. Now on his fifth pair, and facing his second chilly winter, the mayor concedes he may have spoken rashly.

"At this rate, it looks like I'll be buried in my shorts," Mr. Favre says.

Judge Puts Settlement On Katrina In Question (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

A federal judge in Mississippi, citing the need for more information, has rejected — at least temporarily — a settlement by State Farm Insurance that was expected to provide several hundred million dollars to help policyholders rebuild homes destroyed by Hurricane Katrina 17 months ago.

In an eight-page order, Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court in Gulfport, Miss., said he was rejecting the agreement because it did not provide enough information for him to conclude that it was "fair, just, balanced and reasonable."

State Farm said last night that it had expected the agreement to be approved and that it now looked forward to addressing the judge's concerns.

The lead trial lawyer in the case, Richard F. Scruggs, and Mississippi officials also expected court approval.

Last night, Mr. Scruggs and Jim Hood, the attorney general of Mississippi, said they were optimistic that the agreement would be revived. Mr. Hood said he was confident that State Farm would "fix the things that need to be fixed."

In the agreement, State Farm said it would pay at least $130 million to policyholders and participants in the negotiations and said costs to the insurer could increase by another $600 million. The State Farm settlement was expected to be a model for other insurers to use in seeking settlements, which would help jump-start the lagging recovery of Mississippi's coast.

The dispute with State Farm and other insurance companies centered on the insurers' refusal, as stated in their policies, to pay for damage from the heavy flooding — driven by the high winds of Hurricane Katrina — that swept over the Mississippi coast on Aug. 29, 2005. Some insurers refused not only to pay for flood damage, but declined to pay for harm to houses that had been battered by wind and waters.

Even so, the insurers paid $5.3 billion for wind damage to more than 330,000 homes in Mississippi and $10.3 billion for nearly a million homes in Louisiana. The rejected settlement did not include homeowners in Louisiana.

The settlement, which was announced on Tuesday, was twofold. One part settled 640 lawsuits arising from the hurricane for $80 million; the other required State Farm to reopen up to 35,000 damage claims that state officials and trial lawyers said had been underpaid. In that part, State Farm had agreed to pay at least $50 million.

Judge Senter's order dealt exclusively with the second part, the reopening of the damage claims. It was not clear whether the settlement of the 640 lawsuits would proceed. But during the negotiations, participants said that State Farm had refused to settle unless both the lawsuits and the 35,000 damage claims were parts of one agreement.

A spokesman for State Farm, Phil Supple, said yesterday that the two elements were separate. But he would not respond to questions seeking to clarify the linkage and whether the entire agreement might be scuttled if the judge's concerns about the 35,000 damage claims could not be resolved. In an interview, Mr. Scruggs said he expected the settlement of the 640 lawsuits to stand, partly because State Farm has already paid the first installment.

"We're going to start dispersing those settlement funds next week," Mr. Scruggs said.

As part of the overall settlement, Mr. Hood, the Mississippi attorney general, agreed to drop a criminal investigation into State Farm's handling of hurricane damage claims and to remove the company from a civil lawsuit accusing it and other insurers of treating policyholders unfairly.

Mr. Hood said he was continuing the lawsuit against other insurers. On Thursday he urged other insurance companies to follow State Farm's lead, to settle hundreds of other lawsuits and to reopen thousands of storm damage claims.

In rejecting the agreement, Judge Senter raised concerns about a lack of detail on how much money policyholders might receive. He noted that State Farm had agreed to pay at least $50 million for reopened claims. But, he said, "there is no way I can ascertain how this sum compares to the total claims" of the approximately 35,000 homeowners, nor "how thinly this large sum may be spread."

He said he was also troubled about the potential unfairness of an arbitration process intended by the negotiators to provide an appeals process for homeowners who requested that their claims be re-evaluated. He said that under the agreement, arbitration hearings were to be limited to two hours and that there was no apparent provision for legal representation for homeowners.

Judge Senter said the agreement also failed to provide information on what the lawyers had done to justify an agreed-upon payment of up to $20 million in relation to reopening the 35,000 damage claims. The lawyers are to receive another $26 million for settling the 640 lawsuits.

Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond School of Law, said he thought Judge Senter was being "extraordinarily careful to attempt to protect the interests of all the homeowners."

Professor Tobias said he did not think the settlement "was all over," but, he added: "A lot of work has to be done to satisfy this judge."

Court Rejects Deal From State Farm On Katrina Claims (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

A federal judge in Mississippi Friday rejected a proposed settlement aimed at helping to speed the Gulf Coast recovery after Hurricane Katrina.

The judge's ruling threw into uncertainty a plan that would have required State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., the nation's largest home insurer, to pay a total of at least $50 million to homeowners who suffered damage in the 2005 storm.

In the proposed settlement, the court was asked to create a class of 35,000 State Farm customers in coastal Mississippi counties who could ask the Bloomington, Ill., company to review their Katrina claims. State Farm would then decide whether to offer more money for the claims, while customers could accept State Farm's offer or take their cases to arbitration. The class wouldn't have included people who had filed suit against State Farm, though they could have opted in.

But U.S. District Court Judge L.T. Senter raised a number of objections in his ruling about the procedure and other issues related to the case. "In the absence of substantially more information than I now have before me, I am unable to say, even preliminarily, that the proposed settlement establishes a procedure that is fair, just, balanced, or reasonable," the judge found.

Judge Senter did, however, note that the motion to create the class could be renewed if the plaintiffs could address his concerns and show that it would be in the best interests of those who would be in the class.

A State Farm spokesman said, "We are looking forward to addressing Judge Senter's concerns. We believe given the opportunity, he will come to view the proposed settlement as fair, just, balanced and reasonable."

The Scruggs Katrina Group, a group of attorneys who would have represented the class, said: "Our efforts and attentions will be placed on satisfying his questions and requirements."

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood said, "I am confident that Judge Senter will make the plaintiffs and State Farm fix the problems."

State Farm had separately agreed to pay about $80 million to 640 Mississippi homeowners who also suffered damage in Katrina. Judge Senter's ruling didn't concern that agreement.

Judge Rebuffs Katrina Insurance Settlement (CNN)

CNN.com, January 26, 2007

GULFPORT, Mississippi (CNN) -- A federal judge Friday rejected a proposed settlement agreement involving nearly 35,000 homeowners affected by Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. District Judge L. T. Senter Jr. said the bargain between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. and the Mississippi attorney general did not establish "a procedure that is fair, just, balanced or reasonable."

But Senter left the door open for a new settlement agreement, rejecting the proposal "without prejudice."

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood said Tuesday, when the proposed class-action settlement was announced, that it could mean up to $500 million in payments to property owners in coastal Mississippi who were dissatisfied with their insurance payouts after Katrina.

The settlement, Hood said, resolved the civil lawsuit he filed against State Farm on behalf of the company's Mississippi clients and ended a criminal investigation of State Farm's claim-handling practices.

But, Senter wrote in his opinion, "In the absence of substantially more information than I now have before me, I am unable to say, even preliminarily, that the proposed settlement establishes a procedure that is fair, just, balanced or reasonable."

In response to Senter's ruling, State Farm issued a statement saying, "We look forward to addressing Judge Senter's concerns." It added that it believed Senter might be persuaded to change his mind.

DOJ_NMG_0123816

The Scruggs Katrina Group, which represents hundreds of State Farm policyholders and is participating in the settlement, pointed out in a statement on its Web site that while Senter refused to grant preliminary approval, "he made clear that the plaintiff's lawyers are 'in a position to address the concerns expressed in (his) opinion.'"

Hood issued a statement saying that while his office did not negotiate the terms of the proposal, he did have "reservations about some of the terms."

"Nevertheless, I knew that Judge Senter would make sure that the class was a fair procedure for all," he said. "I am confident that Judge Senter will make the plaintiffs and State Farm fix the problems he has raised in his order."Judge spells out his objections

As part of the proposal, State Farm had agreed to change its claim-handling practices. It also agreed to re-evaluate Katrina claims using different adjusters and engineers for clients who filed claims but did not sue the company. The company agreed to make new offers; in case of disputes, binding arbitration would be used.

Senter detailed numerous items of concern in the proposed settlement, including the fact that neither Hood nor State Farm has provided any information for him to determine how many policyholders were within the proposed class, or how many fall within the five payment ranges based on the damage they sustained from Katrina.

And while State Farm has agreed to pay at least $50 million, "there is no way I can ascertain how this sum compares to the total claims of the members of the total class," the judge wrote.

Homeowners are allowed to opt out of the class action, but Senter said the settlement does not make opting out easy.

"It appears to me that a lay person confronted with this claims procedure will likely be unable to participate effectively without the assistance of counsel," he wrote.

Although State Farm pledged to re-evaluate Katrina claims, the settlement agreement provides for no oversight of that process and allows State Farm "a substantial measure of control."

"There is no evidence that State Farm will evaluate the class members' claims in any way different from the way these claims have already been evaluated," Senter wrote.Company previously denied 'slab case' claims

In the so-called "slab cases" -- where homeowners were left with only a slab -- State Farm was required to offer the owners at least 50 percent of their policy limits, Hood said.

The company previously had denied those claims, maintaining the destruction came from water and that it was unable to find any separate wind damage, which was covered under its policies, the Biloxi Sun-Herald has reported.

Senter said he was "struck," however, that under the agreement, even policyholders left with only a slab or pilings are not guaranteed any payment, noting State Farm's offer could be offset by policy limits of other insurance.

"Under the proposed agreement, the insured owner of a property worth $100,000 who insured the property against $50,000 in wind damage and $50,000 in flood damage, and who has collected his flood insurance benefits, would not be entitled to any recovery even if only a slab remained," the judge wrote.

Senter also disagreed with the binding arbitration portion of the settlement. Under the agreement, the arbitrator's decision would be final -- even if it is lower than State Farm's offer -- with no appeal process.

The judge pointed out that under binding arbitration, property owners would give up a variety of rights, including that of due process, and potential legal action.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Defies Lawmakers To Solve Iraq (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Declaring "I'm the decision maker," President Bush yesterday challenged congressional efforts to formally condemn his Iraq plan, while Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates warned that a proposed Senate resolution criticizing the deployment of additional troops would embolden the enemy.

"Any indication of flagging will in the United States gives encouragement to those folks," Gates told reporters at the Pentagon. "I'm sure that that's not the intent behind the resolutions, but I think it may be the effect."

Bush consulted with Gates and Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who will head U.S. forces in Iraq, at an early-morning meeting at the White House. Speaking with reporters afterward, the president complained that lawmakers "are condemning a plan before it's even had a chance to work. And they have an obligation and a serious responsibility, therefore, to put up their own plan as to what would work."

Bush later met with House Republicans at a retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore and, according to two Republicans present, mocked the Senate by telling the House members that he found it "ironic" that senators would oppose his plan to dispatch 21,500 more troops to Iraq but praise and unanimously confirm Petraeus, who helped design it.

Democrats responded angrily to Gates's comments, which were similar to what Petraeus said at his Tuesday hearing before his confirmation yesterday. "The American people will rightly dismiss these accusations as a desperate attempt by the administration to support a failed policy that is not worthy of the sacrifice of our men and women in uniform," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) disputed Bush's suggestion that the Democrats have not come up with a plan. Speaking at the Brookings Institution, he said his party was united around the proposition that the United States should shift more responsibility to the Iraqis, begin a "phased redeployment" of troops and initiate more aggressive regional diplomacy to stabilize Iraq.

Yesterday's administration comments were part of a White House campaign to try to keep Republican lawmakers from signing on to any resolution that criticizes the president's new strategy in Iraq. By keeping down the number of Republican defections, the administration hopes to make any vote appear highly partisan and to buy Bush's new plan more time.

With Bush's leverage on Capitol Hill at a low, the White House appears to be relying heavily on GOP leaders to orchestrate the opposition to two resolutions condemning the troop buildup, according to lawmakers, lobbyists and administration officials. White House lobbyists and senior officials at the National Security Council are continuing to meet with lawmakers, but a number of senators said they did not perceive the lobbying as particularly aggressive. The strategy, as they described it, is to muddy the waters with a number of competing resolutions that could siphon support from a strong message of disapproval for the president's plan.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday approved a resolution opposing the introduction of the additional troops, calling for more diplomacy and a regional peace effort, and demanding that U.S. troops be deployed away from urban sectarian hotbeds to guard Iraq's borders, hunt down terrorists and train Iraqi security forces. Bush defied Congress yesterday to come up with an alternative to his Iraq strategy, but advocates say the committee's resolution amounts to one.

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) has offered a similar resolution, while also calling for measurable benchmarks in Iraq. Warner's resolution includes language accepting Bush's constitutional powers as commander in chief, leaves rhetorical room for some additional troop deployments and treats the fight with Sunni extremists in Anbar province as a matter separate from the sectarian violence in Baghdad.

GOP leaders, meanwhile, are coalescing around a resolution drafted by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that would establish strict benchmarks for the Iraqi government and the Bush administration to meet, without criticizing the president's plan. The leaders may also offer a simple resolution of support for Bush, saying the president's plan should be given a chance.

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said that the administration would still like GOP leaders to block any vote but that at this point even some of the most ardent Republican conservatives need some way to voice their skepticism on the record. The best the White House can hope for is what Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) called a "smorgasbord" of resolutions that splits both parties and pulls senators in multiple directions.

Like other GOP lawmakers, McConnell said time is running out for the president. "I think everybody knows what the consequences are. The president doesn't have a stronger supporter in the Senate than the person you're looking at, but I repeat, this is the last chance for the Iraqis to step up and demonstrate this government can function," he said. "The message to the Iraqi government could not be more clear."

Administration officials say they realize their position on the Hill is precarious. Many Republicans blame the war in Iraq for their electoral debacle last November, and if the situation does not improve soon, the administration will be faced with massive defections within the GOP -- not only on nonbinding resolutions but perhaps also on bills that limit the president's ability to prosecute the war.

But several administration officials said they felt they had a good week, with Petraeus making an effective case for more time at his confirmation hearing Tuesday and only one Republican, Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), defecting when the Foreign Relations Committee approved the resolution against additional troops on Wednesday.

"No one is under any illusion that we are going to win over many Democrats or turn around the country. What we need to do is stabilize Republicans," said one senior White House official who was not authorized to speak on the record. While many Republicans are very anxious to vent their displeasure with the situation in Iraq, Republican stalwarts still seem reluctant to part with the president.

"I think he made the case in the State of the Union message . . . that this is the best that he and his military commanders can come up, so give us a chance," said Sen. Robert F. Bennett (R-Utah). "If you are going to say no, you better have an alternative."

Bush Assertive On Iraq Strategy (BBC)

BBC.com, January 26, 2007

US President George W Bush has made it clear he will ignore any attempt by the US Congress to question his sending 20,000 extra troops to Iraq.

Mr Bush - who faces tough opposition in Washington to his new Iraq strategy - said he was the decision-maker and would not rethink his plans.

He spoke after the Senate unanimously backed Lt Gen David Petraeus as the new US commander in Iraq.

Meanwhile House Speaker Nancy Pelosi arrived in Iraq on a surprise visit.

Ms Pelosi, a Democrat and vocal critic of Mr Bush's plan to send more troops, held talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Mr Maliki assured Ms Pelosi that Iraq intended "to assume security missions currently handled by US-led forces in Iraq", a statement from the prime minister's office said.

Ms Pelosi told journalists the meeting with Mr Maliki gave her "a greater understanding of the others' point of view".

US Defence Secretary Robert Gates meanwhile has suggested Congressional resolutions opposing Mr Bush's troops plan "embolden[s] the enemy".

The Senate is due to debate a number of non-binding resolutions next week, some of them sharply critical of the surge.

'Decision-maker'

In a news conference after Gen Petraeus' confirmation, Mr Bush accused opponents of his strategy of "condemning a plan before it's even had a chance to work".

"I'm the decision-maker," he told senior military advisers during a meeting at the White House, the Associated Press news agency reported.

Mr Bush said that he had authorised US forces in Iraq to target Iranian agents there.

"If somebody's trying to harm our troops, or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, we will stop them," he said.

Gen Petraeus, who has spent two of the last four years in Iraq, replaces Gen George Casey.

A career soldier, he graduated from the West Point military academy in 1974 and was commissioned in the infantry.

He has served in Europe and the Middle East and was commander of the 101st Airborne Division during the invasion of Iraq.

Speaking to the Senate armed forces committee on Tuesday, Gen Petraeus backed Mr Bush's plan to deploy additional troops, but warned that the task in Iraq was a tough one.

"The situation in Iraq is dire. The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard," he said.

"But hard is not hopeless."

Mr Bush wants to commit more than 21,500 additional troops, mainly to violence-hit Baghdad, in an effort to improve security and end sectarian clashes.

But his plan continues to face considerable opposition both from Democrats and members of his own Republican party, who want an earlier transfer of security to Iraqi leaders.

Gates Warns Congress On Iraq Opposition (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said yesterday that Congress' push to oppose President Bush's troop increase in Iraq "emboldens the enemy" and undercuts the commanders in the field.

Facing the prospect of a no-confidence vote in the Senate next week, Mr. Bush called for Congress to give his plan "a chance to work" before ruling it out. But opposition continues to build, with high-profile Republicans and Democrats who previously supported his stance announcing their opposition yesterday, saying the goal of a stable Iraq may be out of reach now.

Meanwhile, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Rep. John P. Murtha, the prominent anti-war Pennsylvania Democrat, made a surprise trip to Baghdad yesterday, boosting Congress' profile as an equal branch in the decision-making process as the debate continues in Washington.

Mr. Bush and administration officials are trying to earn enough time to prove that his plan to increase troops by 4,000 Marines in the Anbar province and more than 17,000 soldiers in Baghdad can work. Mr. Gates said Democrats' plan to vote on a nonbinding resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan would send the wrong signal.

DOJ_NMG_0123819

"A resolution that, in effect, says that the general going out to take command of the arena shouldn't have the resources he thinks he needs to be successful certainly emboldens the enemy and our adversaries," he said in his first press conference.

"Any indication of flagging will in the United States gives encouragement to those folks. And I'm sure that that's not the intent behind the resolutions, but I think it may be the effect," Mr. Gates said.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, called Mr. Gates' statement "a desperate attempt" to bolster the president's policy.

Mr. Bush and other administration officials have counted on the fact that all sides in the debate agree that victory is necessary. The president referred to that in his State of the Union address this week and again yesterday after a meeting with Mr. Gates and Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who was confirmed by the Senate yesterday to be the top commander in Iraq.

But members of Congress are increasingly talking about a vision of victory that is different from Mr. Bush's picture of an Iraq that can "govern, sustain and defend itself."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer yesterday endorsed a phased withdrawal within six months. He deemed it an "alternative path" that, he said, "will not necessarily lead to the Iraq we would have liked to see at the onset of this war."

The Maryland Democrat, who had been among the highest-ranking Democratic supporters when Mr. Bush went to war, said yesterday he would not have voted for the war knowing what he does now.

He said Mr. Bush botched decisions throughout the war and there is no indication that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can follow through on the benchmarks Mr. Bush and Congress all agree he must meet.

Mr. Hoyer said that in addition to the no-confidence resolutions that will come up for a vote in the Senate next week and in the House later, the House may consider a "revised authorization for the use of military force in Iraq that more accurately reflects the mission of our troops on the ground." That would allow lawmakers to pare down the full grant of authority they issued in the 2002 vote that allowed Mr. Bush to go to war.

Also yesterday, former New York Gov. George E. Pataki, a potential Republican presidential candidate, announced his opposition to the troop surge, saying that Iraqi leaders have not proved they are ready to shoulder responsibility for democracy and that U.S. troops should instead focus on fighting al Qaeda.

"Let's continue to hope, but let's not put our troops in harm's way simply on the basis of that hope," he said.

Most prominent potential candidates have supported Mr. Bush's call for more troops; but in a speech at Georgetown University, the three-term governor raised the possibility of a victory that falls short of the president's vision.

"A functioning democracy throughout Iraq is not essential to our achieving a military victory over al Qaeda in Iraq," Mr. Pataki said. "And I share the doubt of many that 20,000 additional troops alone will assure a successful democracy."

Kennedy Vows To Get A Vote On Iraq "One Way Or The Other" (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, January 26, 2007

When the Senate takes up a resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to add more troops to Iraq, there will be more at stake than a non- binding measure, leading Democrats said Friday.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said if Republicans stand in the way of an up-or-down vote on such a resolution, the resulting cloture vote would, in effect, be a referendum on the war.

"We're going to get a vote one way or the other," Kennedy said in the Capitol.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday passed, largely along party lines, a resolution opposing Bush's surge plan. It was sponsored by committee chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.). However, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said this might not be the measure that the full Senate will eventually vote on.

He indicated that a compromise could be forged between the language of the so-called "Biden resolution," which many Democrats favor, and a proposal spearheaded by Sens. John Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine).

"We're working on having a resolution that we can vote on, and of course it'll be a mixture of what Warner has and what we have," Reid told reporters. "And so I don't think there will be two competing resolutions."

At the end of the debate, Reid said, the American people will see that "a majority of the United States Senate opposes the president's escalation in Iraq, without any question."

Reid also suggested that a vote against such a resolution could have political consequences for Republicans.

"I don't know if we'll get 60 votes [necessary to overcome a filibuster]," Reid said. "But I'll tell you one thing: There are 21 Republicans up for reelection this time. If they think this is going to be a soft vote for them, they've got another thing coming."

In their joint press conference, Reid and Kennedy also blasted Republicans for standing in the way of an amendment-free minimum wage bill.

DOJ_NMG_0123820

"What is it, Mr. Republican, that you cannot stand about hardworking Americans at the lower end of the economic ladder?" Kennedy asked.

Reid added that, since the last minimum wage increase 10 years ago, members of Congress raised their own pay $30,000.

"I don't know how to describe this other than disgraceful," Reid said.

Pelosi, Maliki Discuss Timing Of Drawdown (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 26 -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), visiting Baghdad on Friday in her new capacity as House speaker, that he would like to see 50,000 U.S. troops leave by the end of the year, Iraqi officials said.

Pelosi's primary concern in meeting Maliki appeared to be to determine how soon he thought the United States could withdraw its soldiers from Iraq, said Ali Dabbagh, the prime minister's spokesman.

The U.S. military, reversing earlier statements, acknowledged Friday that four of five soldiers killed last Saturday had been abducted before being executed. The abductions followed a brazen attack on a government building in the southern city of Karbala.

Military officials earlier this week had dissuaded The Washington Post from reporting an account of the abductions, saying it was inaccurate. The account had been provided by Iraqi officials and witnesses.

Pelosi, a critic of the Bush administration's policy in Iraq, told the prime minister that she and fellow Democrats are eager to see a prompt transition of authority, Maliki's office said in a statement.

"The prime minister assured them that they could speed up the withdrawal of the troops if the equipment and training of the national forces could be speeded up," Dabbagh said Friday night in an interview.

Pelosi's visit occurs as the Bush administration is sending an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, where sectarian violence continues, impunity is widespread and the government struggles to provide basic services.

"The purpose of our trip was fact-finding, and we're in the process of doing that," Pelosi told Iraqi television reporters.

The military's statement Friday, issued following the release of an Associated Press report on the Karbala attack, provides this account of the killings:

The assailants traveled in at least five sport-utility vehicles and wore what looked like U.S. military uniforms, which allowed them to approach the building without raising suspicion. The fighters, armed with U.S.-type weapons, attacked a group of American soldiers inside with grenades and rifles. One U.S. soldier was killed.

The assailants captured four others. Several miles away at a checkpoint, the convoy drew the suspicion of Iraqi police, who followed the vehicles. The pursuit prompted the attackers to abandon five SUVs before they escaped.

Iraqi police found the bodies of two American soldiers handcuffed together in the back of one of the vehicles; both had been shot in the head. Another soldier, also shot, was found dead on the ground. A fourth soldier, who also had been shot in the head, died en route to a hospital.

"The precision of the attack, the equipment used and the possible use of explosives to destroy the military vehicles in the compound suggests that the attack was well rehearsed prior to execution," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a military spokesman.

Also Friday, the military said a Marine died fighting in Anbar province, in western Iraq, one of the most dangerous parts of the country.

Friday morning, a bomb left in a plastic bag detonated in the Souq al-Ghazil pet market, in a heavily Shiite area of central Baghdad, killing at least 16 people and injuring more than 35, Iraqi officials said.

Pelosi Meets Maliki In Baghdad Visit (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — House Speaker Nancy Pelosi led a group of U.S. lawmakers on a visit here Friday to discuss President Bush's troop buildup plan and other efforts to reduce sectarian violence with U.S. and Iraqi officials.

During a meeting with Pelosi, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said his government was determined to fight armed militants with "full power," according to a statement from the Iraqi government.

The prime minister also described details of the plan to secure Baghdad, which will include operations that will target anyone breaking the law regardless of sectarian affiliation, the statement said. Maliki told Pelosi that Iraqi security forces were ready to take over crucial security missions from U.S. forces, the statement said.

Pelosi (D-San Francisco) reportedly voiced support for Iraq's "democratic experiment" and vowed to push for the speedy transfer of security duties from U.S. to Iraqi forces long demanded by the Shiite-dominated government.

DOJ_NMG_0123821

On Iraqi TV, Pelosi said she and Maliki "came out of the meeting with a greater understanding, I think, of each other's point of view."

She said the congressional delegation is "fact finding and we are in the course of doing that."

"We came here also to convey to our troops the appreciation of the American people for what they're doing."

Meanwhile, violence continued to take a toll on Iraqi civilians and U.S. troops.

Bomb blasts and shootings in the capital killed at least 38 and injured 72 during the Muslim day of worship. A U.S. Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 6 died Friday of combat wounds while operating in Al Anbar province, the military said.

Since the 2003 invasion, 3,067 U.S. troops have been killed, according to icasualties.org.

Police in Baghdad found the bodies of at least 17 men, including the corpse of a Sadr City man later identified as a taxi driver. His family, worried about his disappearance had come to the Yarmouk Hospital several times over the last week. His body was discovered this week in west Baghdad, headless and mangled by wild dogs. His parents identified the body from the clothes, hospital officials said.

Gunmen attacking a ranking police official south of the capital killed a woman in a passing vehicle.

Police discovered the bodies of three men, wearing military uniforms, floating in the Tigris River near the southern Iraq town of Suwayrah. The men had been blindfolded, handcuffed and shot several times in the head and chest.

Tribal clashes with sectarian overtones erupted in a village north of Kut. The fighting between rival Shiite and Sunni clans left four dead, police said.

In the north, a suicide bomber struck a Shiite mosque near the city of Mosul, killing one and injuring three worshipers emerging from Friday prayers.

Police in the Kirkuk area found two unidentified bodies of men who had died of gunshot wounds.

House Speaker Pelosi Visits Iraq (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) - House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Rep. John Murtha, both vocal war critics, were in the Iraqi capital Friday at the head of a delegation of House members on a fact-finding mission as the White House and Congress dueled over the expansion of U.S. forces in Iraq.

The Pelosi delegation visited the heavily fortified Green Zone, site of the American Embassy, and met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"We come out of the meeting with a greater understanding of the others' point of view," Pelosi, D-Calif., said, in brief remarks after the meeting.

She said the delegation also came "to convey to our troops the appreciation of the American people for what they're doing, to applaud their patriotism."

Pelosi has been a sharp critic of the Bush administration's conduct of the war and has led a drive in Congress against sending 21,500 more troops as part of a new security crackdown in Baghdad.

In Washington on Friday, President Bush challenged skeptical lawmakers not to prematurely condemn his buildup, saying "I'm the decision-maker."

Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat and Vietnam veteran, has been a longtime critic of the war.

In Islamabad on Friday, visiting U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State John Gastright confirmed that a congressional delegation led by Pelosi would visit Pakistan and meet with President Pervez Musharraf. The dates of the trip have not been made public.

Democrats Try To Increase Leverage Over Iraq Policy (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — Representative Steny H. Hoyer, the House majority leader, said Friday that Congress might consider legislation revising the authorization it gave President Bush in 2002 to use military force in Iraq.

Mr. Hoyer set out a road map for the House to exercise more control over Iraq strategy, as he and other Democratic leaders continued on Friday to exert pressure against the president's plan to send in an additional 21,500 troops.

Senator Harry Reid, the majority leader, moved on Friday to force a debate on a resolution opposing the troop increase that had been offered by Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, and Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska.

But Mr. Reid said that he also expected debate on other similar resolutions. Ultimately, he said, he expects the Senate to come together behind one resolution when the debate begins the week after next, with broad bipartisan opposition to the president's plan.

DOJ_NMG_0123822

Public opinion, he predicted, will compel many Republicans to support a resolution opposing the troop increase.

"Twenty-one Republicans are up for re-election this time," Mr. Reid said. "If they think this is going to be a soft vote for them, they've got another think coming."

At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates warned Congress against passing any such resolution, saying it "emboldens the enemy and our adversaries."

"I'm sure that's not the intent behind the resolutions," he said, "but I think it may be the effect."

President Bush told reporters on Friday that he had proposed the increase "in that I'm the decision maker, and I had to come up with a way forward that precluded disaster."

"I've listened a lot to members of Congress," he added, speaking at a meeting at the White House with Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, whom the Senate confirmed Friday as the new commander in Iraq. "I've listened carefully to their suggestions. I have picked the plan that I think is most likely to succeed, because I understand, like many in Congress understand, success is very important for the security of the country."

In a speech to the Brookings Institution, Mr. Hoyer predicted that the House would follow the Senate's lead in backing a resolution against the troop increase, with broad support from Republicans.

Several committees in the House would then convene hearings on the war, he said. To follow that, the House might try to exercise more control over Iraq strategy in legislation regarding spending for the Defense or State Department. Another option, he said, would be a revised authorization for the use of military force in Iraq "that more accurately reflects the mission of our troops on the ground."

Some Republicans as well as Democrats have said that the resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq, passed in October 2002, was not intended to allow American troops to police a civil war, as some lawmakers now say is the case.

Mr. Hoyer said in his speech that he would not have supported the resolution allowing the president to go to war "had I known then what I know now: that the United States of America could and would prosecute a war and manage a nation-building effort in such an incompetent, arrogant, unplanned and unsuccessful manner."

Mr. Hoyer also called for requiring the president to certify to Congress that the government of the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, was meeting the benchmarks Mr. Bush said he had set. He also called for greater international involvement in securing Iraq, and peace talks like the ones held in Dayton, Ohio, in 1995 that ended the Bosnian war.

"The president's so-called new strategy is really little more than stay the course," Mr. Hoyer said, adding that it "places far more confidence in the leadership of Prime Minister Maliki than his record of competence and cooperation merits."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Friday with other members of Congress, including the chairmen of the armed services, foreign affairs, and intelligence committees, as well as Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, a leading Democratic critic of the war.

In a statement after her visit, Ms. Pelosi said that she had traveled to Iraq to thank the troops and to express support for them, "as well as our hope that they will come home safely and soon."

In meetings with the prime minister and other senior American and Iraqi officials, the statement said, "we stressed our belief that it is well past time for the Iraqis to take primary responsibility for the security of their nation." American forces, Ms. Pelosi said, "should quickly begin to transition from a combat role to one focused on training, counterterrorism, force protection and controlling Iraq's borders."

Mr. Maliki's office released a statement after the meeting saying that the prime minister had "confirmed the resolution of the Iraqi government to challenge the terrorist groups with the full power" of its military force and the political system.

The prime minister also emphasized that Iraqi forces "are ready" to assume responsibility for the country's security.

Rebuke Of Bush's War Plan Gathers More Steam (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — Another Republican senator said Friday that he would back the symbolic push to oppose President Bush's plans to increase troop levels in Iraq, further evidence of the growing division within the GOP over the unpopular plan.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, a recently announced presidential candidate who once staunchly supported Bush's foreign policy, became the seventh Republican senator to line up behind a nonbinding rebuke of the troop proposal.

Brownback said he favored a measure sponsored by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that expresses disagreement with the president's plan and advocates a less central role for the U.S. military in stopping sectarian violence in Iraq.

Along with Warner and Brownback, three other Republicans and several Democrats have said they favor the resolution.

A more strongly worded resolution opposing the troop plan says, "It is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0123823

It is sponsored by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.). Also backing it is Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine).

Administration officials have dismissed the notion that either resolution would affect decisions on Iraq, and Bush on Friday reiterated his commitment to proceed with his plan.

"I'm the decision-maker," Bush said after meeting with Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus in the Oval Office shortly after the Senate unanimously confirmed him to take command of U.S. forces in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates also criticized the congressional efforts to oppose the Bush plan.

"It's pretty clear that a resolution that, in effect, says that the general going out to take command of the arena shouldn't have the resources he thinks he needs to be successful, certainly emboldens the enemy," Gates told reporters. "It seems pretty straightforward that any indication of flagging will in the United States gives encouragement to those folks."

As the haggling intensified in Washington over the Senate's intentions, two of Capitol Hill's most vocal critics of the administration's policies in Iraq — House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) — met in Baghdad with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

"We stressed our belief that it is well past time for the Iraqis to take primary responsibility for the security of their nation," Pelosi said in a statement issued by her Washington office. "The delegation's view is that American forces should quickly begin to transition from a combat role to one focused on training, counter-terrorism, force protection and controlling Iraq's borders."

Brownback's decision to support Warner's resolution came as Democratic and Republican Senate leaders continued to negotiate over the timing of a much-anticipated debate on the plan unveiled by the president in a nationally televised speech this month.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he anticipates a compromise between the two measures.

But Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said Friday that he was working on less confrontational alternatives that he hopes to be able to offer when the debate begins on the pending resolutions, perhaps as soon as next week.

Several other GOP senators — including John McCain of Arizona, a leading champion of Bush's plan and a presidential contender — have expressed interest in resolutions that would call for specific benchmarks to measure the cooperation of the Iraqi government.

McConnell said he believed that he could build support for "something that makes it abundantly clear to the Iraqis that this is it," and that the U.S. expected them to assume a significantly larger role in cracking down on sectarian violence.

"If we're going to do a resolution at all, I think that's the one part that could conceivably be helpful," McConnell said.

Pataki Opposes More Troops Unless Iraqis Do Their Part (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 —Former Gov. George E. Pataki of New York, a Republican who has steadfastly supported President Bush's Iraq policies, said on Friday that he would oppose Mr. Bush's plan for sending more troops to Baghdad unless Iraqi leaders took clearer steps to build a nonsectarian government.

In a speech at Georgetown University, Mr. Pataki, who is considering a run for president, said the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has failed to provide security to all its citizens and left the impression that it favors Shiites in their escalating sectarian conflict with Sunnis.

"Before the United States government puts more troops in harm's way in Baghdad, we must have confidence that the Maliki government will be an active partner" in building a unity government, Mr. Pataki said.

"If they want Americans to continue to die in defense of their government, if they want Americans to continue to pour tens of billions of dollars into their people's schools, services and security, we must first demand action on their part," he said, referring to Iraqi leaders.

"Prime Minister Maliki must show that his government will be part of the solution and not, as many have feared, part of the problem."

With his remarks, Mr. Pataki appeared to distance himself not only from the president, but also from the three men often named as the leading Republican candidates to replace him: John McCain of Arizona, one of the Senate's most vocal supporters of the troop increase, as well as former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York, and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who both have gone on record supporting it.

But Senators Sam Brownback of Kansas, who has announced a presidential run, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who is considering a run, have denounced the planned troop increase.

Mr. Pataki presented his views as a "bridge" between "factions pointing fingers," a reference, his aides said, to lawmakers in Washington who support the president's Iraq strategy and those who support withdrawal.

DOJ_NMG_0123824

Mr. Pataki's son Teddy is an officer in the Marines, but he has not been sent to Iraq.

The speech, Mr. Pataki's second since leaving office last month after 12 years in Albany and his first on foreign policy, comes as he considers whether to enter what is fast becoming a crowded field of contenders for the Republican presidential nomination for 2008.

The speech reflected the political challenges that he and other potential Republican presidential candidates face in responding to President Bush's call for more troops in a war that many polls show to be increasingly unpopular.

Mr. Pataki has previously defended the president's Iraq policies, asserting that Iraq was a central front in the war on terrorism.

At a news conference in October 2003, Mr. Pataki said, "It's far better to be fighting that war against Al Qaeda terrorists with our soldiers and sailors and marines and Air Force on the streets of Baghdad than with our firefighters and police officers on the streets of Brooklyn."

On Friday, Mr. Pataki argued that it was possible for the United States to withdraw troops from Baghdad and still achieve what he described as America's top priority in Iraq: to deny Al Qaeda and other Islamic extremists the kind of safe haven they had in Afghanistan.

He said that if the Maliki government fails to undertake efforts to form a nonsectarian government, then America should "withdraw our troops from all areas where the war is essentially a civil one between Sunni and Shia or between Shia factions."

"We should withdraw to bases in Iraq, Kuwait and other parts of the Middle East that allow us to win our global strategic objective of defeating violent insurgents and denying them victory, safe havens or training and recruitment bases," he said. "No victory for Al Qaeda. No new bases from which to organize or plan new attacks against America or the West. No safe havens in Iraq or elsewhere. And no U.S. troops deployed in the middle of sectarian Shia/Sunni strife."

He also said the Maliki government should demonstrate a willingness to disarm Shiite militia groups, including the Mahdi Army. In the past, Mr. Maliki has been accused of being too reluctant to crack down on the Mahdi Army, whose leader, Moktada al-Sadr, has been an important part of his political coalition.

"If Maliki will not fight for Iraq, then we must limit our fight to the goal of defeating the global insurgents in Iraq, leaving the Iraqi government to deal with the sectarian violence of Baghdad," Mr. Pataki said.

Gates Working To Accelerate Deployment (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said yesterday that he was working to accelerate the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, suggesting that the influx of American troops is no longer contingent upon the Iraqi government fulfilling its commitments for Baghdad security operations.

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, confirmed yesterday by the Senate as the senior U.S. commander in Iraq, testified this week that he needs all of the troops -- and possibly more -- for the mission to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. "As long as he feels he needs them, they're all going to flow," Gates told reporters at his first Pentagon news conference.

"We are going to see if the timetable for the dispatch of the brigades can be accelerated," Gates said, although he added that logistical hurdles may prevent speeding up the movement for all or some of the troops.

The U.S. troop increases now underway in both Iraq and Afghanistan reflect a deliberate effort to "create an environment in which the commanders feel open to requesting what they think they need," Gates said, suggesting that in the past U.S. commanders have not felt comfortable asking for reinforcements. Still, he said, "there is no blank check," and requests for more troops will be vetted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff before being presented to him and President Bush for a decision.

In congressional testimony and statements earlier this month, Gates had suggested that the flow of additional U.S. troops to Iraq would be dependent upon the Iraqi government meeting specific pledges -- such as sending three more Iraqi army brigades to Baghdad and lifting restrictions on U.S. military operations targeting certain Baghdad districts or individuals.

"The timetable for the introduction of additional U.S. forces will provide ample opportunity early on and before many of the additional U.S. troops actually arrive in Iraq to evaluate the progress of this endeavor and whether the Iraqis are fulfilling their commitments to us," he said at a White House news conference earlier this month.

Yesterday's statements made it clear that any decision on withholding troops would be left to Petraeus, who has said he favors moving the troops to Iraq as quickly as possible.

Gates defended the man Petraeus will replace, outgoing U.S. commander Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who is under fire from some in Congress for failures of strategy in Iraq. Gates nominated Casey to become the Army's next chief of staff, with a confirmation hearing scheduled for Feb. 1. But Casey has since faced harsh criticism from some senators, including John McCain (R-Ariz.), who says he plans to vote against Casey.

DOJ_NMG_0123825

"If it's clear that generals have made serious mistakes, specific mistakes . . . they should be held accountable," Gates said. "I'm not convinced that has happened in this case."

He said Casey "has responded to the changing circumstances" by reversing a plan for a substantial troop drawdown in Iraq in 2006 after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra unleashed widespread sectarian violence.

Moreover, he said the performance of Casey and other officers must be viewed "in the context of the decisions made by the civilian superiors of officers and how the battlefield they faced was shaped by those decisions. . . . I think he deserves this position."

On upcoming U.S. and Iraqi military operations to secure Baghdad, Gates said that while they could lead to increased U.S. troop casualties, another possibility is that many of the Shiite militia and other fighters "will go to ground in the hope that they can just outwait us and filter back once we're gone." To address that concern, he said the goal was for U.S. forces to help drive the violence in Baghdad down to the point where it "would be entirely manageable by the Iraqi army that would be there for a protracted period of time."

Gates declined to comment on the results of recent U.S. airstrikes to target terrorists in Somalia, saying only that U.S. forces would seek to kill or capture members of al-Qaeda and other groups that attack the United States.

Reserved Seats, And Tone, As A New Defense Chief Meets The Press (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates held his first Pentagon press conference on Friday, and it was nothing like those of his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Over his six years in office, Mr. Rumsfeld's briefings became something like a long-running Broadway variety show, as entertaining as they were familiar.

Mr. Rumsfeld invariably stood behind the lectern in the Pentagon briefing room, often on live television, gleefully sparring with reporters, challenging the premises of their questions, and usually frustrating all efforts to elicit hard information.

Mr. Gates seemed to go out of his way to do things differently. Reporters were escorted to his personal conference room on the Pentagon's third floor, which prevented the proceedings from being televised live, though television cameras still recorded it for later broadcast. Seats around the table were reserved for some news organizations, while the rest of the roughly 30 reporters and cameramen who attended were told by press aides to stand in the corner.

Mr. Gates opened the session by explaining why he was shunning the Pentagon briefing room. "I would prefer a more informal setting than the dais and the big sign behind me and so on," he said.

The crowded conference room was an arrangement that, he acknowledged, "probably cramps some of you."

For the next half-hour, Mr. Gates answered questions. Very often the substance of his replies was not unlike what Mr. Rumsfeld might have said. Like his predecessor, he even challenged the premise of a question or two. But his answers were generally more concise and free of scoffing, teasing or smirking.

"I have no idea," Mr. Gates said in response to a question about the number of Iranian operatives in Iraq. If posed to Mr. Rumsfeld, such a question might have prompted a long discourse about "known knowns" and "known unknowns" and "unknown unknowns," the subtext of which was that the press was slightly ridiculous for even asking.

Nor were there any quotes as memorable as Mr. Rumsfeld's riposte that "stuff happens," when asked at a 2003 briefing about looting in Baghdad.

But, by the end, Mr. Gates seemed happy with how his first formal meeting with the Pentagon press corps had gone, even while some reporters grumbled about not being able to sit down. "Maybe do this where there's more room next time," he said, standing up to leave.

Defense Chief Shows He's No Rumsfeld (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — If there was any question that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates would go to almost any length to demonstrate he was the anti-Rumsfeld, he dispelled it Friday.

In his first-ever Pentagon news conference, Gates' manner and method could not have been more different than those of his controversial predecessor — starting with the room.

Donald H. Rumsfeld made the Pentagon briefing room so much his own, Gates has evidently decided he has no intention of using it. Instead, Gates met the media in his private dining room, seating reporters and himself around a large conference table.

DOJ_NMG_0123826

And the answers he offered could not have been more dissimilar to Rumsfeld's.

Stylistically, Gates refrained from scoffing at reporters, from restating their questions on more favorable terms and from challenging the premises of inquiries. He avoided any metaphysical lectures or expositions on the electricity supply of North Korea. Instead, he took the questions as they came, working his way through 32 of them, quickly and concisely.

Substantively, there were some sharp differences. Indeed, Gates came close to blaming Rumsfeld for many of the problems in Iraq.

The new Defense chief offered strong words of support for the nomination of Gen. George W. Casey Jr. to become the next Army chief of staff and said Casey was not to blame for the problems of Iraq. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has criticized Casey's leadership of the war and said he would vote against the general's nomination. Asked if commanders should be held accountable for Iraq, Gates seemed — almost — to throw Rumsfeld under the bus.

"I think that one has to look at this in the context of the decisions made by the civilian superiors of officers and how the battlefield they face was shaped by those decisions," Gates said.

Rumsfeld always insisted in his news conferences that his commanders were free to ask for more forces. But military planners had said privately that Rumsfeld created an atmosphere where such requests were unwelcome. On Friday, Gates took pains to demonstrate that he was listening to his military commanders. Although he would not say whether he might send more than 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, he said military commanders could ask for more.

"What we have done, I hope, is create an environment in which the commanders feel open to requesting what they think they need," Gates said.

During a Senate hearing this week, a slight strategy difference seemed to emerge between Gates and the man he recommended to become the top commander in Iraq, Gen. David H. Petraeus. Gates said on Jan. 12 that some of the additional forces on their way to Baghdad might end up not being needed. But Petraeus said Tuesday that he would not know if the strategy was working until all the forces were in place.

Gates did not completely back off Friday but stated emphatically that Petraeus would get the troops he wanted, and said the department was looking to get them to Baghdad sooner than spring. "As long as he feels he needs them," Gates said, "they're all going to flow."

Members of Congress often accused Rumsfeld of painting an overly rosy picture of the situation in Iraq. Here again, Gates pledged to be a different kind of defense secretary.

"My hope is to establish a record with the Hill going forward, regardless of what may have been the case in the past, where we have a reputation for candor and for saying — calling things exactly as they are, for good or for bad," Gates said.

But like Rumsfeld, Gates could not avoid some trouble at his news conference. Gates took a swipe at the pending congressional resolutions opposing the troop increase, saying the movement "certainly emboldens the enemy and our adversaries."

That provoked Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who frequently issued statements after Rumsfeld news conferences, to say that Gates' comment was "a desperate attempt by the administration to support a failed policy."

Just like old times.

Lethal-Force Order Justified, Bush Says (WP)

By Dafna Linzer, Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

President Bush yesterday defended a Pentagon program to kill or capture Iranian operatives inside Iraq, saying that U.S. troops would use all necessary measures to protect themselves and Iraqi civilians from harm.

"It makes sense that if somebody's trying to harm our troops, or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, that we will stop them," Bush said in response to a question about the program, the details of which were first reported in yesterday's Washington Post.

But Bush and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said U.S. troops would not cross Iraq's border with Iran under the program, and the president said he is still committed to resolving the dispute over Iran's nuclear program diplomatically.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said that U.S. troops must defend themselves in Iraq but that the president needs congressional approval for any program that could "escalate this conflict" with Iran. Reid said Bush should be engaged in direct diplomacy with Iran and other countries in the region to avoid a widening conflict, rather than "sending battle carrier groups" to sit off the Iranian coast.

Last fall, Bush gave the military secret authorization to kill or capture members of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, including members of a Guard unit known as the Quds Force, and any Iranian intelligence operatives suspected of arming or supporting Shiite militias in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0123827

The policy is based on the theory that Tehran will back down from its nuclear ambitions if the United States hits it hard in Iraq and elsewhere, creating a sense of vulnerability among Iranian leaders. But the policy has attracted some influential skeptics inside the Bush administration and the intelligence community who are concerned that Iran could respond with escalation. The director of the CIA, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, counseled the president to consider that Iran could undertake its own program to kill or kidnap U.S. personnel in Iraq or neighboring Afghanistan.

Bush said it is "not accurate" he wants to widen a confrontation with Iran. "We're going to continue to protect ourselves in Iraq and at the same time work to solve their problems with Iran diplomatically, and I believe we can succeed. The choice is the Iranian government's choice," he said at a news conference.

The president said his administration is already making good progress on the diplomatic front, citing a U.N. Security Council resolution that calls on Iran to halt much of its nuclear program and return to negotiations. Iran has rejected that.

Yesterday, the director of the U.N. inspection agency that is monitoring Iran's nuclear program said Tehran plans to significantly expand its nuclear program in the coming months to begin producing large quantities of uranium. Iranian officials say they intend to produce only low-enriched uranium suitable for fueling a nuclear energy program. But the same technology can also produce bomb-grade uranium. Bush said yesterday that the Iranian government plans to build nuclear weapons, though his administration has never offered proof.

In Tehran, the chairman of the parliament's National Security and Foreign Policy Commission, Alaeddin Boroujerdi, said Bush's policy amounts to "terrorist" action that violates international law.

"Such a measure illustrates the failure of the U.S.'s new strategy in Iraq, because it has had no effect in quelling unrests and restoring calm and order and has instead roused intensified reactions in Iraq," Boroujerdi told the Iranian Fars News Agency.

At a Pentagon news conference yesterday, Gates told reporters that U.S. troops were not "simply going to stand by and let people bring sophisticated IEDs into the country that can disable an Abrams tank and give them a free pass." Gates was referring to roadside bombs, or "improvised explosive devices," that U.S. officials have said are built with components brought into Iraq from Iran.

"But as we've said before, we think we can handle this inside the borders of Iraq, he said.

Gates did not discuss the program's rules of engagement but said that U.S. military targeting of Iranians or any foreign fighters is limited to those who pose a threat to U.S. troops, adding that such practice is not new. "Our forces are authorized to go after those who are trying to kill them," he said. "We are trying to uproot these networks that are planting IEDs that are causing 70 percent of our casualties," he said, adding that "if you are in Iraq and are trying to kill our troops, then you should consider yourself a target."

Gates said he thought yesterday's article in The Post contained "a number of inaccuracies," but he declined to offer examples.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, said yesterday on ABC's "Good Morning America" that U.S. troops had "found some members of the Quds Force operating within Iraq," and, "We have found weapons within Iraq. . . . We found mortars. We have found detonation wire. So, it's clear . . . either through training or providing weapons systems, they are involved here in Iraq."

Two weeks ago, U.S. forces detained five Iranians during a raid on an Iranian government office in Kurdish northern Iraq. Officials said the office was linked to the Revolutionary Guard.

But Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, a Kurd, contended that the Iranians were working in an Iraq-government-approved liaison office and that the office was set up to become a diplomatic consulate. U.S. officials said they planned to release a report in the coming days detailing the activities of the detained Iranians and their ties to the violence in Iraq.

Bush said yesterday that the United States had no quarrel with the Iranian people, just with the leaders who "end up isolating their people and ends up denying the Iranian people their true place in the world."

In New York yesterday, the U.N. General Assembly adopted a resolution condemning the Iranian government's official denial of the Holocaust and condemning a conference in Tehran last month that questioned whether Nazis murdered millions of Jews. The resolution was drafted by the Bush administration and co-sponsored by more than 100 U.N. members.

Bush Defends Moving Against Iranians Who Help Shiites Attack U.S.-Led Forces In Iraq (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti, David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — President Bush and his senior aides on Friday justified American actions against Iranian operatives inside Iraq as necessary to protect American troops and Iraqis, and said they would continue as long as Tehran kept up what they called its support for Shiites involved in sectarian attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0123828

"If somebody is trying to harm our troops and stop them from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, we will stop them," President Bush told reporters at the White House.

President Bush decided several months ago to allow American troops to make targets of select Iranian operatives inside Iraq whom military officials have accused of helping militants build sophisticated and powerful roadside bombs. He and other officials faced repeated questioning about the policy, which was disclosed in recent weeks, after The Washington Post published articles on Friday exploring Iran's regional influence and the administration's approaches to containing it.

Several administration officials, including Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, said that President Bush had given the military no new authorities to carry out the offensive, and that the Pentagon had long had permission to capture or kill foreign operatives thought to be aiding attacks against American troops.

Officials said there was no blanket authority to take action against Iranian agents, only Iranian agents thought to be directly involved in planning or carrying out attacks against American and allied forces. That is a different standard than applied to foreign fighters of Al Qaeda in Iraq, they said.

"If you are on the wire diagram as an Al Qaeda operative, you can be targeted just for reading the newspaper in your living room. These guys are not in that position," said one senior Defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The official said there was debate within the administration about whether to become even more aggressive toward Iranians in Iraq. Already, the arrests of Iranians have caused tensions between American and Iraqi officials, as well as heightening the strains between Tehran and Washington. Meanwhile, some lawmakers have expressed concerns that the administration might even strike militarily into Iranian territory just as Congress considers resolutions denouncing Mr. Bush's war strategy for Iraq.

"You have to balance it," this official said. "While you want to take care of the situation, you don't want to cause an international incident where you provoke Iran."

The White House has not issued a presidential finding authorizing covert action against Iranians inside of Iraq or authorized any military actions inside Iran, officials said.

President Bush kicked off a campaign of escalated rhetoric against Iran during a televised address to the nation on Jan. 10. For months, officials from across the Bush administration have accused Iran of supplying Shiite militias with high-tech explosives and training them to carry out attacks with roadside bombs.

Administration officials have thus far provided little detailed public evidence to support these claims. Officials said that Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador in Baghdad, is planning a news conference for Wednesday during which he will present a dossier of Iran's efforts to fuel sectarian violence in Iraq.

Part of Mr. Khalilzad's presentation, officials said, will be to show evidence found during a December raid on a compound of the Iranian-backed Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri.

The officials said that among the evidence that would be presented were photographs, documents and a color-coded wall map that were seized in the raid detailing which Sunni neighborhoods in Baghdad would be targets for attack.

Some leading Democrats, including the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Joseph R. Biden Jr., and the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, John D. Rockefeller IV, have criticized the Bush administration for building a case against Iran when American intelligence agencies still have a murky understanding of Iran's intentions in the Middle East.

Last week, Mr. Rockefeller said that the White House campaign was unnervingly similar to Bush administration rhetoric in the months before the Iraq war.

Some Middle East specialists point out that an effort to move against Iranian agents could backfire and prompt Iran to strike back against America troops.

"It's going to be a bumpy road inside Iraq because it puts U.S. forces at risk and because Ahmadinejad will be more confrontational," said Patrick Clawson, an Iran expert at the Washington Institute for Near East policy, referring to Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Military commanders in Baghdad say they have documented a rise in the number of sophisticated roadside bombs using "shaped charges" — a type of weapon that officials believe are imported from Iran. Military statistics show that the number of coalition troops killed by these weapons jumped dramatically during the last four months of 2006.

It was late last year, officials in Washington said, that Mr. Bush signed off on a more aggressive military offensive inside Iraq to counter Iranian influence. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice confirmed the policy change in an interview on Jan. 12. An article in The Washington Post on Friday reported new details about how the policy was being carried out, including some that the administration said were inaccurate, without elaborating.

One person briefed on the Bush administration strategy said officials in Washington believed that by giving assistance to radical Shiite militants in organizations like the Mahdi Army, Iran was hoping to split off hard-line elements within these organizations and make them more beholden to Tehran.

By moving against Iranians inside Iraq, the Bush administration hopes it can persuade them to stop their efforts to create rifts among Shiites and to provide aid in attacks against American troops, the person said, requesting anonymity because the briefing he had received was not intended to be made public.

"The Iranian government needs to know that whether it's the Quds Force or any other kind of Iranian organization, we are not going to tolerate American soldiers being targeted in that fashion," said R. Nicholas Burns, a top State Department official. He was referring to a section of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards Corps.

Bush Defends New Policy On Iranians In Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush staunchly defended a tough new administration policy on Iran that is drawing criticism at home and causing anxiety abroad, arguing Friday that it was only sensible for U.S. troops to move aggressively against Iranians who endangered them in Iraq.

Bush, appearing with military advisors at the White House, said the policy was not meant to spread U.S. wars in Iraq and Afghanistan into Iran, but asserted that U.S. troops had the right to seek out agents from Tehran, which he has accused of supporting Iraqi militants.

"It just make sense that if somebody is trying to harm our troops or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent civilians in Iraq, that we will stop them," Bush said.

The administration announced two weeks ago, as part of its new strategy on Iraq, that it would move more forcefully against Iranian and Syrian agents in Iraq. The White House also then moved Navy warships and fighter jets into the Persian Gulf in a display of determination to maintain its influence in the region.

The new push has been welcomed by some Sunni Arab countries that are worried about the rising influence of predominantly Shiite Iran, as well as by members of U.S. Congress from both parties who are nervous about the prospect that Tehran may acquire a nuclear weapon and possibly use it to threaten Israel.

But the aggressive approach has been unsettling to Shiite Arabs and Kurdish leaders in Iraq, as well as to others in the United States and Europe, who fear that the confrontational words and moves could escalate into military confrontation at a time when the Middle East is already torn by sectarian strife.

The administration's tougher stance has raised questions on how far the United States plans to go to confront or control the estimated thousands of Iranians in Iraq, who include not only military and intelligence agents but also humanitarian workers, pilgrims and businesspeople.

Bush said suggestions that the administration wanted to widen its military campaign into Iran were "just not accurate." He added that he would work to settle differences with Iran diplomatically. "And I believe we can succeed," he said.

The president was joined in his warning to Tehran by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and other administration officials, who were asked about a report that U.S. forces were given special orders to kill or capture Iranians found in Iraq. Administration officials said that U.S. forces had authority to do whatever was necessary to defend themselves in Iraq, but did not confirm the Washington Post report about special orders.

Gates said it was his "impression" that U.S. troops always had the authority to go after Iranian agents who were helping construct bombs in Iraq. He said U.S. forces would go after anyone trying to kill them by any means, including distributing parts to build the roadside bombs known as improvised explosive devices.

"We are trying to uproot these networks that are planting IEDs that are causing 70% of our casualties," he said. "And if you're in Iraq and trying to kill our troops, then you should consider yourself a target."

Gates reiterated that he believed Iranian military involvement could be countered in Iraq, without crossing the border. He agreed that Iran could be dealt with diplomatically, but said Americans were making clear that they would take the necessary steps to preserve "stability" in the Persian Gulf.

Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the White House National Security Council, also discussed the administration stance on Iran.

"If our troops get actionable intelligence that agents are going to cause our troops or Iraqi citizens harm, they're going to take whatever force protections that are necessary," he said.

Bush first outlined his harsher stance toward Iran on Jan. 10 as he unveiled a new strategy to address the deteriorating situation in Iraq. The latest administration policy has caused anxiety among Iraqi Kurdish and Shiite Arab leaders, who want to form closer ties with their larger and more industrialized neighbor, and fear they would be the losers in any conflict between the United States and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0123830

Iraqi political leaders say that the U.S. policy on Iran has strengthened the United States' ties to Sunni Arab countries — including Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and the smaller Gulf states — but has caused strains between those countries and Iraq.

Many of its Sunni Muslim neighbors consider Iraq a country controlled by the Shiite Muslim sect and have formed only limited diplomatic relations with Baghdad nearly four years after the U.S.-led invasion, Iraqi officials have complained.

The new Bush administration policy also has drawn criticism from U.S. lawmakers, including Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.), chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

A former top aide for Middle East policy in the Clinton White House has told Congress that the policy on Iran stands to fail, as has Bush's approach toward Iraq, and ignite wider conflict in the region.

Robert Malley, director for the Middle East program at the Brussels-based International Crisis Group, said that while the administration has refused direct talks with Iran and Syria, it has combined military threats toward Tehran with an attempt to build an anti-Iranian coalition of Sunni Arab governments.

"This approach runs the risk of promoting internecine conflict and, possibly, all-out and unwinnable civil wars in Lebanon and Palestine — yet another series of catastrophes in the making," Malley told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Tuesday.

Some observers said the new policy reflected not only a U.S. desire to reassert itself at a moment of growing Iranian influence in the region, but also represented an attempt to solicit support at home for the administration's approach at a time when the White House is trying to shore up its sagging popularity.

Toby Dodge of the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies said the confrontational U.S. tone toward Iran was likely to appeal to many in Congress.

"This is a way to explain to the U.S. public that Iran is partly to blame for Iraq's problems," he said. "It's a way to rally public opinion and forge some kind of consensus."

But Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, said that those who see a political motive in the new policy "just don't know what they're talking about."

Bush Denies Preparing Attack Against Iran (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

George W. Bush on Friday sought to deny widespread rumours his administration was preparing some kind of military action against Iran. Mr Bush confirmed a report in Friday's Washington Post that he had authorised US troops to shoot and kill Iranian operatives in Iraq, but denied this was a prelude to stronger action.

"We believe we can solve our problems with Iran diplomatically," said the US president. "It makes sense that if somebody is trying to harm our troops, or stop us from achieving our goal, or killing innocent citizens in Iraq, that we will stop them."

But the US president's relatively emollient comments are unlikely to quell speculation about the reasons behind the recent escalation of White House rhetoric towards Iran. In his prime time address on the "new way forward in Iraq" two weeks ago, Mr Bush pledged to "interrupt the flow of support [for extremists in Iraq] from Iran and Syria...We will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

In his State of the Union address to the joint houses of Congress on Tuesday, he lumped Iran with al-Qaeda. "It has also become clear that we face an escalating danger from Shia extremists who...take direction from the regime in Iran. The Shia and Sunni extremists are different faces of the same totalitarian threat."

Last week, Mr Bush ordered a second US aircraft carrier to the Gulf and the deployment of more Patriot missiles in US military bases there. Richard Haass, former head of policy planning at the State Department in the first Bush administration, said the US president was leaving both the diplomatic and military option open.

"You could interpret Bush's recent actions towards Iran in two ways – either he is increasing pressure on the regime in order to soften it up for talks over its uranium enrichment plans, or this is classic gunboat diplomacy in which the US is preparing for some kind of punitive action," said Mr Haass. "My guess is that Mr Bush's actions leave room for either scenario and the Bush administration remains divided over which to pursue."

Both Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, and Bob Gates, secretary of defence, are thought to be pushing the White House to open talks with Iranian, having softened it up with the recent application of United Nations-approved economic sanctions on Iran and the beefing up of US naval forces off the Iranian coast.

"The Bush administration believes that Iran sees the US as a kind of paper tiger, and this is Washington's answer to that," said Afshin Molavi, at the New America Foundation in Washington. "The danger to this strategy is that it carries the risk of accidentally leading into some kind of military confrontation."

DOJ_NMG_0123831

However, others in the Bush administration, notably Dick Cheney, who last year warned Iran that it would face "meaningful consequences" if it continued to foment violence in Iraq, are thought to be arguing for the military option.

This interpretation is put forward by leading Democratic lawmakers on Capitol Hill, who have sought – but not received – assurances that the Bush administration has no plans to extend its military operations in Iraq across the border to Iran.

Meanwhile, in a short statement to commemorate International Holocaust Day on Friday, Iran was the only country Mr Bush cited by name: "Remembering the victims, heroes, and lessons of the Holocaust is particularly important today as Holocaust denial continues, urged on by the Iranian regime, which perversely seeks to call into question the historical fact of the Nazis' campaign of mass murder," he said.

Daffy Does Doom (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

Dick Durbin went to the floor of the Senate on Thursday night to denounce the vice president as "delusional."

It was shocking, and Senator Durbin should be ashamed of himself.

Delusional is far too mild a word to describe Dick Cheney. Delusional doesn't begin to capture the profound, transcendental one-flew-over daftness of the man.

Has anyone in the history of the United States ever been so singularly wrong and misguided about such phenomenally important events and continued to insist he's right in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary?

It requires an exquisite kind of lunacy to spend hundreds of billions destroying America's reputation in the world, exhausting the U.S. military, failing to catch Osama, enhancing Iran's power in the Middle East and sending American kids to train and arm Iraqi forces so they can work against American interests.

Only someone with an inspired alienation from reality could, under the guise of exorcising the trauma of Vietnam, replicate the trauma of Vietnam.

You must have a real talent for derangement to stay wrong every step of the way, to remain in complete denial about Iraq's civil war, to have a total misunderstanding of Arab culture, to be completely oblivious to the American mood and to be absolutely blind to how democracy works.

In a democracy, when you run a campaign that panders to homophobia by attacking gay marriage and then your lesbian daughter writes a book about politics and decides to have a baby with her partner, you cannot tell Wolf Blitzer he's "out of line" when he gingerly raises the hypocrisy of your position.

Mr. Cheney acts more like a member of the James gang than the Jefferson gang. Asked by Wolf what would happen if the Senate passed a resolution critical of The Surge, Scary Cheney rumbled, "It won't stop us."

Such an exercise in democracy, he noted, would be "detrimental from the standpoint of the troops."

Americans learned an important lesson from Vietnam about supporting the troops even when they did not support the war. From media organizations to Hollywood celebrities and lawmakers on both sides, everyone backs our troops.

It is W. and Vice who learned no lessons from Vietnam, probably because they worked so hard to avoid going. They rush into a war halfway around the world for no reason and with no foresight about the culture or the inevitable insurgency, and then assert that any criticism of their fumbling management of Iraq and Afghanistan is tantamount to criticizing the troops. Quel demagoguery.

"Bottom line," Vice told Wolf, "is that we've had enormous successes, and we will continue to have enormous successes." The biggest threat, he said, is that Americans may not "have the stomach for the fight."

He should stop casting aspersions on the American stomach. We've had the stomach for more than 3,000 American deaths in a war sold as a cakewalk.

If W. were not so obsessed with being seen as tough, Mr. Cheney could not influence him with such tripe.

They are perpetually guided by the wrong part of the body. They are consumed by the fear of looking as if they don't have guts, when they should be compelled by the desire to look as if they have brains.

After offering Congress an olive branch in the State of the Union, the president resumed mindless swaggering. Asked yesterday why he was ratcheting up despite the resolutions, W. replied, "In that I'm the decision maker, I had to come up with a way forward that precluded disaster." (Or preordained it.)

The reality of Iraq, as The Times's brilliant John Burns described it to Charlie Rose this week, is that a messy endgame could be far worse than Vietnam, leading to "a civil war on a scale with bloodshed that will absolutely dwarf what we're seeing now," and a "wider conflagration, with all kinds of implications for the world's flow of oil, for the state of Israel. What happens to King Abdullah in Jordan if there's complete chaos in the region?"

Mr. Cheney has turned his perversity into foreign policy.

He assumes that the more people think he's crazy, the saner he must be. In Dr. No's nutty world-view, anti-Americanism is a compliment. The proof that America is right is that everyone thinks it isn't.

He sees himself as a prophet in the wilderness because he thinks anyone in the wilderness must be a prophet.

To borrow one of his many dismissive words, it's hogwash.

Senate OKs Petraeus To Lead Troops In Iraq (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

The Senate yesterday voted unanimously to confirm the nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to command U.S. troops in Iraq at a time when President Bush is building up American forces there.

Gen. Petraeus' 81-0 approval was in contrast to the widespread public and congressional opposition to Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Congress is moving toward votes in coming weeks on nonbinding resolutions opposing the troop buildup.

In testimony to Congress this week, Gen. Petraeus said the situation in Iraq is "dire" but said he believed Mr. Bush's strategy would work -- assuming the Iraqi government provided additional troops and helped crack down on militias.

Gen. Petraeus, who will replace Army Gen. George W. Casey. is just one of the new faces Mr. Bush is bringing to his team of top military and diplomatic officials in Iraq and the Middle East. He has already replaced Donald H. Rumsfeld with Robert M. Gates as defense secretary, and is changing the top military commander in the Middle East and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Gen. Petraeus, 54, has served two previous yearlong tours in Iraq as commander of the 101st Airborne Division during the invasion in March 2003 and as commander of the training program for the Iraqi army in 2004-05.

Following the Nov. 7 elections, Mr. Bush announced he would change his strategy in Iraq, including deployments of the additional troops.

"We'll now have our very best general in charge of the operations in Iraq," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. "If it can't be done under Gen. Petraeus, then it cannot be done at all. We ought to give him a chance to succeed."

Tuesday, the Senate Armed Services Committee plans to hear from Navy Adm. William Fallon, Mr. Bush's pick to replace Gen. John Abizaid as the top commander in the Middle East. Gen. Casey, nominated to be the next Army chief of staff, is expected to testify on Feb. 1.

U.S. Plan For Iraqi Force Surprises Senator (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new top U.S. commander in Iraq, told Congress that he might supplement efforts to secure Baghdad using the Iraqi Facilities Protection Service, a 150,000-man force that guards Iraqi government agencies. But that service is widely considered unreliable, and elements were described in July by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as "more dangerous than the militias," according to Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.).

"The prime minister said he wanted to get rid of the FPS as fast as possible," Reed said this week, recalling his meeting with Maliki in Baghdad last summer. There are "bad elements" in FPS units that "are carrying out murders and kidnappings . . . [and] attacking the infrastructure that they are supposedly protecting," Reed said in his trip report about what Maliki had told him. "Because of the FPS," Reed wrote, Maliki said that "some governmental ministries' guards are more dangerous than the militias."

The FPS was formed in 2003 by order of L. Paul Bremer, then administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority, to protect the 27 Iraqi ministries and their facilities throughout Iraq. Each minister, who generally represents one of Iraq's political parties, has his or her own FPS unit, whose armed members wear military uniforms.

The Iraq Study Group described FPS members as having "questionable loyalties and capabilities." It quoted an unnamed senior U.S. official as saying that they are "incompetent, dysfunctional and subversive," with some serving the manpower needs of sectarian party militias and death squads.

Reed said in an interview that, with security being the main concern of President Bush in pressing for additional U.S. troops in Baghdad, he was "surprised" that Petraeus would describe FPS units, also known as ministerial security forces, as assisting in the protection of the city. The Senate confirmed Petraeus yesterday as the new top U.S. commander in Iraq.

"There are tens of thousands of contract security forces and ministerial security forces that do, in fact, guard facilities and secure institutions, and so forth," Petraeus said in testimony earlier this week, "that our forces -- coalition or Iraqi forces -- would otherwise have to guard and secure."

When Reed responded that he was "shocked" that the FPS was mentioned in those terms -- because Maliki had told him "that some of these ministerial forces are worse than the insurgents" -- Petraeus replied: "Some, indeed." Later, in answer to a question, the Army general acknowledged that "some of those ministerial forces are part of the problem instead of part of the solution."

Maliki was not the only official who spoke to Reed in July regarding concerns about the FPS. Army Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq, described the FPS members, along with about 8,700 personal security guards provided to Iraqi political figures, as among "the proliferation of armed groups . . . [presenting] a serious challenge to stability." Dempsey said the Iraqi Defense Ministry paid the salaries of the personal security details "but has no control over them." Each of the 275 members of Iraq's Council of Representatives, as its national assembly is called, is entitled to 20 guards, many of whom are chosen from within their families.

Dempsey was particularly critical of the FPS, saying: "They have a reputation for gross misconduct." He specified as "particularly notorious" the FPS units associated with the ministries of transportation and health, both under the control of associates of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The FPS units employed by those ministries are "a source of funding and jobs for the Mahdi Army," Sadr's militia, according to the Iraq Study Group report.

Dempsey told Reed last summer that the FPS and the personal security details "should be reformed" and "outfitted with different uniforms to distinguish them from the police and clearly identify them." More recently, Dempsey told reporters that the FPS should be brought under the control of Iraq's Interior Ministry this year.

In Basra, Reed was told by Maj. Gen. John Cooper, commander of the British troops in that area, that the FPS was "a major problem." In Fallujah, members of the Marine Expeditionary Force said that when they retook the hospital in Ramadi, local leaders insisted "that the FPS be barred from returning because of their corruption and unreliability."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), upon returning from a brief trip to Iraq this month, announced that she will introduce legislation that would require -- as a condition of continued funding -- certification that the FPS and the private security contractors for the Iraqis are free of sectarian and militia influence.

"Instead of cutting funding to American troops, cut the funding to the Iraqi forces and to the security forces . . . that we pay for to protect the members of this government," Clinton said last week on the PBS's "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer." "We have to do something to get their attention in order to force them to deal with the political and the economic and the diplomatic pieces of the puzzle that confront us," she added.

Military Confirms 4 Soldiers Were Abducted During Attack In Karbala (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — Four American soldiers were abducted during a sophisticated sneak attack last week in the Shiite holy city of Karbala, the U.S. military confirmed Friday. It said three were shot to death and a fourth was mortally wounded with a gunshot to the head when they were found in a neighboring province, far from the compound where they were captured.

Two of the four were handcuffed together in the back seat of an SUV near the southern Iraqi town of Mahawil. A third dead soldier was on the ground nearby. The fourth soldier died on the way to the hospital, the military said in a statement issued late Friday that confirmed details reported by The Associated Press earlier.

On Jan. 20, the day of the raid on a security meeting in Karbala, the military said five soldiers were killed repelling the attack.

The brazen assault, 50 miles south of Baghdad, was conducted by nine to 12 militants posing as an American security team, according to two senior U.S. military officials as well as Iraqi officials. They traveled in black GMC Suburban vehicles — the type used by U.S. government convoys — had American weapons, wore new U.S. military combat fatigues, and spoke English, according to Iraqi and U.S. military officials.

None of the American or Iraqi officials would allow use of their names because of the sensitive nature of the information.

The confirmation has emerged after nearly a week of inquiries. The U.S. military in Baghdad initially did not respond to repeated requests for comment on reports that began emerging from Iraqi government and military officials on the abduction and a major breakdown in security at Karbala site.

Within hours of the AP report that four of the five dead soldiers had been abducted and found dead or dying about 25 miles to the east of Karbala, the military issued a long account of what took place.

It said, "Two soldiers were found handcuffed together in the back of one of the SUVs. Both had suffered gunshot wounds and were dead. A third soldier was found shot and dead on the ground. Nearby, the fourth soldier was still alive, despite a gunshot wound to the head."

The mortally wounded soldier was rushed to the hospital by Iraqi police but died on the way, the military said.

DOJ_NMG_0123834

The military also said Iraqi police had found "five SUVs, U.S. Army-type combat uniforms, boots, radios and a non-U.S. made rifle" near Mahawil, in neighboring Babil province.

"The precision of the attack, the equipment used and the possible use of explosives to destroy the military vehicles in the compound suggests that the attack was well rehearsed prior to execution," said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, spokesman for Multi-National Division-Baghdad.

"The attackers went straight to where Americans were located in the provincial government facility, bypassing the Iraqi police in the compound," said Bleichwehl. "We are looking at all the evidence to determine who or what was responsible for the breakdown in security at the compound and the perpetration of the assault."

The Karbala raid, as explained by the Iraqi and American officials, began after nightfall at about 6 p.m. on Jan. 20, while American military officers were meeting with their Iraqi counterparts on the main floor of the Provisional Joint Coordination Center in Karbala.

Iraqi officials said the approaching convoy of black GMC Suburbans was waved through an Iraqi checkpoint at the edge of Karbala. The Iraqi soldiers believed it to be American because of the type of vehicles, the distinctive camouflage American uniforms and the fact that they spoke English. One Iraqi official said the leader of the assault team was blond, but no other official confirmed that.

A top Iraqi security official for Karbala province told the AP that the Iraqi guards at the checkpoint radioed ahead to the compound to alert their compatriots that the convoy was on its way.

Iraqi officials said the attackers' convoy divided upon arrival, with some vehicles parking at the back of the main building where the meeting was taking place, others parked in front.

The attackers threw a grenade and opened fire with automatic rifles as they grabbed two soldiers inside the compound. Then the guerrilla assault team jumped on top of an armored U.S. Humvee and captured two more soldiers, the U.S. military officials said.

One U.S. soldier was killed in the melee at the compound, and three were wounded.

The attackers captured four soldiers and fled with them and the computer east toward Mahawil, the U.S. military officials said.

The Iraqi officials said the four were captured alive and shot just before the vehicles were abandoned.

Police who became suspicious when the convoy of attackers and their American captives did not stop at a roadblock chased the vehicles and found the bodies, the gear and the abandoned SUVs.

Three days afterward, the U.S. military in Baghdad announced the arrest of four suspects in the attack and said they had been detained on a tip from a Karbala resident. No further information was released about the suspects.

The Defense Department has released the names of troops killed last Saturday but clearly identified only one as being killed because of the sneak attack.

Capt. Brian S. Freeman, 31, of Temecula, Calif., "died of wounds suffered when his meeting area came under attack by mortar and small arms fire." Freeman was assigned to the 412th Civil Affairs Battalion, Whitehall, Ohio.

The only other troops killed that day in that region of Iraq were four Army soldiers said to have been "ambushed while conducting dismounted operations" in Karbala.

The four were identified as 1st Lt. Jacob N. Fritz, 25, of Verdon, Neb.; Spc. Johnathan B. Chism, 22, of Gonzales, La.; Pfc. Shawn P. Falter, 25, of Cortland, N.Y., and Pvt. Johnathon M. Millican, 20, of Trafford, Ala. All were with the 2nd Battalion, 377th Parachute Field Artillery Regiment, 4th Brigade Combat Team, 25th Infantry Division, of Fort Richardson, Alaska.

Military Provides Details Of Slain Soldiers' Abduction (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — Four of the five U.S. soldiers killed in a sophisticated attack in southern Iraq last week were shot after they were captured, handcuffed and driven miles away by gunmen who appeared to have detailed information about their target, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Friday.

"The attackers went straight to where the Americans were located in the provincial government facility, bypassing the Iraqi police in the compound," Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Baghdad, said in a statement. "We are looking at all the evidence to determine who or what was responsible for the breakdown in security at the compound and the perpetration of the assault."

The U.S. military said last week that five soldiers in Karbala died fending off the Jan. 20 attack on a provincial security building, but details of what happened were not released.

DOJ_NMG_0123835

However, hours after an Associated Press report cited unnamed U.S. and Iraqi sources in recounting the attack and killings, the military Friday issued a detailed statement on the incident that said the four soldiers were found dead or dying in a neighboring province south of Baghdad.

The account of the attack provided by the military suggests both a breakdown of security in the relatively safe southern province as well as increased skill on the part of armed groups.

"The precision of the attack, the equipment used and the possible use of explosives to destroy the military vehicles in the compound suggests that the attack was well rehearsed prior to execution," Bleichwehl said.

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers were at a provincial security headquarters discussing safety for pilgrims participating in an annual religious ceremony when the gunmen — dressed in U.S. Army-style combat uniforms and driving at least five sport utility vehicles — made their way past checkpoints and stormed the building about 5 p.m.

"The armed militants wore American-looking uniforms and carried U.S.-type weapons convincing Iraqi checkpoints to allow their passage," the statement said.

Once they were inside the compound, fighting broke out between the gunmen, estimated at no more than a dozen, and U.S. soldiers. Small-arms fire erupted and grenades exploded. One soldier was killed and three were wounded by a hand grenade thrown into the main office, which includes the headquarters of the provincial police chief.

"The Iraqis in the meeting were not harmed or even touched," an Iraqi military official said.

Explosions damaged several U.S. Humvees, disabling the vehicles and forcing the soldiers to take cover. The attackers pulled back, the statement said, taking four U.S. soldiers with them.

According to U.S. and Iraqi officials, not only did the gunmen manage to enter the building, they took the captured soldiers from Karbala dozens of miles to Babil province, confidently driving past at least one checkpoint.

"The vehicles did not stop at checkpoints, they drove right through them," said an Iraqi military officer, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The military said suspicious Iraqi police officers pursued them. Iraqi security officials said American and local forces surrounded the area and established a curfew.

Residents heard gunfire and saw flares light up the sky as Iraqi forces, including members of Hillah's Scorpion Brigades, searched the area.

The Iraqi police eventually found the captured U.S. soldiers, dead or dying, as well as five abandoned SUVs, U.S. Army uniforms, boots, radios and sophisticated machine guns near the Sunni towns of Mahawil and Albu Alwan in northern Babil province.

"Two soldiers were found handcuffed together in the back of one of the SUVs," the U.S. military statement said. "Both had suffered gunshot wounds and were dead. A third soldier was found shot and dead on the ground. Nearby, the fourth soldier was still alive, despite a gunshot wound to the head."

The soldier died as Iraqi police took him to a nearby hospital.

Karbala Gov. Aqil Khazali, saying he had been briefed by a U.S. official, said the intense search may have pressed the insurgents to execute the captured soldiers.

"They were killed by the criminals near Hillah in Babil province after being encircled and surrounded by the American and Iraqi forces," Khazali said.

Suicide Bomb Erases A Fading Vestige Of Joy In Baghdad (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 26 — There used to be two great joys on Fridays for Iraqis in Baghdad: browsing the ancient bookshops, and exploring the Ghazil animal market, home to an extraordinary array of creatures.

One by one, though, the storied booksellers on Mutanabi Street have seen business fade away, the customers fearful of crowded places.

The animal market, too, has suffered, having been reduced to a shell of its lively former self. When a bomb exploded there on Friday, killing 15 people and wounding 50, it was the third such attack since June.

In the chaos after the blast, snakes slithered through bloody streets where animal carcasses were jumbled with human remains. Exotic birds flew off as rescue workers tried to aid the wounded.

“We were standing in the middle of the market, looking at the birds, and suddenly there was a massive explosion,” said a man who gave his name as Qusay, and who liked to scout for rare pigeons to breed. Both his legs were broken by the explosion. He said he was taken to the hospital, where he found doctors with no supplies trying to treat ghastly wounds.

His family took him home, he said in a telephone interview, because they thought they could treat him better themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0123836

The attack was about more than taking lives, residents said. It was about taking life from the living.

Remarkably, the market was still frequented by Sunnis and Shiites, even after months of sectarian clashes. But fewer and fewer people have been showing up since the June bombing. Before that first attack, merchants and regular customers said, the market had carried on mostly as it had for centuries, despite the war, poverty and the general lawlessness on the streets.

The animal dealers would arrive early in the day and set up stalls along Jamhuriya Street.

The Bedouin would come in from the desert with scorpions and snakes and spiders, selling the venom for medicines. Merchants would bring in exotic animals, monkeys, foxes and even wolves, simply to attract a crowd so they could sell their more mundane animals, like chicken, sheep, dogs and goldfish.

The sellers would do just about anything to get attention.

Small birds were often painted bright colors to attract children, and fish were put in ornate glass jars to show off their brilliant colors. Men gathered in alleys to watch dog and cock fights. Tea and snacks were sold by wandering merchants.

Birds were a big draw, with rare pigeons being particularly popular.

One vendor, an Egyptian, according to witnesses, once put a chicken on a metal box and began rhythmically clapping. The chicken hopped from one foot to another, and the Egyptian claimed it was the world's only dancing chicken.

But the crowd discovered a hot stone under the metal. Iraq has long been a rough place and the customers, who did not appreciate the trick, beat the man badly.

On Fridays, the day of rest, large crowds went to look at the animals before going to the mosque.

Nearly everyone here can remember a morning spent in this way.

"I used to breed birds, it's a hobby of mine and I used to buy and sell pigeons," Dorid Abu Assad said in a telephone interview. "Every Friday we would go to the market to try and find some rare kinds of pigeons. It was fun to go there and be with all the people."

But he stopped going just before the attack in June, fearing a bombing. In that attack, 4 people were killed and 50 wounded in twin bombings. Then last month, militants launched a mortar into the market, killing 3 and wounding 28.

The animal sellers tried to go on, but by this Friday, residents said, the market was badly diminished. Most of the more exotic animals could no longer be found, and the sellers who came were mainly just trying to scrape by marketing chickens, sheep and small birds.

The bomber disguised himself as just another bird merchant, selling pigeons, witnesses said. As the crowd leaned in for a better look at his pigeon box, he walked away and set off the bomb.

Although it is impossible to know who exactly was responsible, the bombing fits a pattern of attacks by Sunni extremists that have picked up in intensity as Shiites prepare to celebrate Ashura, one of their holiest days.

The violence on Friday was not confined to the animal market. The area around Haifa Street, an important commercial strip, was again racked despite an effort by American and Iraqi soldiers to rid the area of militants. A suicide bomber attacked an Iraqi Army checkpoint in the neighborhood, killing two people and wounding 14, according to an Iraqi official, who said it was unclear how many casualties were soldiers.

There were 27 bodies recovered on the streets of the city, most showing signs of torture. The American military announced the death of a marine in fighting in the Sunni Arab Anbar Province.

The animal market was empty and sad. The police had sealed off the area, and the fire department had washed the blood from the streets.

The sidewalk was charred black and the splintered cages in the shops down the narrow alleyways sat empty. For this day, at least, the tumult of the bazaar had been quieted, its life drained away.

Pet Market Bomb Kills 15 Persons (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A bomb hidden in a box of pigeons exploded yesterday as shoppers gathered around, tearing through a busy pet and livestock market and littering the blood-soaked pavement with human remains and animal carcasses.

Nationwide, at least 62 persons, including a U.S. Marine, were killed or found dead.

The attack occurred while House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, both vocal war critics, were in Iraq on a surprise visit.

After meeting Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki, Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, said they hoped their trip would "convey to our troops the appreciation of the American people for what they're doing, to applaud their patriotism."

The attack at the animal market shattered the calm as Baghdad residents strolled past stalls where sellers were peddling birds, dogs, cats, sheep, goats and exotic animals such as snakes and monkeys.

DOJ_NMG_0123837

No one claimed responsibility for the bombing, which police and hospital officials said killed 15 persons and wounded 66. Suspicion fell on Sunni insurgents because the market sits near a predominantly Shi'ite neighborhood on the east bank of the Tigris River that divides Baghdad.

It was the latest in a series of attacks on busy commercial targets in the capital as insurgents apparently sought to maximize bloodshed ahead of a U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown.

The explosion struck the Souq al-Ghazl at about 10 a.m., one of the busiest times for the animal vendors and an hour before the start of a four-hour vehicle ban that is imposed every Friday to prevent car bombs from striking mosques during weekly Islamic prayers.

The bomb detonated in the part of the market that specializes in birds; other areas are reserved for fish, dogs or other animals.

The bomber arrived with an egg carton containing pigeons for sale, but it exploded after he walked away to get a drink, striking potential buyers gathered around the box, according to police and witnesses.

Attacks elsewhere left at least 46 persons dead, including 38 bullet-riddled bodies found mostly in Baghdad. The body of a Shi'ite boxer who had been kidnapped days ago also was found in central Baghdad, with wounds on his neck indicating he had been hanged, police said.

A Marine was killed in fighting in the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, west of Baghdad, the military said, raising the number of U.S. service members who have died since the war began to at least 3,070, according to an Associated Press count.

Happy Scene In Baghdad Turns Grim As Blast Upends Animal Market (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Zeena Kareem

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — The police officer warned them to spread out. Now was not the time to cluster around one another so closely. But he didn't press too hard before he moved along. In this time of war and misery, police officer Sabah Shayal admitted, it heartened him to see so many people gathering on a gleaming Friday morning for one of the capital's most celebrated treats, the Ghazel pet and livestock flea market.

Winter's cool glazed the sunshine. In bags, boxes and carts, poor young men brought the pigeons, parakeets, dogs, cats, tropical fish, scorpions, monkeys and snakes to sell to families shopping for pets. In pickup trucks, they brought top-grade roosters, goats and sheep they raised in the yards of their homes in the Sadr City district to sell to farmers. Parents brought their children to delight in the festival of creatures.

"I told them groups and large gatherings are targeted," Shayal said. "They told me, 'Don't worry. We're selling pets. No one will target us.' "

Two hours later, after a bomb or two hidden in a box ripped through the market, killing 15 people and wounding 51, Shayal returned to survey the grotesque scene. The bodies were piled on the carcasses of dead animals.

"The birds were roasted," he said. "There were piles of flesh."

Shayal and other officers tried to keep the bystanders away from the victims until ambulances arrived. Bomb victims often suffer internal injuries, and people trying to help by dragging them into taxicabs to speed them to the hospital often wind up killing them, he said. "I tried to keep them away," he said.

"They kept coming closer."

An official at Baghdad's Kindi Hospital said most of those killed were younger than 25. Ball bearings packed into the explosive device magnified the carnage and damage. One of the dead was a boy of 10.

Many of those injured lost years of hard work raising the animals.

"We sell special pigeons that we raise ourselves," said Fuad Ahmed, a 16-year-old who suffered shrapnel wounds to his head and shoulder. "We sell a pair for about $50. They all flew away in the explosion."

As usual, the attack carried sectarian overtones. Most of Ghazel's vendors are poor young Shiite Muslim men from eastern Baghdad.

Witnesses described members of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's militia helping secure the bomb scene. "They kept the way clear for the ambulances," said Falah Mehdi, a 35-year-old animal lover who visits the market every other week. "They pushed the people away fearing that another explosion would take place."

Police cleared the scene of debris and bloody remains.

Shayal had begun to leave when he saw something that astounded him.

"The funny thing is, that after some minutes, things went back to normal," he said. "The kids of 13 or 14 years old started to bring their boxes and begin setting up their stalls and selling their animals."

Sheiks Help Curb Violence In Iraq's West, U.S. Says (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

RAMADI, Iraq -- Before tribal sheiks aligned themselves with U.S. forces in the violent deserts of western Iraq, the number of people willing to become police officers in the city of Ramadi -- the epicenter of the fight against the insurgent group known as al-Qaeda in Iraq -- might not have filled a single police pickup.

"Last March was zero," said Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, the Marine commander in western Iraq, referring to the number of men recruited that month.

With the help of a confederation of about 50 Sunni Muslim tribal sheiks, the U.S. military recruited more than 800 police officers in December and is on track to do the same this month. Officers credit the sheiks' cooperation for the diminishing violence in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province.

"I don't want to paint too rosy a picture, but if you compare this to what it was seven or eight months ago, there is not a place in this city that al-Qaeda controls," said Lt. Col. James Lechner, deputy commander of the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, in Ramadi.

But some Iraqi politicians and Anbar residents who oppose the U.S. presence describe the confederation, known as the Awakening, as a divisive group that pits tribes against each other, uses police officers as armed guards to protect tribal territory, and harnesses American support to consolidate its power.

Fasal al-Gaood, a tribal sheik and former Anbar governor who was seen as an ally of the Americans during his term in office, said the group has been given more authority than it deserves. Gaood, who has survived several assassination attempts, said he was worried that insurgent infiltrators might lurk inside the rapidly growing police force.

"Many of those sheiks are actually following two tracks," he said, speaking from his current home in Jordan. "On the one hand, they say, 'We support the council.' But they're not playing a direct role in it, because at the same time they also have connections with other organizations that are outside the law."

Lechner conceded that "insurgent infiltration is undoubtedly an issue" but said in an e-mail that the U.S. military relies on a computer database to check whether recruits have a history of known insurgent activity. They are also "vetted and vouched for by family members and tribal leaders," he said.

Saleh al-Mutlak, parliamentary leader of the secular Sunni party known as the Iraqi National Dialogue Front, described the confederation of Sunni sheiks as a "very dangerous movement" that is assuming official powers in the absence of a functioning government. "They wanted political cover from our front, but we said no," he said. "We don't mind that they fight al-Qaeda, but any movement should be official, and not tribal, because it will only divide the tribes."

To some degree, the U.S. cooperation with the tribal sheiks is a relationship of last resort. The fighting in Anbar has been among the fiercest in the country since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Of the more than 3,000 U.S. service members killed in Iraq, 875 died in the province, roughly the size of North Carolina. Dozens of schools and hospitals are closed, and basic services such as electricity and telephones are woefully inadequate. The Americans live at Camp Ramadi amid a desolate expanse of mud: Smoke rises from the burn pit, and crows perch on trash and twisted metal along dirt roads.

This month, the confederation and U.S. officials held what they called the first Ramadi reconstruction conference in the compound of the leader of the Awakening, Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi. The American soldiers parked their Humvees in a gravel lot near some camels and a flock of sheep and left their combat boots on the porch as a sign of respect for the sheiks.

Inside a marble-clad conference hall, Zilmer, the Marine commander, surveyed a carpeted room filled with dozens of men in black-and-gold robes, checkered headdresses and pinstriped suits and pronounced them a "very, very impressive collection of the leadership of Ramadi and al-Anbar province." As if to underscore the local antagonism toward the sheiks, a missile crashed outside the wall of the compound, briefly interrupting Sattar's speech.

The military says it has found a welcome ally in the tribal sheiks. U.S. commanders trace the formation of the Awakening to Aug. 21 last year, when Abu Ali Jassim, a sheik who had encouraged his kinsmen to join the provincial security forces, was killed by members of al-Qaeda in Iraq. Instead of turning over the body to be buried, al-Qaeda hid it in a field, violating Islamic tenets calling for a swift burial, said Maj. Thomas A. Shoffner, operations officer for the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division.

"As soon as they did that, the local tribesmen absolutely turned on al-Qaeda," he said.

Military commanders say the newly determined sheiks encouraged kinsmen to join the police force in part because of a U.S. decision to allow the recruits to patrol their home territories.

Between July and December, the number of roadside bombings and incidents involving indirect fire, such as mortar attacks, dropped by about 50 percent in Ramadi, according to the U.S. military. Many al-Qaeda fighters lived in the suburbs of Ramadi and attacked in the city. But "the sheiks have sent their men out there and secured that," Lechner said.

DOJ_NMG_0123839

In some ways, the confederation is also a last resort for the sheiks, some of whom say they have not received adequate protection or services from the Shiite Muslim-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Baghdad.

"Since the occupation in 2003 and up until now, we have received no help from the government to save Ramadi from the insurgents," said Mahmood al-Jarbou, whose tribe is part of the confederation. "Many of our tribesmen were killed, especially those who were willing to volunteer for army or police service. Because of that, we found it was necessary to form this council."

Maliki's aides say he supports the tribal organization, meets with its leaders and supports efforts to form a similar organization in Diyala province, another insurgent stronghold. An official in Maliki's government played down concerns about the confederation. "Obviously some people see this as a threat, but when compared to other threats, this is a rather benign one," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of government protocol.

Mahmood Farhan, sheik of Ramadi's large Albu Chlaib tribe, opposes the confederation. Its members "are creating their own militias to control the province," he said, adding: "Up until now, they have not created anything good for the city. They are only protecting their own areas and protecting the occupiers." Farhan supports attacks against American troops.

More than one observer questioned the motives of the Awakening's leader, Sattar of the Albu Risha tribe, a man reputed to have amassed a fortune as part of a criminal network that robbed travelers on the desert highways of Anbar. The Awakening's members "are a group of gangsters," said Hussein al-Maadhidi, a journalist who lives in Haditha.

An adviser to Sattar, Hikmet Sulaiman, denied that Sattar had been a highway bandit, saying, "He comes from a rich family, and he made himself . . . a quite good business in Iraq, Jordan and Dubai." Sulaiman did not answer an e-mail asking what the business was, but he said that Sattar has paid about $600,000 of his own money into the Awakening and that "thousands are now following him with their lives" because of his strong reputation.

The U.S. military's reliance on the tribal sheiks recalls the British occupation of Iraq in the early 20th century. The British courted the sheiks with funding and made them responsible for ensuring order and collecting revenue, historian Phebe Marr wrote in "The Modern History of Iraq."

"The policy was efficient and economical, reducing the need for highly paid British staff in the countryside, but ultimately it strengthened the hold of the sheiks over their tribesmen and their land," Marr wrote. The policy came to be regarded as "certainly one of the most lasting and problematic legacies" of British rule.

Gaood, once involved with the Awakening, said the movement is not the solution to Ramadi's problems. "If we try to rely on strictly tribal forces and tribal figures, this would be like taking Iraq back to the days of the Middle Ages," he said.

One Iraqi political scientist in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said he saw the confederation as an example of the widespread push in Iraq for greater regional control in areas such as the Shiite south and the Kurdish north, catalyzed by a weakened central government.

But aligning with the Americans can be dangerous in the heartland of the Sunni insurgency. As Lechner put it: "They've come out of the closet, so to speak. There's no going back now."

Abu Ghraib Officer Faces Court-Martial (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

HAGERSTOWN, Md., Jan. 26 -- The only U.S. military officer charged with a crime in the Abu Ghraib scandal will be court-martialed on eight charges, including cruelty and maltreatment of prisoners, the Army said Friday.

Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, a 50-year-old reservist from Virginia who ran the interrogation center at the Iraqi prison, was accused of failing to exert his authority as the place descended into chaos, with prisoners stripped naked, photographed in humiliating poses and intimidated by snarling dogs. He was also charged with lying to investigators.

Jordan has not been accused of personally torturing or humiliating prisoners and was not pictured in any of the photos that embarrassed the Pentagon and shocked the world.

Maj. Gen. Guy C. Swann, commander of the Military District of Washington, decided that Jordan must stand trial, said Col. Jim Yonts, an Army spokesman.

Jordan was charged in April with 12 offenses. Swann dismissed four charges after Jordan was given an Article 32 hearing, the military equivalent of a civilian preliminary hearing, in October.

Besides cruelty and maltreatment, the charges include disobeying a superior officer, willful dereliction of duty and making false statements. The charges carry a total maximum prison term of 22 years.

Jordan's military lawyers did not immediately return phone calls.

At his October hearing, Jordan said he had no operational control over interrogations and spent much of his time trying to improve the deplorable living conditions of soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0123840

The government alleges that Jordan's actions or inaction subjected detainees to forced nudity and intimidation by dogs. He also is accused of lying to investigators in denying that he saw any abuse.

Eleven other U.S. soldiers -- all from the enlisted ranks -- have been convicted in the Abu Ghraib scandal, with former Cpl. Charles A. Graner Jr. receiving the harshest sentence, a 10-year prison term. A general and other officers have received reprimands or demotions that ended or blighted their careers.

Since he was charged in April, Jordan has been on active duty with the Intelligence and Security Command at Fort Belvoir, Va.

Diverse Voices To Denounce Iraq Troop Plan (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Tens of thousands of demonstrators from across the country are expected to converge in Washington today to urge the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq as President Bush is proposing to send more troops in an effort to stabilize the country.

They plan to rally on the Mall, march around the north side of the Capitol and send a strong message to the government.

The event, which authorities said could draw 100,000 people, starts with a rally at 11 a.m. Among those expected to address the crowd are Jane Fonda, Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon and Jesse Jackson.

The march, organized by the group United for Peace and Justice, is scheduled to start at 1 p.m.

It will proceed eastward toward the Capitol along Constitution Avenue, head south on First Street NE, then make a U-turn and retrace the route before passing the western front of the Capitol and returning to the Mall along Fourth Street SW.

Police and protesters said there will probably be "feeder" marches to the Mall before the rally, from Dupont Circle and McPherson Square. Metro said that its normal Saturday schedule will be in place but that eight-car trains would be put in service if necessary.

U.S. Capitol Police officers said that road closures will go into effect around the Capitol during the march.

The event is expected to draw groups of many stripes. The chart for the assembly site shows sections reserved for veterans and labor, gay and peace organizations, in addition to others dedicated to opposing global warming, nuclear arms and torture and a group called End Israeli Occupation of Palestine. In addition, at least one group is protesting the protest.

Some of the demonstrators began gearing up yesterday.

Amid frigid temperatures and a biting wind, the women-run peace organization CodePink and the group Iraqi Voices for Peace held a rally at noon on the Mall in front of the Capitol.

With songs and speeches, the groups unveiled an installation of several thousand shoes in and around a clear plastic bin, which they said symbolize Iraqi civilians who have died since the war began. The shoes bear tags with names that the protesters said are those of Iraqis killed in the war, along with a few details of their deaths.

"We don't talk enough about the suffering and the pain that the Iraqis are experiencing," Jodie Evans, co-founder of CodePink, said on the Mall yesterday. "We do a lot of talking. But when you visually see a pair of shoes with a tag on it that says, 'So and so, aged 3, died in a bombing in Fallujah,' it becomes very real for you, the cost of this war."

Evans said the shoe installation, which she said the group used during last year's election campaign, was inspired by the display of concentration camp victims' shoes at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. "I remembered how powerfully it affected me," she said.

In Arab culture, shoes can be a sensitive issue, said Aseel Albanna, a District architect, Baghdad native and co-founder of Iraqi Voices for Peace. The improper display of the bottoms of shoes can be impolite, and shoes are traditionally left at the threshold of a house upon entering.

But in this case, she said on the Mall yesterday, symbolism is more important than tradition.

The groups cited a study by Johns Hopkins University last year that estimated that almost 655,000 civilian deaths in Iraq have occurred as a result of the war. President Bush had placed that number at 30,000, and a British-based group research group at about 50,000.

"We were surprised" at the study's findings, said Shannon C. Doocy, a Hopkins research associate who co-authored the study. "I don't think anyone intended the war to have this large of a consequence."

Fifty to 100 members of the Washington chapter of the conservative organization FreeRepublic.com plan to rally near the U.S. Navy Memorial to oppose the march and the participation of Jane Fonda, the chapter said. The actress has long been the object of conservative ire for her support of North Vietnam during the Vietnam War.

"These groups are the ones that are acting as the political arm of the terrorists overseas to help bring about America's defeat in the war on terror," said Kristinn Taylor of FreeRepublic.com.

Active Troops To Protest Iraq War (AJC/AP)

By Larry Margasak, Associated Press

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 27, 2007

A small number of active military troops will take part in today's rally in Washington against the Iraq war, co-founders of an active-duty protest group say.

One of the founders of Appeal for Redress, Navy Petty Officer Jonathan Hutto, said he plans to speak at the protest on the National Mall. Hutto, 29, who is originally from Atlanta, is a sailor aboard the aircraft carrier USS Theodore Roosevelt, currently at Norfolk, Va.

United For Peace and Justice, an anti-war coalition of 1,400 organizations, said the protest could draw tens of thousands of demonstrators in all.

Hutto and Liam Madden, a Marine sergeant who received his discharge Jan. 20, founded Appeal for Redress, an organization of 1,200 active-duty personnel and veterans who favor a U.S. withdrawal from Iraq.

Hutto said 60 percent of the members have taken part in Iraq operations. He said he was aboard the Roosevelt off Iraq from September 2005 through March 2006. Madden said he was in Iraq's Anbar province from September 2004 to February 2005.

Hutto estimated that more than a dozen individuals on active duty would attend today.

Cynthia O. Smith, a Defense Department spokeswoman, said members of the armed forces can speak out, subject to several restrictions.

They must "not do so in uniform, and must make clear that they do not speak on behalf of their military unit, service or the Department of Defense, unless they are authorized to do so," she said.

Madden, whose specialty was setting up communications systems, and Hutto, who was in the carrier's public information office, said they have not been threatened or harassed by their commanders.

Hutto, said active-duty personnel he speaks with "see a separation between the global war on terrorism and the war in Iraq. They don't see the connection."

"When we're sitting having chow, and CNN is saying so many more were killed, the look on people's faces is, 'How much longer?' "

Hutto said more than 200 officers have signed on to his organization.

Police Brace For Anti-war Activists On Capitol Hill (WT)

By Matthew Cella, Daniel Taylor

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

Police are expecting thousands of demonstrators to converge at the U.S. Capitol today for a rally and march protesting the war in Iraq.

Lt. Scott Fear, a U.S. Park Police spokesman, said police will institute rolling road closures as demonstrators march in the area around the Capitol beginning at 1 p.m.

He said a full contingent of officers will be deployed in cruisers, on foot, on horseback and on motorcycles for what is expected to be one of the largest protests since the war began in March 2003.

"We don't expect any problems," Lt. Fear said. "We did meet with the organizers. They all say it's going to be a peaceful event."

National Park Service officials said the umbrella protest group United for Peace and Justice has a permit to set up a stage on the Mall at Third Street Northwest for an 11 a.m. rally. The group claims to represent a coalition of more than 1,300 local and national activist groups.

According to the group's Web site, www.unitedforpeace.org, confirmed speakers include celebrities Susan Sarandon, Tim Robbins, Danny Glover, Jane Fonda and the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

Park service officials issued a permit for a 1 p.m. march from the rally site that will move north along Third Street to Constitution Avenue and proceed halfway around the Capitol. Marchers will turn east on Constitution Avenue past the Capitol to First Street Northeast and turn south past the Supreme Court to East Capitol Street.

Marchers will then turn around and head north on First Street Northeaston the west side of the street, then march west on Constitution Avenue and south on First Street Northwest to the west lawn of the Capitol.

Rally organizers say they hope for a crowd upward of 300,000 people and that weather could be a critical factor in how many people show up. The National Weather Service forecasts a mostly sunny day with temperatures near 50 degrees.

Lt. Fear said officials expect a number of smaller, feeder marches to join the main group on the Mall.

DOJ_NMG_0123842

The group Code Pink is expected to hold a rally at the Navy Memorial, at Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue Northwest at 10 a.m. before meeting up with the main protest group on the Mall. Activists supporting the war have a demonstration planned at the same location later in the day.

Lt. Fear said a group of anarchists is also expected to meet the main rally from Dupont Circle.

Metropolitan Police say they will be supporting Park Police efforts but have not planned any additional road closures or restrictions. Police spokesman Quentin Peterson said there were no plans to activate the department's Joint Operations Command Center or the city's network of downtown surveillance cameras used to monitor big events.

War Opponents Take Aim At Coleman (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON - As demonstrators prepared for an anti-war rally today in Washington, groups opposed to the war in Iraq announced that they're targeting Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., as part of a national campaign to stop the troop increase proposed by President Bush.

Monday, a group of Iraq veterans is scheduled to appear at a St. Paul press conference to pressure Coleman to vote for a resolution that would oppose sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Coleman, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, voted against the resolution on Wednesday. But it passed, and Coleman will vote on it again when it hits the Senate floor.

"This vote makes it painfully clear that Senator Coleman is joining President Bush in ignoring the safety of our troops and the opinions of top military leaders, the Iraq Study Group and the American people," said Moira Mack of Americans Against Escalation in Iraq.

Anti-war groups plan to target Coleman and eight other Senate Republicans: Richard Lugar of Indiana, George Voinovich of Ohio, Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, Judd Gregg and John Sununu of New Hampshire, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John Warner of Virginia.

Starting in St. Paul, the veterans are planning a two-day, seven-state tour to make the case for the resolution sponsored by Sens. Joe Biden, D-Del., and Chuck Hagel, R-Neb. The veterans are associated with VoteVets.org, a founding partner of Americans Against Escalation in Iraq.

Coleman has been in the national spotlight since Jan. 10, when he announced his opposition to Bush's request. But Coleman has made a distinction between sending more troops to Baghdad and sending them to Anbar Province.

Friday, Coleman spokesman Tom Steward said that Coleman "continues to oppose the troop surge in Baghdad" but that the Biden-Hagel resolution "is overreaching and also expresses opposition to reinforcing troops in the Anbar Province where our troops are winning against a terrorist insurgency."

A New War, And A New Kind Of Generation Gap (PHI)

By Jeff Gammage

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 27, 2007

When David Kalkstein protests the Iraq war at demonstrations in South Jersey, he notices that most of the people around him share his hair color: gray.

Few young people show up.

"We're lucky if we get one or two," he said. "And sometimes we get zero."

As thousands of antiwar activists descend on the National Mall in Washington today, leaders of local peace groups are asking an updated version of a Vietnam War-era question: Where have all the young men gone? And the young women, too?

It's not that they support the war - a national Election Day poll found 62 percent of them opposed. And teenagers and young adults are selfless in community service. Yet at protests, the people carrying signs are often middle-age or retired.

It's the inverse of the 1960s, when U.S. campuses erupted in protest, sometimes in flames, over the war in Southeast Asia.

Kalkstein, 67, an organizer with the South Jersey Campaign for Peace and Justice, has five buses headed to the capital today - and he's thrilled that 25 percent of the travelers will be college-age.

"From my experience," he said, "that's incredible."

Protest leaders say it's impossible to overstate the impact of the draft in mobilizing the earlier antiwar movement.

"We didn't choose to think about Vietnam, it was thrust upon us," said Robert Smith, 56, staff coordinator of the Brandywine Peace Community. "You had to decide. The Vietnam War made a claim on this society and every young man between 18 and 26... . The Iraq war hasn't made the same claim."

DOJ_NMG_0123843

Smith went to jail for refusing to be inducted into the Army, a decision taken when he heard the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. speak in 1967, he said. Friends faced similar crossroads, their choices altering their lives.

Today's young adults, Smith said, have a different idea of "sacrifice, commitment, and even the value of activism."

It's not that no young people take part in the movement. Students at the University of Pennsylvania, among other local schools, have organized transportation to today's march. Younger activists at the American Friends Service Committee in Philadelphia are going, too.

Aimee George, 20, a globalization-studies major at Gettysburg College, will march with her campus Peace Club.

It's a challenge to raise student awareness because "not everyone has been directly affected," she said. "Some of my friends have friends who have been deployed, so they feel it more.

"On campus, you're going to get both sides," George said. "Some people say we have to be there, and some people say we have to get out."

Historians point out that America has grown more conservative in the last 40 years, a trend reflected in its youth. In 1970, the census showed, 79 percent of college freshmen cited "developing a meaningful philosophy of life" as a top objective. In 2005, 75 percent said "being very well off financially" was important.

Peter Bredlau, chaplain at Muhlenberg College, said that after the U.S. invasion of Iraq, he helped a student form a campus antiwar group, the Alliance for Progressive Action. But the group fizzled, never able to attract more than six students.

"Being an antiwar protester, or an 'anti-' protester of any kind, just isn't a credential. You can put 'fed the homeless' on your resume," Bredlau said.

Besides, he added, "they might look back on their parents' generation and say, 'What did those protests achieve? We're still having wars.' "

To the iPod generation, standing on street corners and holding banners can seem anachronistic. Its members are more likely to voice political objections on blogs and other Internet venues. On YouTube, where anyone can post a video, there are hundreds of clips that feature antiwar themes or music.

Lovella Calica, a 25-year-old program coodinator with Iraq Veterans Against the War in Philadelphia, said some established peace groups do not resonate with younger people because they insist on "doing the same things they've always been doing."

"Young people aren't into vigils as much. I'm not. I see why people do it, and I think it's very serious and solemn," said Calica, who is going to Washington. "We have a lot of energy. We want to do things differently sometimes."

Some of her peers organize Internet "sit-ins," where a gang of friends simultaneously logs onto a conservative chatroom. "You can take that room over," Calica said. "You can use it as a soapbox."

Today's high school and college students are concerned about poverty, AIDS, global warming and famine in Darfur. Some trade vacations for volunteer missions overseas.

"Even if they're not out protesting the war, they're doing something," said Karen Porter, 59, founder of the Chester County Peace Movement.

Her group is mostly older people, some of the hardest workers being retired doctors and professors. Antiwar activity can be controversial, she noted, and young people are savvy enough to understand the implications.

"You've got to pick and choose which university, and later which employer, you want to tell," she said.

Porter, who recently joined the Gray Panthers, recalls being tear-gassed while demonstrating against the 1970 invasion of Cambodia. But college freshmen born in 1988 are too young to remember Ronald Reagan, let alone the '60s. In fact, a few years ago, several West Chester University students came seeking her advice.

"They literally said, 'We want to have a demonstration on campus. How do we do it?' " Porter said. "It was very sweet."

Smith, of the Brandywine group, has had similar experiences. The 30-year veteran of peace work was frustrated, after the Iraq war began, to be approached by young people who asked, "Are there peace groups around here?"

There are, he answered. And he encouraged them to join.

"A movement can only continue as far as there are young people," he said. "It's their future. They're going to have to make some choices."

Fonda Role Again Draws Heat (BOS)

By Bryan Bender

The Boston Globe, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Actress and long time peace activist Jane Fonda, a favorite target of right-wing attacks since the 1970s for her high-profile opposition to the Vietnam War, will rejoin the ranks of the antiwar movement today at a major rally in Washington .

DOJ_NMG_0123844

The return to the spotlight for the Hollywood star derisively known as "Hanoi Jane" for going to North Vietnam at the height of the war, was seen by some activists and chroniclers of the antiwar movement as politically risky. They said her presence could be distracting in a rally that organizers hope can capitalize on congressional opposition to President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

"I wonder if the appearance of someone like Jane Fonda is going to pull attention away from other messages," said Rhys Williams, a University of Cincinnati sociologist who has chronicled American anti war movements. "If I were an organizer, I would worry how much her presence is going to be dominating the news cycle."

Though it's been decades since she posed atop a North Vietnamese anti aircraft gun, many Vietnam veterans are still angry . Fonda later apologized -- but didn't say she was sorry for fervently opposing the Vietnam War.

Her acting career survived, and Fonda left Hollywood nearly two decades ago. Though she's on record against the Iraq war, she's stayed on the sidelines of the anti war movement -- perhaps because of lingering public resentment over her highly charged propaganda visit to Hanoi.

That two-week trip in 1972 included a government-staged news conference with American POWs and a radio broadcast in which she declared the United States "will never be able to break the spirit of these people." Outraged, many Americans accused her of treason, and some fellow anti war activists said Fonda went too far.

In 1988, she apologized to veterans and their families. "I was trying to help end the killing and the war," she said on ABC's "20/20" news show , "but there were times when I was thoughtless and careless about it and I'm . . . very sorry that I hurt them."

Fonda will join a speaker's roster today that includes fellow Vietnam War-era protesters, grass-roots activists, and movie stars such as Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon, and Tim Robbins.

Fonda declined to be interviewed for this story.

At a lecture in Vancouver just weeks after the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, Fonda expressed concern that the war would damage America's "stability as a nation" and could tarnish the country's prestige. "I think the entire world is going to be united against us," she said.

But she hasn't spoken out much since then and decided not to join a cross-country bus trip with Iraq veterans protesting the war in 2005. In an interview last April on ABC's "Good Morning America," Fonda acknowledged, "I carry too much baggage."

Indeed, as news spread that she'd join this weekend's protest , conservative blogs exploded with vitriol.

"The enemies of this nation are feeling so emboldened that they are confident enough to bring Jane Fonda to a MEMORIAL for the United States Navy," the conservative website Freerepublic.com decried in an "urgent" post. Fonda "posed with our enemy [in North Vietnam] on an anti aircraft battery used to shoot down our Navy pilots."

The resentment isn't limited to political bloggers. A man who said he was a Vietnam veteran wrote an angry letter to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel after Fonda appeared at a local abortion-rights rally earlier this month. "Healing will only begin when Ms. Fonda tells the American people that she was wrong to go to Hanoi, that she was wrong to openly accuse American soldiers of murdering [Vietnamese] babies, and that she was wrong to betray the trust of those [American] POWs," Bart Arcoleo wrote.

For the architects of today's demonstration, which organizers predict could draw more than 100,000 people, the star power of Fonda and other celebrities is a way to draw national attention and hone the anti war message.

Fonda "is a natural bridge" between generations, Judith LeBlanc , co chairwoman of United for Peace and Justice, an umbrella organization of anti war, community, and religious groups . "US foreign policy is on a continuum. We need the support of those who are in Hollywood to speak their minds on the issues of the day. They play a big part in our country."

"She is perfectly entitled to speak, and it won't make a difference one way or another for public opinion," said Tom Hayden , Fonda's former husband, a onetime California state senator, and a co founder of Students for a Democratic Society. Hayden, who will also attend the rally, bristled at the suggestion that Fonda's presence would undercut the protesters' message.

"There is no Jane Fonda factor," said the Rev. Jesse Jackson , a civil rights leader who is also on the list of scheduled speakers today. "That's insulting. This is about soldiers doing three and four tours and thousands killed and wounded."

Still, participants like Keshini Ladduwahetty of the antiwar group DC for Democracy questioned whether giving Fonda a central role will do more harm than good. Ladduwahetty wrote in an e-mail that Fonda doesn't offend her, but "some people do find her a turnoff."

Meanwhile, Liam Madden of Boston, a Marine who served in Iraq in 2004 and is a co founder of the antiwar group Appeal for Redress, said Fonda's public support is a mixed blessing: She "brings attention, but in some people's eyes it lessens credibility."

Yet the political conditions surrounding the Iraq war are far different than during the Vietnam War, when it took much longer for public opinion to turn against the war , according to David Walls , an author and retired sociology professor at Sonoma State University .

DOJ_NMG_0123845

"The climate has changed a lot in the last year with the congressional elections," Walls said. "Compared to the others from the far wings of left-wing politics, Fonda is a much more recognizable person and frankly a lot closer to the mainstream."

Tree Memorial To Dead Troops Becoming Forest (AP)

AP, January 26, 2007

FORT STEWART, Georgia (AP) -- The sergeant major calls the name, Staff Sgt. John L. Hartman Jr., as it's unveiled on a granite marker at the root of a new eastern redbud tree on Warriors Walk -- where hundreds of these living memorials have been planted to honor the wartime dead.

Hartman volunteered for a third tour in Iraq last year so an Army buddy could stay home with his newborn son. He was killed November 30 when a bomb blast tore into his Humvee.

Last week, Hartman became the 318th soldier memorialized at Warriors Walk, a grove of eastern redbuds started with 34 trees in April 2003.

Fort Stewart has planted a tree here for every member of the 3rd Infantry Division to die in the war, as well as for soldiers from other Army posts killed while serving with the division.

Jeff Fornshell, the post's ceremonies coordinator, said he wonders how many trees he'll have to plant this year. Expanded twice since its inception, Warriors Walk has room for only 72 more trees.

"Is 72 going to be enough? I hope it is," Fornshell said. "I hope we don't put any more out here. You're all the time thinking you don't want to have a new tree dedication."

Earlier this month, the 3rd Infantry began deploying its 19,000 troops for a third tour in Iraq. Hartman went separately from the division last year as an instructor training Iraqi security forces.

At least 3,058 troops have died in Iraq. Seven civilian contractors of the Defense Department also have been killed in the war. More than 10 percent are represented at Warriors Walk, which exhibits the war's cost in a way that's staggering in scale yet also intensely personal.

The trees already line both sides of two paved walkways flanking Fort Stewart's parade grounds, stretching nearly the length of three football fields. A third walkway had to be poured last year to start a new row.

Fornshell said he never expected Warriors Walk would grow so much when the first tree was planted. The 3rd Infantry lost 42 soldiers during the invasion to topple Saddam Hussein's regime. Trees honoring those soldiers were planted in single-file rows, about 13 feet apart.

But the division's second tour in 2005, when its troops faced shadowy insurgents rather than a stand-up army, proved more costly. The 3rd Infantry suffered 105 deaths, not counting those among supporting units. A second walkway of memorial redbuds had to be started.

The expansion encroached slightly on the Army post's golf course. The tree for Staff Sgt. Jens E. Schelbert was planted less than a foot from the greener grass of the teeing area for the No. 5 hole.

Birgit Smith of Holiday, Florida, has watched Warriors Walk grow during visits four times a year since her husband, Sgt. 1st Class Paul R. Smith, was killed April 4, 2003. Credited with saving dozens of American lives by holding off Iraqi forces with a machine gun before he was killed at the Baghdad airport, Smith was awarded the Medal of Honor in 2005.

"When I first returned to Fort Stewart to visit the tree, the walk seemed so far to get to Paul's tree," Smith said. "And now it seems so short because there are so many more trees."

Smith said she likes to leave a single red rose when visiting her husband's tree. At the foot of the other living memorials lie dozens of mementos -- toy soldiers, angel figurines, wind chimes, whiskey bottles, garden gnomes and laminated photos that personalize each.

Two unopened bottles of Corona Extra beer stand next to the tree dedicated to Spc. Joseph A. Lucas. Nearby, someone placed five golf balls at the tree for Staff Sgt. Chad M. Mercer. A Hawaiian lei circles the granite tree marker for Spc. Derence W. Jack.

As curator of the Fort Stewart Museum, Walter Meeks III has collected more than 400 such mementos from Warriors Walk since the war began. Some are displayed at the museum, while most are in storage.

"It's a sobering duty," Meeks said. "It's a beautiful monument, but it represents a great deal of grief and loss for the community. It's definitely not a walk in the park."

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, commander of the 3rd Infantry, knelt and touched his fingers to Hartman's granite stone after its unveiling ceremony, where Lynch praised the 39-year-old for his service.

"We routinely come to this hallowed place to remember our fallen comrades," Lynch said. "And it strengthens our resolve to continue as a nation, in their memory, to fight this global war on terrorism."

Rice Presses Allies To Boost Afghan Aid (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 26 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, citing the $10.6 billion in new aid that the Bush administration proposes to give Afghanistan, pressed NATO and European allies Friday to increase their contributions of money and manpower.

Rice's push came as concern grows over the resurgence of the Taliban in southern Afghanistan, massive increases in opium production and rising tension between Afghanistan and neighboring Pakistan, where Taliban leaders and fighters have been allowed refuge.

"Nations that have made pledges of support should follow through and deliver," Rice told a meeting of NATO foreign ministers here. They had assembled at her request to address what the United States calls an urgent need to bolster the Afghan government's security and development efforts before the Taliban begins even more intensive attacks in the spring, when snows melt and mountainous border areas become more passable.

Her appeals elicited nearly universal agreement on the need for more aid, but no country made a large new offer.

NATO officials cast the meeting's outcome as positive. "We have more nations stepping up to the plate," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said after the ministers' meeting, which also drew officials from the European Union and World Bank. He gave no specific examples.

A NATO official said that Denmark and Lithuania have offered a small number of additional personnel and that the alliance hopes to receive more commitments in two weeks, when its defense ministers meet in Seville, Spain.

NATO authorities said the 33,250 NATO troops in Afghanistan represent about 85 percent of what military commanders say they need. The United States has contributed 12,000 troops to the NATO mission and has another 12,000 personnel operating in the country under independent U.S. command. The United States has said it will keep 3,200 of its troops in Afghanistan for an extra four months to provide reinforcements through the spring.

Some European ministers grumbled to reporters afterward that their countries are already making significant contributions and are overstretched by military commitments around the world. Those ministers said additional money and troops should come from countries now making few or no contributions.

Although 37 nations are providing troops, only seven provide more than 1,000, and some of those prohibit their forces from serving in the most dangerous southern provinces, where the most assistance is needed to fend off the Taliban.

France and Spain, two other major contributors, said they have no more reinforcements to offer. The German Parliament is currently engaged in a heated debate over whether to deploy six Tornado reconnaissance planes to the southern areas.

Rice defended U.S. and NATO operations in Afghanistan, saying, "The violence we are seeing is not evidence that our strategy has failed, nor that the situation will improve in our absence." She added, "It is evidence of how much we are needed."

The appeal for more assistance for the struggling government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai comes as the Bush administration is pressuring Congress for more troops and money for the war in Iraq and foreign governments are trying to raise funds to help rebuild Lebanon after the war between Hezbollah and Israel last summer.

Rice said the Bush administration will ask Congress for $8.6 billion in new funding to equip and train Afghan police and army units and an additional $2 billion for reconstruction, with the money to be parceled out over two years. If approved, the aid would represent a significant increase in U.S. funding to Afghanistan. In the five years since U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban government, the United States has provided $14.2 billion to Afghanistan in security and development aid.

In addition to pressing allies to offer more money and troops for Afghanistan, a senior U.S. official said, Washington views its new proposal as "a chance to show we're not leaving, and Iraq is not sucking up all the resources and the oxygen."

Rice Asks Allies To Increase Afghan Aid (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 27, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice asked allies Friday to intensify their efforts to keep the Taliban from retaking parts of Afghanistan, and asserted a resurgence in Taliban attacks does not mean the U.S. war strategy has failed.

Rice made her appeal a day after the Bush administration said it would ask Congress for $10.6 billion to help the embattled Afghan government. The U.S. hopes its hefty increase will serve as an incentive for other countries to boost their contributions.

Taliban forces, emboldened and rearmed, launched fierce attacks across the country beginning last spring, leading to Afghanistan's bloodiest year since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion. Crop production for illegal drugs also hit a new high in 2006, and relations worsened between Afghanistan and Pakistan, a key U.S. ally in the fight against global terrorism.

"The violence we are seeing is not evidence that our strategy has failed, nor that the situation will improve in our absence," Rice said in a written statement to NATO foreign ministers who gathered to plan for an expected Taliban military offensive in the spring. "It is evidence of how much we are needed."

Separately, the top U.S. general in Afghanistan told a Pentagon news conference that the spike in violence in Afghanistan has occurred largely because an international force has taken the offensive, not because of any Taliban initiative.

The Bush administration wants NATO allies to increase money, troops and other support for the unsteady democracy in Afghanistan. It is also working to dispel European suspicion that the United States is too busy in Iraq to pay attention to the older Afghan fight.

"Every one of us must take a hard look at what more we can do to help the Afghan people, and to support one another," Rice said.

Casualties in Afghanistan have risen sharply in recent months as the Taliban have widened military operations and suicide attacks. Some 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence in Afghanistan last year, according to numbers from Afghan, U.S. and NATO officials.

Many allies have urged the Bush administration to keep focused on Afghanistan, and some have worried that President Bush's plan for a 21,500-troop increase in Iraq will starve the Afghan mission.

Critics in Europe and elsewhere suggested that last year's show of Taliban strength was proof that the U.S. focus wavered. The offensive caught U.S. and other commanders off guard, but the Taliban have not been able to extend their military success to renewed political power.

Speaking to Pentagon reporters from Bagram, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, the senior U.S. military commander in Afghanistan, said U.S. and NATO-controlled forces are meeting more resistance partly because they're expanding operations farther into remote areas of the country to rout out insurgents.

Freakley also took issue with reports that a resurgent Taliban is on the offensive.

"It is the U.S. forces and the International Security Assistance Forces that have been on the offensive ... finding the enemy, separating enemy leaders from the population and giving reconstruction opportunities, job opportunities and extending the government of Afghanistan," he said by videoconference

"The Taliban have not achieved any of their objectives in the last year," he said, adding they failed in their attempts to retake their former stronghold, the southern city of Kandahar, and failed in their goal to topple the government of President Hamid Karzai.

Rice convened Friday's session to plan for another expected Taliban military offensive in the spring.

"If there is to be a 'spring offensive,' it must be our offensive," Rice told the group. NATO's top commander pledged on Friday to launch such an offensive against resurgent Taliban forces in the south and east of Afghanistan.

"Springtime in Afghanistan: Historically we've seen increased activity" from Taliban fighters, Gen. John Craddock told reporters at a news conference discussing NATO's International Security Assistance Force, or ISAF, in Afghanistan.

Among other issues Rice raised were the divisions within the alliance on sharing the burden in Afghanistan. Troop commitments have lagged behind U.S. expectations, partly due to doubts in some European capitals about the depth of U.S. commitment, diplomats said.

The NATO-led force is about 20 percent short of the troops levels pledged by its contributing nations.

There are about 24,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the war began in October 2001. About half are under the control of NATO, which is gradually gaining more control over operations there.

The United States is by far the largest contributor to the 34,460-member NATO force in Afghanistan, with 11,800 troops. Britain is next with 5,200.

In an interview, Afghanistan's foreign minister said NATO and Afghan government forces could halt Taliban attacks if they received "constructive participation" from Pakistan. The two neighbors have been at odds for months over their efforts to crack down on terrorists crossing the border into Afghanistan.

"My appeal to our brothers in Pakistan is to stop interfering ... to stop these powerful sectors which use terrorism as an instrument of foreign policy," said Afghan Foreign Minister Rangeen Dadfar Spanta.

He praised the U.S. aid proposal and said he was not disappointed that European offers were lower, adding, "The contribution of the Europeans is increasing."

Associated Press writer Pauline Jelinek contributed to this report from Washington.

NATO Allies Wary Of Sending More Troops To Afghanistan (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123848

BRUSSELS, Jan. 26 — America's European allies on Friday remained noncommittal about sending additional troops to Afghanistan, even as the Bush administration sought to inject new energy into the NATO mission against the Taliban by offering more American soldiers and money.

Officially, the language at a NATO meeting here on Friday reflected resolve and commitment toward Afghanistan. NATO "is stepping up its game in Afghanistan on all fronts," said Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, the alliance's secretary general. "The fact that you saw so many people from the international community sitting around the table is a strong message itself."

But beyond the sound bites, the realities that have troubled the NATO mission in Afghanistan since the 26-member trans-Atlantic alliance took command last year remained on display. France and Germany continued to limit their combat role; both countries have refused to deploy troops in the south of the country, where Taliban forces are strongest. Germany's Parliament has yet to approve a proposal to send six Tornado reconnaissance jets to the south.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Romano Prodi of Italy is battling allies in his own government who oppose the Afghan mission and want the government to set a deadline for withdrawing the country's 1,800 troops. While Mr. Prodi's government passed a measure on Friday to renew financing for Italy's troops in Afghanistan, it did so without the support of all of Mr. Prodi's coalition partners, and Italian officials said it was unlikely that Mr. Prodi could rally support for any increase in troops.

The United States sought to lead by example, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who called for the Brussels meeting in the hope of spurring more action from the Europeans, told the assembled ministers that President Bush would ask Congress for $10.6 billion in additional financial assistance for Afghanistan.

Bush administration officials said on Thursday that the Pentagon would extend the Afghan tours of 3,200 American soldiers. Ms. Rice added that beyond the extension of the tours, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates would further expand the number of American troops, "partly through extra forces."

"Every one of us must take a hard look at what more we can do to help the Afghan people," Ms. Rice said, according to a State Department statement. "We need additional forces on the ground — ready to fight. And we need to provide greater support for the development of Afghan institutions, especially its security forces."

American officials say that Taliban fighters are mounting increasingly brazen cross-border attacks from Pakistan and that they are preparing to resume attacks in the spring, as they have done every year since the American invasion deposed the Taliban in 2001.

"If there is to be a 'spring offensive,' it must be our offensive," she said. "It must be a political campaign, an economic campaign, a diplomatic campaign, and, yes, a military campaign."

But that military campaign remains about 15 percent short of what American and NATO commanders say they need on the ground to fight the Taliban.

The 3,200 American troops whose departure has been delayed would bring the American force level in Afghanistan to around 24,000. About half of those are part of the NATO mission in Afghanistan, while the other half are engaged in American-led counterterrorism operations. About 20,000 soldiers from other NATO countries are also deployed in Afghanistan.

Britain has the second-largest contingent of soldiers in Afghanistan, with 6,000 troops.

NATO said Friday that an alliance airstrike destroyed a Taliban command post in southern Afghanistan, killing a man suspected of being a senior militant leader. Also on Friday, a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the offices of an aid group in Helmand Province, wounding a policeman and two others.

American and NATO officials are now pinning their hopes for troop increases on a meeting of NATO defense ministers in Seville, Spain, next month. Mr. de Hoop Scheffer, the NATO secretary general, said he was "relatively optimistic" that more troops would be forthcoming.

"Everybody understands that it's vital that we achieve our goals this year," said Richard A. Boucher, the assistant secretary of state for South and Central Asian affairs.

Afghan Lawmaker Is Killed

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 26 — An Afghan lawmaker was shot to death on Friday while he was walking from his home to a mosque for Friday Prayer, officials said.

The lawmaker, Maulvi Mohammad Islam Mohammadi, 67, was from the northern province of Samangan. The reason for the killing was unclear, and no one immediately claimed responsibility, but there were fears among legislators that the attack might have been politically motivated.

According to election law, when a member of Parliament dies the candidate who had the next-highest vote tally becomes the successor.

"It is a danger signal for the Afghan members of Parliament if the political competition causes the terror" for lawmakers, said Fawzia Kofi, the deputy speaker of Parliament.

2 Soldiers Reprimanded For Assaults (LAT)

By Kevin Sack

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

The Army announced Friday night that it had given administrative reprimands to two Special Forces soldiers for assaulting detainees held at a base in eastern Afghanistan in 2003 and for failing to report the death of one detainee.

However, the U.S. Army Special Forces Command absolved the soldiers of any wrongdoing in the deaths of two detainees: an 18-year-old Afghan army recruit named Jamal Naseer who died after interrogation at the base in Gardez, and Wakil Mohammed, a woodcutter from the village of Wazi who was shot in the face during a search operation.

The command said in a statement that Army investigators had determined that a Special Forces soldier shot and killed Mohammed in self-defense.

Afghan witnesses dispute that Mohammed posed any threat to the soldier; they said he was pleading, without the help of a translator, not to be shot.

Both deaths were concealed from superiors until they were revealed by The Times beginning in 2004.

The statement from Special Forces Command in Ft. Bragg, N.C., did not name the soldiers who had been disciplined, nor did it provide details about which death led to the disciplinary action for failure to report.

Both detainees died in March 2003 while in the custody of a team of soldiers from the 20th Special Forces Group of the Alabama National Guard.

The team was led by Chief Warrant Officer Kenneth C. Waller, who continues to work full time for the 20th Group headquarters and is currently serving in East Africa.

Numerous Afghans who saw Naseer's body just before and after he died at the Gardez firebase described it as horribly bruised and swollen, showing signs of severe beatings and blunt trauma. But the Special Forces statement said that "all other allegations, to include voluntary manslaughter and aggravated assault of detainee Jamal Naseer, were found to be unsubstantiated."

A number of other Afghans taken prisoner by the same Special Forces unit reported that they were kicked, punched and forced to maintain stress positions. Some of those allegations were supported by doctors who examined the detainees after they were moved from the Special Forces compound.

A lengthy investigation by the Army's Criminal Investigation Command, which concluded two weeks ago, found probable cause to believe that the two soldiers had committed assault. The statement released Friday characterized the offense as "slapping detainees."

The two soldiers each received a "General Officer Memorandum of Reprimand" — an administrative punishment delivered without a criminal hearing. One Special Forces officer, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss internal military matters, described that penalty as "a high-level slap on the wrist" that typically prevents an officer from advancing up the ranks.

"It's an indication that they didn't think it warranted a court-martial or even nonjudicial punishment," said Hy Rothstein, a professor at the Naval Post Graduate School.

Maj. James O. Gregory, a spokesman for Special Forces Command, said the command "takes all allegations of abuse seriously, ensuring that they are thoroughly investigated and appropriate action is taken."

Afghan Lawmaker Is Gunned Down In Kabul (LAT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — An Afghan lawmaker who oversaw the destruction of two massive 1,500-year-old Buddha statues in March 2001 was gunned down here on his way to Friday prayers, police said.

Mawlawi Mohammed Islam Mohammedi was the former Taliban regime's governor of Bamian province when the 5th century Buddha statues carved from the living rock were blasted with dynamite and artillery.

A gunman dressed as a construction worker shot and killed Mohammedi and wounded one of his two bodyguards with an AK-47 assault rifle before fleeing, said Zulmai Khan, Kabul's deputy police chief. The attacker's motive was unknown.

Mohammedi was elected in 2005 to represent the northern province of Samangan in Afghanistan's parliament. He had said he could not be held responsible for the destruction of the world-famous landmarks, which the Taliban said it considered idolatrous and anti-Muslim.

The slaying came a day after a NATO airstrike destroyed a Taliban command post in southern Helmand province. The alliance said a senior militant leader was killed but did not identify him.

NATO's commander in Afghanistan said Friday that a battalion of U.S. troops would be sent to the insurgency-plagued south. Gen. David Richards said a battalion with the 10th Mountain Division would be dispatched to Kandahar to serve as a reserve force. A battalion can include as many as 1,200 troops.

Also on Friday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice asked allies to intensify their efforts to keep the Taliban from retaking parts of Afghanistan.

Rice, in Brussels, made her appeal a day after the Bush administration said it would ask Congress for $10.6 billion to help the Afghan government.

The administration wants North Atlantic Treaty Organization allies to increase contributions of money, troops and other support for the unsteady democracy in Afghanistan. It also is working to dispel European suspicion that the United States is too busy in Iraq to pay attention to the Afghan fight.

Halliburton 4Q Profit Declines 40 Pct (AP)

By John Porretto

AP, January 26, 2007

Oil industry services provider Halliburton Co. was upbeat Friday despite a 40 percent decline in fourth-quarter profit, citing heavy demand for its oilfield equipment and personnel and predicting more of the same for 2007.

Earnings fell to $658 million, or 64 cents per share, compared with $1.1 billion, or $1.04 per share, during the same period a year ago. But the prior-year results included $540 million of income, or 51 cents per share, that came from a tax benefit.

Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial were looking for earnings of 61 cents per share.

In a conference call with analysts, Halliburton Chairman and Chief Executive Dave Lesar offered a positive outlook for this year, saying customers have indicated strong demand for oil-field services despite sliding natural gas prices.

Some industry analysts were concerned by the potential for a slowdown in North American natural gas drilling in the first part of 2007. A relatively mild winter so far has weakened demand for natural gas as a heating source, which analysts say could lead to bloated inventories.

"If U.S. gas producers begin to cut back on their drilling budgets, the service companies will feel the impact almost immediately," Bear Stearns analyst Robin Shoemaker said in a research note this week.

Halliburton's energy services group, its largest division, provides a variety of services to oil and gas companies, including drilling the wells and managing the reservoirs once they're tapped. The energy services group posted record revenue of $3.5 billion in the fourth quarter due to heavy exploration and production.

"We believe any weather-related impact on the price of natural gas will be short-lived and, if the situation occurs, will be self-correcting as activities would slow temporarily, allowing gas inventories to normalize," Lesar said.

A Halliburton competitor, Schlumberger Ltd., also provided an upbeat outlook when it reported 2006 financial results last week, forecasting "high growth" through the end of this decade and into the next. Schlumberger's fourth-quarter profit soared 71 percent to $1.13 billion on revenue of $5.35 billion, the company said.

Halliburton's quarterly revenue rose 8 percent to $6.02 billion from $5.57 billion in the previous year, topping analysts' estimates of $5.9 billion. Gains at the energy services group were partially offset by lower revenue at Halliburton's engineering, construction and government-services arms, known as KBR Inc.

KBR, which Halliburton is spinning off, is the Army's contractor for providing food and shelter to the military in Iraq and Afghanistan _ a distinction that's kept it and Halliburton under Congress' microscope in recent years. Democrats have been critical of the dealings, claiming KBR benefited from ties with Vice President Dick Cheney, who once led Halliburton.

In November, KBR agreed to pay $8 million to settle six-year old claims it overcharged the Army for construction and other support services in the Balkans.

KBR reported revenue of $2.5 billion for the most-recent quarter, down from $2.7 million in the year-ago period _ a decline the company attributed in part to decreased activity on government projects for the U.S. military.

KBR had its initial public offering in November, raising $508 million, the company said. Lesar said he expects the separation of the two companies to be completed in the next three months. Halliburton still owns an 81 percent stake in KBR.

For the year, Halliburton said its net income was $2.3 billion, or $2.23 per share, down from $2.4 billion, or $2.27 a share, in 2005. Still, the 2006 result handily beat the consensus Wall Street estimate of $2.14 a share.

Full-year revenue rose to $22.6 billion from $20.2 billion in 2005.

Lesar said the company's balance sheet had never been stronger, ending 2006 with $4.4 billion in cash, an increase of nearly $2 billion from the start of last year. As such, he said, the company has increased its capital-expenditures budget by 40 percent for 2007. The company will focus that growth in foreign markets such as the Middle East, Africa and Asia, the company said.

DOJ_NMG_0123851

Shares of Halliburton fell 59 cents, or 1.98 percent, to close at $29.15 on the New York Stock Exchange. KBR shares rose 20 cents to finish at $23.45.

Halliburton shares have traded in a 52-week range of $26.33 to $41.99; KBR's comparable trading range is $20.50 to $27.63.

Halliburton's Net Falls 40% On Income-Tax Provision (WSJ)

By Jonathan Vuocolo

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2007

Halliburton Co.'s fourth-quarter net fell 40%, hurt by a provision for income taxes. KBR Inc., which was partially spun off from Halliburton in November, saw net income decline 23%.

Halliburton, the Houston provider of products and services to the petroleum and energy industries, saw net income fall to $658 million, or 64 cents a share, from $1.1 billion, or $1.04 a share, a year earlier. Provision for income taxes was $343 million, while the company realized a $381 million benefit for income taxes a year earlier. Operating income for the quarter rose 36% to $1.04 billion from $766 million.

Revenue rose 8% to $6.02 billion from $5.57 billion, helped by Halliburton's energy-services group but partially offset by lower revenue at KBR, mostly due to decreased activity on government services projects for the U.S. military.

Halliburton, which owns 81% of KBR, expects to complete the separation of KBR from Halliburton within the next three months. KBR was partially spun off in a $17-a-share initial public offering that raised $508 million.

In a Halliburton-KBR joint conference call with analysts, Halliburton Chief Executive David Lesar said a "splitoff" transaction, where investors can trade their Halliburton shares for KBR shares, "has advantages," given the current strength of KBR's stock price. The splitoff would allow Halliburton to buy back stock, an ongoing goal for the company, he said. But he added that "no decision has been made," and that a straight spinoff, in the form of a dividend to shareholders, has its own merits.

Separately, KBR said net income fell to $43 million, or 28 cents a share, from $56 million, or 41 cents a share, a year earlier, hurt by weaker performance in its government and infrastructure business.

Houston-based KBR, an engineering, construction-management and facilities operations company and majority owner of the Devonport Royal Dockyard, said revenue fell 8% to $2.51 billion from $2.72 billion a year earlier. Government and infrastructure revenue fell 14% to $1.82 billion, while energy and chemicals revenue rose 16% to $687 million.

KBR CEO Bill Utt said in the conference call that the company is evaluating "inquiries" to purchase its 51% share in the dockyard. Media reports earlier this month said British defense contractor BAE Systems PLC and U.S. private equity firm Carlyle Group LP may be teaming up to make an offer. Mr. Utt said the company's revenue from operations in Iraq will get a "modest" boost from an increase in U.S. troops, partially reversing several years of decline. But the U.S. Defense Department is changing the way it buys services in a new effort to save money and avoid the type of controversy that has plagued a series of Halliburton troop-support contracts.

The Pentagon is reviewing all of its services contracts worth more than $1 billion. The department also has added new training for its contracting professionals, and it is preparing a series of reports on service purchasing practices across the military services. A new contract should be announced by the end of the first quarter, Mr. Utt said, with three contractors splitting the work.

Among other changes, the Defense Department wants to move away from its past habit of holding a single competition for years of subsequent work. This practice led to serious criticism of battlefield logistics contracts awarded to KBR for troop support in the Balkans and the Middle East.

In November, KBR agreed to pay an $8 million fine to settle allegations it overcharged and double-billed the Army in 1999 and 2000 for work performed in the Balkans.

One NATO Is Not Enough (NYT)

By Joseph Núñez

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

IN international relations, leadership often involves getting allies and friends to do things they have not done but need to do. For example, one challenge facing America is to get more European countries to do heavy lifting in Afghanistan, where British, Canadian, Dutch and American troops are bearing the brunt of battles with Taliban forces. This needs to happen if NATO is to make good on its commitments in Afghanistan, which rightly have wide international support and legitimacy.

But the larger issue stemming from that overstrained mission is that NATO is not enough. Like the one strong horse that carries load after load, NATO is getting tired of having to serve as the proxy both for the United Nations and feeble regional organizations. While I am not, of course, authorized to speak in an official capacity, I have some thoughts, based on personal experience, on how to ease NATO's burden.

The sad truth is that there will be ever more failed states requiring long-term multinational intervention. NATO should not be expected to be everywhere. While it has evolved to handle new missions beyond Europe in the 21st century, it is not a bottomless well of troops.

NATO leaders should be asking this question: What are the other regions of the world prepared to do to handle the next likely conflagrations, be they in Sudan, Fiji, Congo, Somalia, Bolivia, North Korea or Nepal? We must get much more creative about preserving stability at such fault lines. Too many interventions, like the African Union's in Darfur, are done in an ad hoc and episodic manner; little wonder they usually fail.

What we need are more permanent regional security and defense organizations, supported by major powers. It is in the basic national interest of both the local states and the big nations, never mind any high-minded values. While states may have legitimate concerns about things like sovereignty, the alternative to constructive cooperation is the wildfire of anarchy, which spreads beyond borders and burns far too many.

The efforts of powerful Western countries to aid regional organizations' efforts in humanitarian assistance, peacekeeping and nation-building — which increased after the United Nations proved, in situations like Somalia during the early 1990s, to be incapable — have been inconsistent. Many arrogant policymakers continue to argue, in effect, that "superpowers don't do windows." Many major powers continue to focus their military programs on conventional warfare. The problem is that conventional wars these days are few, while failed states are many.

Rather than rely on regional groups to coalesce on their own, the United States and its allies should work to create a minimum of six additional security and defense organizations patterned on NATO — one each for North America, South America, Africa, the Asia-Pacific region, South Asia and the Middle East. Headquarters for these organizations might be, respectively, in Colorado Springs, Brasília, Johannesburg, Beijing, New Delhi and Amman, Jordan. But troops would be trained in all states that joined.

Each of these new alliances would have to be prepared to rapidly deploy at least a brigade-level force — about 6,000 troops with ground, sea and air capacities — anywhere in its sphere of influence. They would also have to have diplomatic and economic teams to move in after the fighting and get the government and markets of the affected country restarted.

Considering the vast scope of each of these six regions, the individual contributions required from the members would be fairly meager, and the richer and more populous states could be expected to supplement the offerings of their less advantaged neighbors.

Each of these new organizations would need at least one big power as a member; this economic and military linchpin would be expected to provide the trained personnel, equipment and money to begin the enterprise. Obviously, the United States would play that role in the North American group; but it and the European and Asian powers might have to take leading roles in some alliances that were geographically distant. This shouldn't be a stumbling block: after all, NATO spans the Atlantic.

Of course, all of these new alliances would need the blessing of the United Nations secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, and their efforts would be coordinated through the organization's Department of Peacekeeping Operations. The secretary general should be expected to welcome the arrangement: it would relieve his organization of its role in centrally planning operations and creating interim forces after conventional combat stops, at which it has floundered repeatedly.

Yes, creating these new alliances will mean that many states will have to change their approach to internal security and defense. But in this age of globalization, countries will have to be as flexible and cooperative on security matters as they have been on trade pacts.

In the end, two facts will drive many states to sign up for regional security organizations: the current system is largely dysfunctional, and joining would give each member greater international standing. For now and for the future, NATO is not enough.

At Ease, Mr. President (NYT)

By Garry Wills

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

WE hear constantly now about "our commander in chief." The word has become a synonym for "president." It is said that we "elect a commander in chief." It is asked whether this or that candidate is "worthy to be our commander in chief."

But the president is not our commander in chief. He certainly is not mine. I am not in the Army.

I first cringed at the misuse in 1973, during the "Saturday Night Massacre" (as it was called). President Richard Nixon, angered at the Watergate inquiry being conducted by the special prosecutor Archibald Cox, dispatched his chief of staff, Al Haig, to arrange for Mr. Cox's firing. Mr. Haig told the attorney general, Elliot Richardson, to dismiss Mr. Cox. Mr. Richardson refused, and resigned. Then Mr. Haig told the second in line at the Justice Department, William Ruckelshaus, to fire Cox. Mr. Ruckelshaus refused, and accepted his dismissal. The third in line, Robert Bork, finally did the deed.

What struck me was what Mr. Haig told Mr. Ruckelshaus, "You know what it means when an order comes down from the commander in chief and a member of his team cannot execute it." This was as great a constitutional faux pas as Mr. Haig's later claim, when President Reagan was wounded, that "Constitutionally ... I'm in control."

President Nixon was not Mr. Ruckelshaus's commander in chief. The president is not the commander in chief of civilians. He is not even commander in chief of National Guard troops unless and until they are federalized. The Constitution is clear on this: "The president shall be commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states, when called into the actual service of the United States."

When Abraham Lincoln took actions based on military considerations, he gave himself the proper title, "commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States." That title is rarely — more like never — heard today. It is just "commander in chief," or even "commander in chief of the United States." This reflects the increasing militarization of our politics. The citizenry at large is now thought of as under military discipline. In wartime, it is true, people submit to the national leadership more than in peacetime. The executive branch takes actions in secret, unaccountable to the electorate, to hide its moves from the enemy and protect national secrets. Constitutional shortcuts are taken "for the duration." But those impositions are removed when normal life returns.

But we have not seen normal life in 66 years. The wartime discipline imposed in 1941 has never been lifted, and "the duration" has become the norm. World War II melded into the cold war, with greater secrecy than ever — more classified information, tougher security clearances. And now the cold war has modulated into the war on terrorism.

There has never been an executive branch more fetishistic about secrecy than the Bush-Cheney one. The secrecy has been used to throw a veil over detentions, "renditions," suspension of the Geneva Conventions and of habeas corpus, torture and warrantless wiretaps. We hear again the refrain so common in the other wars — If you knew what we know, you would see how justified all our actions are.

But we can never know what they know. We do not have sufficient clearance.

When Adm. William Crowe, the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, criticized the gulf war under the first President Bush, Secretary of State James Baker said that the admiral was not qualified to speak on the matter since he no longer had the clearance to read classified reports. If he is not qualified, then no ordinary citizen is. We must simply trust our lords and obey the commander in chief.

The glorification of the president as a war leader is registered in numerous and substantial executive aggrandizements; but it is symbolized in other ways that, while small in themselves, dispose the citizenry to accept those aggrandizements. We are reminded, for instance, of the expanded commander in chief status every time a modern president gets off the White House helicopter and returns the salute of marines.

That is an innovation that was begun by Ronald Reagan. Dwight Eisenhower, a real general, knew that the salute is for the uniform, and as president he was not wearing one. An exchange of salutes was out of order. (George Bush came as close as he could to wearing a uniform while president when he landed on the telegenic aircraft carrier in an Air Force flight jacket).

We used to take pride in civilian leadership of the military under the Constitution, a principle that George Washington embraced when he avoided military symbols at Mount Vernon. We are not led — or were not in the past — by caudillos.

Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan's prescient last book, "Secrecy," traced the ever-faster-growing secrecy of our government and said that it strikes at the very essence of democracy — accountability of representatives to the people. How can the people hold their representatives to account if they are denied knowledge of what they are doing? Wartime and war analogies are embraced because these justify the secrecy. The representative is accountable to citizens. Soldiers are accountable to their officer. The dynamics are different, and to blend them is to undermine the basic principles of our Constitution.

George W. Jetson's Plan For Iraq (LAT)

By Larry Doyle, Ben Doyle

The Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2007

"We're carrying out a new strategy in Iraq … our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach. In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance for success."

— President George W. Bush, State of the Union address, Jan. 23

"The military calls its new weapon an 'active denial system,' but that's an understatement. It's a ray gun that shoots a beam that makes people feel as if they are about to catch fire…. 'This is one of the key technologies for the future,' said Marine Col. Kirk Hymes, director of the nonlethal weapons program at Quantico, Va."

Re: Executive Directive on Weapon Development

POTUS very much enjoyed the demonstration today and wanted to thank everyone for their hard work and patriotism. He had some thoughts.

While the ray gun is impressive, POTUS was disappointed that to date it only makes people feel as if they are about to catch fire, and he wants to encourage you to keep working on it until you get it right. He expressed a preference for a ray that turns the target into a glowing red silhouette before making it disintegrate. He also feels the weapon should make a scarier sound.

POTUS was curious about where we are on the invisibility cloak. He pointed out that this was the first project he put into development when he came to the White House and, had it been available earlier, he could have used it to capture SH and OBL personally, saving thousands of lives and the Republican majority. However, he is having second feelings about calling it a cloak, which comes off as evil and French, and has directed that henceforth it be referred to as an invisibility poncho. And he again emphasized that the invisibility poncho be waterproof.

POTUS is frustrated at the continued delays in jet-pack production, a cornerstone in our plan to restore stability to Baghdad. Fix this.

POTUS is also concerned going forward that we continue to consider every possible approach, think outside the envelope, etc. Toward that end, he has designed some weapons systems [see attachment blotter.jpg (1.6 MB)] he feels are pretty cool and provide our best chance for success:

· We have smart bombs; why not smart bullets? They could be trained to tell the difference between Shiites or Sunnis and only shoot the right one, depending on the day.

· Rather than launching missiles into the air, where they are vulnerable to Chinese lasers and birds, why not launch them into the Earth, where they can travel unseen under the ground to their destination? Such UGLMs could also be equipped with a robotic arm, which, upon reaching the target, extends and electrocutes the bad guys before exploding them.

· How hard would it be to mount an automatic machine gun on a gorilla?

· We need a time machine, either based on the POTUS La-Z-Boy design or something more scientific, as long as it's done by Friday. POTUS would like to go back and warn himself about something before it's too late. The machine should be set for Dec. 28, 1963. Never mind why.

Justice Found Unprepared For Crises (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

The Justice Department, hampered by budget shortfalls and high staff turnover, is not prepared to respond quickly to terrorist attacks, hostage incidents, hurricanes and other natural disasters, said a report yesterday by the department's Office of Inspector General.

"Rapid response to critical incidents ... is an essential function of the Department of Justice," Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said in the 70-page report. "Critical incident response is also an integral part of the department's strategy for combating terrorism."

But, Mr. Fine said, the U.S. attorney's offices in the nation's 93 districts -- all of whom are responsible for developing plans to respond to major incidents -- are not adequately prepared to do so.

To improve each office's ability to respond to critical incidents, Mr. Fine said Attorney General Janet Reno directed the department in 1996 to implement the Crisis Management Coordinator (CMC) program, directing each U.S. attorney to designate an assistant U.S. attorney to coordinate development of response plans.

"We found a significant turnover in the CMC position during the nine months from October 2005 to July 2006 -- an annualized rate of 23 percent," Mr. Fine said. "This figure is significantly greater than the 6 percent turnover rate for assistant U.S. attorneys as a whole in 2005."

Mr. Fine said the high turnover rate directly affected the ability of the U.S. attorney offices nationwide to prepare for critical incidents.

According to the report, "factors beyond the control" of the U.S. attorneys affected their ability to respond to critical incidents, including continuing budget shortages that have limited the number of assistant U.S. attorneys on staff.

Mr. Fine said budget shortages over the past four years have come at a time that workloads have continued to increase. As a result, he said, the ability of assistant U.S. attorneys to complete nonprosecutorial functions, such as CMC duties, has been restricted.

Because assistant U.S. attorneys are evaluated on the number of prosecutions and not on CMC activities, Mr. Fine said they have had "less incentive" to focus on critical incident response plans.

He also said that while U.S. attorneys nationwide stepped up training in response to the September 11 attacks, their efforts have fallen off, noting that fewer than half complied with requirements to conduct annual training exercises in 2005 and 2006.

Mr. Fine also said the U.S. attorneys have not consistently completed after-action reports following exercises or actual events, or forwarded the reports to allow for lessons learned to be shared. He said better efforts have to be made to ensure the offices "are actually conducting the requisite activities."

He noted that following the September 11 attacks, the need to respond quickly and effectively to critical incidents was highlighted in both the department's anti-terrorism plan and the Department of Homeland Security's national strategy. He said the quality of that response depends, in large part, on developing and making necessary revisions and conducting "tabletop" or field exercises.

He said that while Justice Department officials had taken "important steps to improve" their preparedness to respond to critical incidents, "several areas remain in need of improvement."

During a major incident, U.S. attorneys nationwide are responsible for having a plan in place to respond. In the event of a critical incident, they are the on-scene legal decision makers for the department, responsible for facilitating coordination with federal, state and local officials.

As part of the review, Mr. Fine made seven recommendations to help the department improve the U.S. attorneys' ability to respond quickly and appropriately to critical incidents, and the department concurred with all of them.

Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys at Justice, said in a Jan. 8 letter attached to the IG's report that the department plans "to resolve and implement solutions" to the audit findings.

Agency's Readiness For Crises Faulted (BLOOM)

By Neil Roland, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — The U. S. Justice Department isn't adequately prepared to respond quickly to terrorist attacks, hurricanes and hostage situations because of budget cuts and staff turnover, an audit by the agency's inspector general found.

While the 93 U. S. attorneys around the nation stepped up training in 2004 in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, their efforts have fallen off, the report said. Fewer than half the offices complied with requirements to conduct annual training exercises in 2005 and 2006, said the report by the office headed by Inspector General Glenn Fine.

The U. S. attorneys are responsible for making on-site legal decisions and coordinating for the department with other federal, state and local officials. Justice Department officials have been lax in supervising the preparations, and some plans have been deficient for years, the 70-page report said.

The Justice Department's efforts "have regressed since June 2005," said the audit, posted Friday on the department's Web site. Agency officials "have not provided the direction and support needed to ensure" proper preparations, it said.

The Justice Department, which oversees the FBI as well as the U. S. attorneys' office, has been criticized by Congress for its responses to the 1993 Branch Davidian standoff in Texas, the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing and various hurricanes. Department officials made "serious mistakes" in the use of deadly force, coordinating between negotiators and attack planners and in collecting evidence, the report said.

The report said 78 of the 93 U. S. attorneys' offices conducted their annual training exercise in 2004. That number fell to 39 in 2004 and rose to only 45 as of November 2006, the report said. Among seven U. S. attorneys' plans that were deficient in 2003, three haven't been corrected or even reviewed, the report said.

Auditors traced the problem to budget cuts for U. S. attorneys since 2003 that have forced them to focus more on prosecutorial duties. Also, turnover among the lawyers responsible for each U. S. attorney's plans has been almost four times that of other lawyers in these offices, the report said.

A Justice Department spokesman didn't immediately respond to a request for comment Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0123856

Department officials plan “to resolve and implement solutions to the” audit findings, said Michael Battle, head of the office that oversees the U. S. attorneys, in a Jan. 8 letter appended to the inspector general’s report.

Clinton administration Attorney General Janet Reno directed in 1996 that each U. S. attorney’s office designate a lawyer to develop a response plan to crises.

Attorney General Draws Fire (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor And Greg Gordon, MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

McClatchy Newspapers, January 27, 2007

U.S. ATTORNEY APPOINTMENTS CALLED POLITICAL

WASHINGTON - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is transforming the ranks of the nation's top federal prosecutors by firing some and appointing conservative loyalists from the Bush administration's inner circle who critics say are unlikely to buck Washington.

The newly appointed U.S. attorneys all have impressive legal credentials, but most have few, if any, ties to the communities they've been appointed to serve, and some have had little experience as prosecutors.

The nine recent appointees identified by McClatchy Newspapers held high-level White House or Justice Department jobs, and most were handpicked by Gonzales under a little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act that became law in March.

With Congress now controlled by the Democrats, critics fear that in some cases Gonzales is trying to skirt the need for Senate confirmation by giving new U.S. attorneys interim appointments for indefinite terms.

Some legal scholars contend that the administration pushed for the change in the Patriot Act as part of an ongoing attempt to expand the power of the executive branch, a charge administration officials deny.

Being named a U.S. attorney "has become a prize for doing the bidding of the White House or administration," said Laurie Levenson, a former federal prosecutor.

A Justice Department spokesman called such assessments "reckless."

The appointments have troubled some current and former prosecutors, who worry that the Justice Department is tightening its control over local U.S. attorneys' offices in order to curb the prosecutors' independence.

These lawyers said federal prosecutors too close to the administration might not be willing to pursue important but controversial cases that don't fit the administration's agenda.

The selection of U.S. attorneys has always been a political process.

Traditionally, the top assistant U.S. attorney in each local office temporarily fills any vacancy while home-state senators search for preferred candidates to present to the White House for consideration.

If it takes more than four months to find a permanent successor, a judge can extend the temporary appointment or name another acting U.S. attorney.

Gonzales gained the authority to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms as a result of a change to the Patriot Act that stripped federal judges of their appointment power.

A Justice Department spokesman denied that Gonzales has sought to compromise the independence of U.S. attorneys' offices by appointing political loyalists. In some recent cases Gonzales has followed the traditional process.

"Allegations that politics inappropriately interfere with personnel decisions made about U.S. attorneys are reckless and plainly wrong," said department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

Gonzales and his aides also deny that they're trying to do an end run around the Senate. In a recent letter to two Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard Hertling said the change was sought to avoid conflicts involving federal judges' appointing officials to posts in the executive branch.

Since last March, the administration has named at least nine U.S. attorneys with administration ties. They include:

· Tim Griffin, 37, the U.S. attorney for Arkansas, who was an aide to White House political adviser Karl Rove and a spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

· Rachel Paulose, 33, the U.S. attorney for Minnesota, who served briefly as a counselor to the deputy attorney general and who, says a former boss, has been a member of the secretive, ideologically conservative Federalist Society.

· Jeff Taylor, 42, the U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C., who was an aide to Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch and worked as a counselor to Gonzales and to former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-Executive Of Computer Associates Receives Prison Sentence (NYT/AP)

By Dow Jones/ap

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

A former executive with Computer Associates who pleaded guilty to securities fraud and who prosecutors said was instrumental in the prosecution of the company's former chief executive, Sanjay Kumar, was sentenced to seven months in prison and seven months of home detention.

The executive, Ira Zar, the former chief financial officer, pleaded guilty in 2004 and has cooperated with authorities in the prosecution of Mr. Kumar and the company's former sales chief, Stephen Richards.

Mr. Zar, 45, also pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy and was sentenced by Judge I. Leo Glasser of United States District Court in Brooklyn. He was also ordered to serve two years of supervised release after the completion of his sentence. No fine was imposed and restitution will be determined at a later date.

The company, based in Islandia, N.Y., has since changed its name to CA Inc.

KB Home In Stock-options Investigation (FT)

By Doug Cameron In Chicago

Financial Times, January 27, 2007

KB Home, the fourth-largest US housebuilder, on Friday revealed that US regulators had opend a formal investigation into the stock-options backdating practices that led to the departure of its chief executive last November.

The Los Angeles-based group is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the unfolding options scandal, and the launch of a formal probe by the Securities and Exchange Commission comes as management wrestles with the impact of the slowing housing market.

The SEC launched an informal investigation into KB Home last August, and intensified the probe on January 19, according to the company, which said it was co-operating with regulators.

An internal probe by the company revealed KB Home used "incorrect measurement dates for financial reporting purposes for annual stock option grants during the period 1998-2005". The report led to the departure of Bruce Karatz, who had led the company since its initial public offering, and the dismissal of its chief legal officer, who had helped to set dates for the stock options.

Mr Karatz agreed to repay $13m to the company to cover differences in the stock price, and was replaced by Jeffrey Mezger, KB Home's chief operating officer. The company expects to complete a review of executive compensation practices next month.

The case is one of the few so far that points to the prevalence of improper backdating practices after the passage of Sarbanes-Oxley compliance and audit legislation in 2002. The law was supposed to have made it harder for executives and companies to engage in improper backdating. But the KB Home case appears to show that in some cases it persisted even after the passage of Sarbox.

While backdating is itself not illegal, falsification of company documents to make option award dates appear earlier than originally decided is a breach of securities laws.

More tha 130 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The US Justice department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are also conducting stock-options investigations.

US authorities want to know if executives, possibly with the complicity of compensation committees, auditors and company counsel, deliberately shifted the dates of options grant to dates where the company's share price was at historic lows.

Such a practice would have been designed to take advantage of a subsequent rise in the share price, immediately placing the options "in the money".

Some companies alleged to have engaged in such a practice have been sued by shareholders alleging fraud.

HP, Former VP In A Battle Over Spying Allegations (MERCN)

By Nicole C. Wong

The San Jose Mercury News, January 27, 2007

A run-of-the-mill divorce proceeding has led to allegations of corporate espionage involving Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer giant whose reputation was recently tarnished by a board-spying scandal.

The Palo Alto computer giant is in an ugly fight against a former executive, Karl Kamb Jr., who has accused HP of having him spy on rival Dell. HP has accused Kamb of stealing HP's trade secrets. The story is complete with allegations of a hired informant, bribery and adultery. Key documents in the case, in federal court in Tyler, Texas, have been sealed and the parties were ordered Thursday by a judge not to speak to the media.

But the saga can be pieced together from documents obtained before Kamb's lawsuit was sealed.

DOJ_NMG_0123858

In August 2005, Kamb's wife, as part of divorce proceedings, subpoenaed HP for information about a business Kamb had established on the side while he was employed by the Palo Alto company in Tokyo, HP said in court filings. After investigating, HP sued Kamb in November 2005 for allegedly stealing its trade secrets to start a multimillion-dollar flat-panel television business while he helped launch HP's TV line.

Accusations of spying

Last week, Kamb countersued HP for allegedly spying on him, alleging that HP had impersonated him to retrieve his personal phone records. He claimed that HP instructed him to obtain trade secrets on rival Dell's entry into the printer market.

HP spokesman Ryan Donovan declined to comment Friday beyond what the company said Wednesday, when it called Kamb's suit ``wholly without merit."

A Dell spokesman said: ``We take seriously the allegations that Dell's confidential information might have been obtained by a competitor through improper or unlawful means. We believe in vigorous but fair competition. There is no place for industrial espionage, and if we discover that we have been the victim of that we will consider all appropriate actions in response."

Kamb, who was an HP vice president of business development and strategy until fall 2005, alleged in his lawsuit that HP was concerned about Dell's 2003 entry into the lucrative printer market. In 2002, HP asked him to recruit an informant -- Katsumi Iizuka, who was president of Dell Japan until 1995 -- who could use his connections to obtain detailed information about Dell's products, costs, manufacturers and suppliers. Kamb said he turned that information over to HP.

Kamb said HP used code names in the spying operation on Dell. He included an e-mail in the suit that shows HP picked the names of famous mountains, referring to Dell as ``Everest," Lexmark as ``Whitney" and Sanyo as ``Rushmore."

The HP and Dell e-mails, according to Kamb's suit, suggest Iizuka arranged a dinner meeting in Osaka among four Dell executives and a printer company that Iizuka apparently was representing. The group planned to meet in February 2003 to discuss the launch of Dell's printer business.

Allegation of pretexting

Around Aug. 25, 2005, shortly before Kamb says he was fired, someone working for HP but posing as a T-Mobile employee called him asking for his personal identification number for his T-Mobile account, according to Kamb's suit. He refused but later found out HP had obtained his T-Mobile and Sprint phone records by using the Social Security number and billing address listed in his personnel file, he said.

Kamb's lawyer sent a letter in August 2005 to Kevin Hunsaker, HP's then-senior counsel, asking that HP stop pretexting him.

Hunsaker, who left HP last fall after pretexting surfaced in the board-spy scandal, replied in a September 2005 letter that ``no representatives of HP were involved in any of the alleged activity described in your letter."

HP's lawsuit portrays Kamb as the bad guy.

HP said in its lawsuit that Kamb was the ``ring leader" of ``a multimillion-dollar swindle" involving several other former high-level HP employees.

HP alleged that in late 2002 or early 2003, Kamb and other high-level HP executives, who were asked to find and develop new consumer electronic products for HP to sell, ``began formulating a scheme to establish their own consumer electronics enterprise," called byd:sign. They allegedly discussed their plans using HP computers and e-mail accounts.

Trade secrets

Around August 2003, HP's suit said, Kamb implied he would leave HP, so to keep him the company gave him a raise and greater responsibilities, which also gave him greater access to HP's research and development.

HP alleged that by June 2003 Kamb and his partners had developed a prototype LCD television and finalized their plans to sell them through byd:sign, using HP trade secrets and other confidential information.

HP said Kamb's ``surreptitious looting" of corporate opportunities might have continued undetected if Kamb ``had not been as disloyal and deceptive in his personal life as he was professionally."

According to HP, Kamb's wife filed for divorce around September 2004 in part for ``discord or conflict of personalities" and ``adultery."

After HP started contacting Kamb and his HP recruits in August 2005, ``they attempted to erase all evidence of their wrongdoing by permanently and irretrievably deleting information off of their HP computers," HP's suit alleged. Through the use of forensic data specialists, HP said it was able to retrieve and reconstitute some e-mails, instant messages and files, which show they ``continued scheming and planning their venture through the fall of 2003 and beyond" while many still worked for HP.

Spokesmen for the California Attorney General's Office and the U.S. Justice Department declined to comment on whether they are looking into allegations raised by these lawsuits.

Intellectual property and trade secret attorneys said if Kamb's allegations are true, HP could plunge back into troubles with ethics.

DOJ_NMG_0123859

Kamb's suit suggests ``an official policy to almost engage in CIA-type espionage of trade secrets," said Bradford Newman, a Palo Alto law partner who specializes in trade secret misappropriation, when told about the allegations.

Karen Kimmey, a San Francisco partner who specializes in intellectual property, said these new allegations are reminiscent of the spying on board members, employees and journalists that the company admitted to last fall.

``It has a very similar feel to the spying and overall ethical questions that have been raised, at least in the public's mind," Kimmey said. ``It's going to sound like more of the same."

Nacchio Prosecutors Scolded (AP)

By Sandy Shore, Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

Judge wants evidence turned over to defense

DENVER — With a stern reminder that Joe Nacchio's trial is just weeks away, a federal judge ordered prosecutors Friday to step up efforts to provide some key evidence to the former Qwest chief executive's attorneys.

U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham set deadlines for evidence to be turned over and told attorneys to file status reports by Feb. 6.

"This case is going to be tried on March 19, folks," Nottingham said.

Nacchio, who is free on bail, is accused of selling $101 million worth of stock in 2001 based on inside knowledge Qwest Communications International Inc. would be unable to meet revenue targets.

Nacchio is charged with 42 counts, each carrying a penalty of up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine, and has pleaded not guilty.

At issue in Friday's hearing was evidence that could be deemed favorable to Nacchio, which prosecutors are required by law to provide the defense.

Nacchio's attorneys have contended government attorneys have been slow to deliver some evidence, citing a report on a witness delivered two months after the interview was conducted.

"It's the witness interviews that are of concern," Nacchio attorney John Richiliano said. "It's just a very, very serious issue now."

Prosecutor Cliff Stricklin said government attorneys are still interviewing witnesses. "We're doing the best we can," he said.

Another problem stems from classified documents that defense attorneys say they need. Prosecutors said the evidence-exchange process had been slowed because some of the documents fall under the Classified Information Procedures Act, which sets guidelines for viewing secret government documents.

Prosecutors said they must coordinate the documents with federal agencies that are involved.

Defense lawyers have said Nacchio believed Qwest would get hundreds of millions of dollars worth of classified government contracts that gave him hope for the company's financial future.

The Classified Information Procedures Act was enacted several decades ago to counter a strategy used by defendants charged with spying who would threaten to expose national secrets unless the charges were dropped.

In order to view the contracts and determine their relevance at trial, attorneys for both sides and the judge received Justice Department security clearances.

Separately, Nacchio also is one of several former Qwest executives accused by the Securities and Exchange Commission in a civil case alleging they orchestrated a financial fraud that forced the company to restate billions of dollars in revenue. That case is pending.

Experts say Nacchio's legal fees in both the civil and criminal cases could hit a combined $75 million, based on other high-profile corporate executive trials, The Denver Post reported Friday. Qwest bylaws require the company to pay those expenses, company spokesman Bob Toevs told the newspaper.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Will Rove Testify? (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, January 26, 2007

White House anxiety is mounting over the prospect that top officials—including deputy chief of staff Karl Rove and counselor Dan Bartlett-may be forced to provide potentially awkward testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis (Scooter) Libby.

Both Rove and Bartlett have already received trial subpoenas from Libby's defense lawyers, according to lawyers close to the case who asked not to be identified talking about sensitive matters. While that is no guarantee they will be called, the odds increased this week after Libby's lawyer, Ted Wells, laid out a defense resting on the idea that his client, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, had been made a "scapegoat" to protect Rove. Cheney is expected to provide the most crucial testimony to back up Wells's assertion, one of the lawyers close to the case said. The vice president personally penned an October 2003 note in which he wrote, "Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the other." The note, read aloud in court by Wells, implied that Libby was the one being sacrificed in an effort to clear Rove of any role in leaking the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame, wife of Iraq war critic Joe Wilson. "Wow, for all the talk about this being a White House that prides itself on loyalty and discipline, you're not seeing much of it," the lawyer said.

Libby is charged with lying about when and from whom he learned about Plame during the spring and early summer of 2003, a time when the White House was working to discredit Wilson. A former U.S. ambassador, Wilson was dispatched to Niger to investigate reports that Iraq was seeking to purchase uranium from Africa. Wilson said he told U.S. officials there was nothing to those reports. But the president later used the claim anyway in his 2003 State of the Union address, prompting Wilson to charge the administration had manipulated the intelligence about Iraq. The week after he went public, journalist Robert Novak first reported that Wilson's wife, Plame, worked for the CIA—a disclosure that prompted allegations that administration officials had "outed her" in retaliation for Wilson's criticism.

The possibility that Rove could be called to testify would bring his own role into sharper focus—and could prove important to Libby's lawyers for several reasons. Rove has said in secret testimony that, during a chat on July 11, 2003, Libby told him he learned about Plame's employment at the CIA from NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert, a legal source who asked not to be identified talking about grand jury matters told NEWSWEEK. If Rove repeats that story on the witness stand, it could back up Libby's core assertion that he honestly, if mistakenly, thought he had heard about Wilson's wife from the "Meet the Press" host—even though Russert denies he knew anything about Plame, and more than a half-dozen officials (including Cheney) have said they passed along the same information to Libby earlier than that.

But the Rove account could cut in other ways. Fitzgerald would likely argue that Libby's comment to Rove merely shows that the vice president's top aide "was even lying inside the White House," according to the legal source. Moreover, Rove is likely not eager to recount the story either. The reason? He would have to acknowledge that shortly after he had the chat with Libby, he went back to his office and had a phone conversation with Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper in which he also disclosed the fact that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. The disclosure was potentially illegal since, at the time, Plame was employed in the Directorate of Operations, the agency's covert arm. (There is no evidence that Rove or anybody else knew Plame's status at the time—and Rove has never been charged with any crime—but the possibility that White House officials were leaking classified information in an effort to discredit Wilson is what triggered the probe in the first place.)

An equally embarrassing conflict could emerge next week when former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer takes the stand. Fleischer has been one of the most mysterious figures in the case, making virtually no public comments about it since he left the White House in July 2003. In the past he has insisted he wasn't even represented by a lawyer. But it emerged during court arguments this week that Fleischer originally invoked his Fifth Amendment privileges to avoid testifying and then only agreed to do so after he was given an immunity deal by Fitzgerald—an arrangement that normally requires extensive bargaining among attorneys. Fleischer's testimony is critical to Fitzgerald's case: as the prosecutor laid out this week in his opening statement, Fleischer has said that Libby told him over a White House lunch on July 7, 2003, that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and made a point of describing this information as "hush and hush." Fitzgerald used that account to undercut Libby's grand-jury assertion that he was surprised and "taken aback" just three or four days later when, he claims, Russert told him about Wilson's wife. "You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you're giving out Monday and Tuesday of the same week," Fitzgerald said. Fleischer has also testified that Bartlett also later told him about Wilson's wife and, after hearing it from both Libby and Bartlett, the then-White House press secretary disclosed the information to NBC reporter David Gregory.

On its face, Fleischer's account seems to contradict the repeated public assertions of his immediate successor, Scott McClellan, in October 2003 that nobody at the White House was in any way involved in the leak of Plame's identity. It also potentially puts Bartlett, one of the president's senior and most trusted advisers, on the hot seat. If Bartlett backs up Fleischer, it suggests he himself played a role in passing along radioactive information that triggered a criminal investigation that has plagued the White House for more than four years. If he contradicts Fleischer, it raises questions about the credibility of a man who was President Bush's chief spokesman for the first two and a half years of his presidency. His lawyer declined to comment on what Bartlett will say.

But either way, it's not a scenario that anybody at the White House can be looking forward to.

Bush Adviser Rove Subpoenaed For Libby Trial (CNN)

CNN.com, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Two of President Bush's top advisers have been subpoenaed as possible witnesses in the trial of former White House aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a legal source familiar with the case told CNN on Friday.

It remains unclear whether either of the aides -- Karl Rove and Dan Bartlett -- will actually be called to the stand.

Libby is charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury investigating who leaked a CIA employee's identity to reporters in 2003. (Read full story)

Rove, Bush's longtime political confidant, serves as deputy chief of staff at the White House; Bartlett is a counselor to the president and the former White House communications director.

Rove and Bartlett are on a list of possible defense witnesses that includes Vice President Dick Cheney, his current chief of staff, David Addington, and a number of journalists and current and former White House officials.

Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, is fighting charges of perjury and obstruction of justice with a defense strategy that includes portraying him as someone thrown into a "meat grinder" to protect Rove.

Prosecutors are trying to portray Libby as someone who used lies and deception in his high-ranking position at the White House to try to discredit an open critic of the Bush prewar justification to invade Iraq.Inner workings of White House exposed

The first week in the trial brought a sometimes harsh light to the inner workings of the White House and other federal agencies.

On Thursday, a former top press aide to Cheney, Cathie Martin, who now is an aide to Bush, testified she was excluded from high-level talks to decide how to respond to the media during a controversy over Bush's 2003 State of the Union address.

In the speech, Bush claimed Iraq was trying to buy uranium from the African nation of Niger. Martin said Libby attended the meeting.

The uranium claim was challenged by a former ambassador, Joe Wilson, who in the months before the Iraq war, had made a fact-finding trip to Niger at the request of the CIA, where his wife worked on matters regarding weapons of mass destruction, according to court testimony. (Read full story)

Witnesses have testified Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame Wilson, apparently organized the trip, and interest in the results had been expressed by the Office of the Vice President, the State Department and the Department of Defense.

But at least initially, none of those offices apparently had much knowledge of Wilson's trip nor who arranged it, according to the testimony thus far.

Prosecution witnesses from the CIA and the State Department testified that they or their staff members tracked down details of the mission at Libby's request, and that the push to do so came at the time the former ambassador had questioned the Bush argument for going to war in Iraq.

The criminal case began with an investigation of how Valerie Wilson became widely known among journalists as being an operative of the CIA. It would be illegal to disclose the covert or classified status of such an employee.

No one has been charged with leaking her name, employment status or other classified material.

Libby is the only person to face any charges in connection with the case. He resigned his position at the White House in 2005 on the day he was indicted.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has said he continues to explore for wrongdoing, including whether Valerie Wilson's cover was blown in retaliation for her husband's public criticism of the president.Who told Libby is key to prosecution

Central to the Libby trial is whether he learned of Valerie Wilson's employment from reporters or from inside government. (Watch how the timeline is a key to the trial)

Libby has said that he first got the information from NBC reporter Tim Russert. His lawyers blame bad memory for any discrepancies in what he told investigators and a grand jury, and say he may have been distracted by urgent national security matters.

Martin, Cheney's former spokeswoman, testified Thursday that she had told Libby that Joseph Wilson is "married to a CIA agent" days before the date Libby claims he learned that information from Russert.

She also described feeling blamed for how the White House handled a different query about the controversial Iraq-uranium assertion in the State of the Union address. The query, by television reporter Andrea Mitchell, had been handled by Libby.

Martin testified, "I was aggravated that Scooter was calling the reporters and I wasn't" during White House efforts to handle the story.

Martin is one of four witnesses for the prosecution who have testified in the first three days of the trial, which is expected to last more than a month. The judge and jury will not hear the case on Fridays.

After the defense and prosecution conclude with Martin on Monday, the next witness is expected to be former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer.

He appeared at the courthouse Thursday after defense attorney Ted Wells complained he needed more time to examine Martin's original handwritten notes she made during the uranium controversy.

There was some talk of instead taking the next prosecution witness and delaying Martin's testimony, and soon after, reporters spotted Fleischer's arrival.

Prosecutor Fitzgerald acknowledged that Wells had been given the Martin notes only a few hours before Martin was to take the stand, but he disputed whether the earlier copies were of poor quality.

"That's a bit of spin," Fitzgerald said of the complaint from Wells, and suggested he didn't believe the defense team's "notion of sitting on it a year with illegible copies."

Judge Reggie Walton, his voice rising, chided Fitzgerald and loudly said, "If he's lying, I'll punish him for it," referring to the Wells complaint.

Martin was called to the stand after Fitzgerald said only a handful of the notes would be introduced as evidence. Fleischer, who had been waiting with counsel in a holding room, departed. His appearance is now set for Monday.

Cheney Led Effort To Discredit Iraq Critic Wilson: Testimony (AFP)

AFP, January 27, 2007

A White House aide testified in court Thursday that Vice President Dick Cheney personally led the 2003 effort to discredit Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson.

Deputy White House communications director Cathie Martin was giving evidence in the politically sensitive perjury trial of former top White House aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

The prosecution has charged Libby, who was Cheney's chief of staff, with obstructing the investigation by lying about when he learned the name of Wilson's wife, Central Intelligence Agency spy Valerie Plame.

Prosecutors opened a leak probe after Plame's name appeared in the press in 2003. Revealing a CIA agent's identity can be a federal crime, although Libby is not accused of leaking Plame's name.

President George W. Bush's critics charge senior officials deliberately blew Plame's cover to punish Wilson for accusing the administration of exaggerating the threat posed by Iraq to justify an invasion.

Libby, 56, denies the charges. He could face 30 years in jail if convicted.

Martin, who in 2003 was a spokewsoman for Cheney, testified that the vice president ordered her to monitor all print and television news reports on Wilson after the former ambassador went public with his criticism.

"The vice president told me to keep track of this story," and press aides immediately "began monitoring television commentators" in addition to print reports about Wilson, she said.

Martin also testified that she clearly remembered telling both Cheney and Libby that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA days before Libby said he first learned of it.

Martin also became the fourth US official to testify that Libby knew about Plame before he talked to a prominent television reporter on July 10, 2003, as he had maintained under oath.

Some 80 possible witnesses are listed for the trial, including Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, former White House chief of staff Andrew Card, top national security officials and more than two dozen of the capital's leading journalists.

The trial is set to resume Monday with testimony from former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer.

Libby's lawyer argued on Tuesday that his client was being made a scapegoat to save the real mastermind -- Bush's political guru Karl Rove.

"Scooter Libby was being sacrificed; Karl Rove was to be protected," attorney Ted Wells said.

Wells called Rove "the lifeblood of the Republican Party," and said that Bush aides needed to protect him at all costs.

In his book "Plan of Attack," an account of preparations for the Iraq invasion, Washington Post journalist Bob Woodward described Libby as part of the White House inner circle that played a role in virtually every major decision.

Libby Lawyers Target Fleischer's Immunity (WT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 27, 2007

Attorneys for former vice presidential aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr. want more information about an unusual immunity-from-prosecution deal that government lawyers gave former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer in the CIA leak case.

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald says that in early 2004, as his investigation was heating up into who revealed CIA operative Valerie Plame's name to reporters, Mr. Fleischer stepped forward with an offer to prosecutors: Promise no prosecution and he would help their case.

Mr. Fleischer acknowledged being one of the leakers, but he wouldn't say a word without a promise of immunity.

DOJ_NMG_0123863

Prosecutors normally insist on an informal account of what a witness will say before agreeing to such a deal. It's known in legal circles as a proffer, and Mr. Fitzgerald said Thursday that he never got one from Mr. Fleischer, who was chief White House spokesman for the first 21/2 years of President Bush's first term.

"I didn't want to give him immunity. I did so reluctantly," Mr. Fitzgerald said in court Thursday. "I was buying a pig in a poke."

Defense attorneys are skeptical. Mr. Fleischer is expected to testify Monday against Mr. Libby, who is accused of lying and obstructing Mr. Fitzgerald's investigation. Defense attorneys are preparing court documents demanding to know exactly what Mr. Fleischer promised in exchange for immunity.

"I'm not sure we're getting the full story here," defense attorney William Jeffress said in court.

Once the deal was struck in February 2004, Mr. Fleischer revealed that he had discussed Mrs. Plame with reporters in July 2003, days before leaving his job at the White House. He also said he learned about Mrs. Plame from Mr. Libby, who was the chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

Mr. Fleischer's testimony is significant because he says he talked to Mr. Libby about Mrs. Plame days before Mr. Libby told the FBI he was surprised to learn it from a reporter.

Mr. Libby's attorneys want details about Mr. Fleischer's agreement to cast the defendant as someone who's pointing fingers to protect himself. Mr. Fitzgerald says he doesn't have to disclose his conversations with Mr. Fleischer because they weren't about specific testimony.

"It wasn't as if someone said, 'Here's what I can give you about Mr. Libby. Is that good enough? You know, will that give us immunity?' " Mr. Fitzgerald said. "That wasn't it."

The deal he made was unusual enough that Mr. Libby's defense lawyers questioned whether it could be true. They suggested that Mr. Fitzgerald got a secret summary of Mr. Fleischer's testimony -- a deal they want to discuss with jurors when Mr. Fleischer takes the stand.

Defense attorneys said they will ask U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to force Mr. Fitzgerald to reveal what Mr. Fleischer promised him. Mr. Fitzgerald told Judge Walton that no promises were made.

"We got no specifics," he said.

New Prosecution Team Takes On Duke Case (WP)

By Sylvia Adcock, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

Lawyers Examine Evidence Amid Media Glare

RALEIGH, N.C. -- Six boxes and two file folders were transferred to the state attorney general's office near Capital Square here last week, and with them comes a shift in a case that has transfixed the nation.

The boxes and files contain the sum total of evidence against three former Duke University lacrosse players charged with sexually assaulting an escort service dancer at an off-campus team party last spring. In the recent months, the actions of the previous prosecutor, Durham District Attorney Michael B. Nifong, have taken center stage. But now that Nifong has asked to be relieved while he faced charges from the North Carolina Bar Association, including withholding evidence from defense lawyers, the focus of the case shifts to state Attorney General Roy Cooper and the two prosecutors he has chosen to evaluate the evidence.

Pressure on them will be enormous. An intense publicity campaign this month painted a sympathetic picture of the players, in Newsweek and on "60 Minutes." And the NAACP held a news conference here last week to call on prosecutors to take into account the accuser's version of events, saying it was aware of "the impact that this case can have on chilling the rights of women, particularly African Americans, to file criminal complaints of sexual violence and exploitation." The three players are white and the accuser is black, and witnesses have reportedly said they heard racist comments when the woman was leaving the house last March 13.

Cooper and the new prosecutors -- James J. Coman and Mary D. Winstead -- declined to be interviewed. But those who know them and who have watched the case closely say the new team is not one to cave under pressure.

"I think people may be surprised," said Irving Joyner, a law professor at North Carolina Central University who has been monitoring the case for the NAACP. "They are not going to bow to public sentiment."

The transfer of the case came after some of the state's evidence appeared to unravel: In December, the director of a DNA lab testified that he and Nifong had decided to omit information showing the presence of DNA from multiple males on the accuser's vaginal and rectal swabs. Nifong dropped first-degree rape charges last month after the accuser said she was no longer certain if she had been penetrated by a penis. The three still face sexual assault and kidnapping charges that carry equally stiff sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0123864

The two prosecutors Cooper chose to take on the case -- Coman and Winstead -- are part of a six-lawyer special prosecutions team that handles cases in which the county prosecutor has a conflict of interest or an appearance of one. "The reputation of that office is one of high confidence," said Stephen T. Smith, a Raleigh defense attorney. "They fight hard, and they fight fair."

Spencer Barrow, a Raleigh lawyer who went to law school with Coman and is a close friend, said Coman's first job out of law school was as the police department's attorney in Greensboro, N.C., and he quickly moved on to the prosecutor's office. He later joined the attorney general's office and was the director of the State Bureau of Investigation from 1993 until 1999.

"He's very tenacious, and he has a tremendous amount of integrity," Barrow said. "He is not going to make decisions based on publicity."

In 2004 he prosecuted the second trial of Alan Gell, on death row for a 1995 murder, after it was revealed that the original prosecutors in the state attorney general's office had withheld evidence helpful to the defense. In the second trial, Gell was acquitted and set free after nine years behind bars.

"His experience with the Gell case shows that he doesn't dismiss a case unless the evidence for innocence is extremely strong," said Joe Kennedy, a law professor at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

When the original prosecutors were taken before the state bar for their actions, Coman testified on their behalf and said the evidence -- a taped conversation in which a star witness said she had to make up a story for the police -- was not wrongfully withheld. His comments touched off a furor among defense attorneys, and Coman later said his comments were incorrect. The issue involved an interpretation of case law, and "it was an issue good minds could disagree on," said James B. Maxwell, who represented the original prosecutors in the bar proceedings.

Winstead, like Coman, is a career prosecutor. She began her career in the Wake County District Attorney's Office in Raleigh, and worked for Nifong in the Durham DA's office from 1987 until 1994 before joining the attorney general's office.

"I've known her since she was a child, and I've tried many cases with her in the DA's office in Raleigh," said longtime Raleigh lawyer Earle Purser.

"She's undoubtedly one of the most honest, straightforward lawyers I have ever seen. She can be tough, but legitimately tough."

Joyner said Winstead is "aggressive and zealous on the side of the prosecution. . . . She's no-nonsense. She gets right down to the bone and doesn't lose a lot of time on the fat."

Winstead's family is well-known to local lawyers and politicians; they run a downtown restaurant called the Mecca, where the red countertops and black-and-white floor tiles have not changed in decades. Wade Smith -- who represents Duke defendant Collin Finnerty -- is a regular and once attributed his longevity to frequent servings of black-eyed peas and rice at the Mecca.

On a day-to-day basis, Winstead and Coman will be handling the sexual assault case, advising Cooper of their progress. In coming weeks they will be examining each piece of paper in the boxes and files, first making sure it has been turned over to the defense attorneys. They also plan to hold meetings with the defense teams -- separate meetings for each of the three former lacrosse players.

"They have an obligation to look at all the evidence -- including the accuser's version of events," said one Raleigh lawyer who asked not to be identified.

Said Kennedy, "The very first action they take will be so closely scrutinized, I would expect them to take their time examining the facts."

Judge Proposes Secrecy For Columbine Depositions (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 27, 2007

DENVER, Jan. 26 (AP) — A federal judge has proposed keeping secret for 25 years the sworn statements made by the parents of the Columbine High School gunmen for a civil lawsuit settled more than three years ago.

The judge, Lewis T. Babcock of Federal District Court, suggested the plan on Friday to settle a dispute over whether the depositions should be destroyed. Chief Judge Babcock's proposal calls for them to be turned over to the National Archives and Records Administration. It was not immediately clear what would happen to them after 25 years.

The judge asked the parties in the dispute to respond to his proposal within two weeks.

The parents of the Columbine gunmen, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, gave the statements in 2003 for a civil lawsuit filed by families of victims of the April 1999 shooting near Littleton. Mr. Harris, 18, and Mr. Klebold, 17, killed 12 fellow students and a teacher before taking their own lives.

After the suit was settled, a magistrate ordered the depositions destroyed, but victims' families and others argued that the material had historical value and could contain lessons to prevent school shootings.

DOJ_NMG_0123865

Brian Rohrbough, whose son, Daniel, 15, was among those killed, objected to the judge's plan. Mr. Rohrbough said that the public had a right to know, but that the government seemed to think the release of such information was "somehow going to unravel American society."

Frank Patterson, a lawyer for the Klebolds, said the depositions contained no new material.

Judge Babcock also issued an order to destroy digital copies of audiotapes and videotapes in which the gunmen discussed their attack plan. The original tapes are in the Jefferson County sheriff's custody.

Judge: Seal Columbine Papers For 25 Years (DENP)

By Howard Pankratz, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 27, 2007

The depositions that the parents of Columbine killers gave in connection with the myriad of lawsuits surrounding the April 20, 1999 massacre should be sent to the National Archives where they'd be kept under seal for at least two decades, a U.S. District Court judge suggested in Denver today.

"There would be no access to these records for 25 years by anyone," chief judge Lewis Babcock told parties who are fighting to unseal the depositions or have them reviewed by experts in hopes their contents can prevent similar school shootings.

In 2002, the parents of Columbine killer Eric Harris gave more than 16 hours of depositions in connection with a lawsuit by Columbine survivor Mark Taylor against Solvay Pharmaceuticals, maker of Luvox.

Taylor claimed that Luvox, an anti-depressant, made Harris homicidal and suicidal. However, Taylor dropped the lawsuit in February 2003 after Solvay agreed to contribute $10,000 to the American Cancer Society.

The other depositions of Harris' parents and the parents of Dylan Klebold took place over a four-day period in August 2003 in connection with a lawsuit filed by the families of five slain Columbine students. But, like the Solvay lawsuit depositions, the depositions were sealed when those families reached a settlement with the Harris and Klebold families.

The depositions have since been sitting in a highly secured evidence room at the federal courthouse awaiting a decision by Babcock about what should be done with them.

Although the families of the five slain students agreed that the depositions be kept confidential as a condition of the settlement, they believe society would be served if the settlements were made public.

Bruce Jones, the lawyer representing Mark Taylor, said that Taylor doesn't want the depositions destroyed or sealed in such a way that they'd be inaccessible to experts.

After 25 years, the National Archives would decide if the depositions are of significant social value and could release them to the public. Otherwise, they'd be destroyed, according to evidence presented at today's hearing.

Babcock said he wouldn't make a final decision until all sides had an opportunity to file written responses with him. He gave the parties a two-week deadline to file motions.

The Colorado attorney General's Office has suggested that the depositions be sent to the Colorado State Archives where a youth-violence expert could review them and issue a public report.

Endorsements-for-sale Probe Derailed (BUFFNEWS)

By ROBERT J. McCARTHY, News Political Reporter

Buffalo News, January 27, 2007

FBI investigation targeted Independence Party chief

The secretary of the Erie County Independence Party says he wore a wire and allowed his telephone to be tapped last year during an FBI investigation into the alleged sale of political endorsements by party Chairman Anthony L. Orsini.

But Louis P. Corrigan said the probe ended after Justice Department officials in Washington declared that the federal government lacks jurisdiction to prosecute a practice they call "slating."

Neither the FBI nor federal prosecutors would address Corrigan's claim about an investigation. But U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn said his staff reached out to the Office of Public Integrity in Washington to determine if a party official - as opposed to a public official - could be criminally charged for taking money in exchange for an endorsement.

"We were told that, since the 1970s, it's been Department of Justice policy that we do not prosecute cases where a candidate pays money to be put on a slate," Flynn said.

Corrigan, however, said he played undercover agent for much of 2006, cooperating in a probe he hoped would weed out corruption from at least a part of local politics.

"I carried a wire for the FBI all last year," Corrigan said, adding that federal agents also tapped his phone to determine whom they would target in a probe they expected to be wide-ranging.

DOJ_NMG_0123866

He said federal investigators became especially interested after he talked to two potential candidates while wearing a small transmitter in his shirt pocket.

Corrigan would not reveal the names of either of the people he recorded. But after The Buffalo News independently determined that one of them was Jeffrey A. Bono, a longtime Democratic operative who unsuccessfully ran for the Assembly last May, Corrigan acknowledged that he taped Bono's conversation in the Olympic Restaurant near Buffalo Niagara International Airport last April.

He taped one other person whom he would not name, but said that person refused to give Orsini any money.

Corrigan said Bono told him he paid Orsini $2,000 in cash for the Independence endorsement. He also asked Bono to sign a document detailing the conversation that was secretly taped, which Bono acknowledged he did in an attempt to reverse the endorsement that went to Republican Michael Cole.

"I felt double-crossed by Tony and was in the heat of campaign anger," Bono said. "He had promised me the endorsement over and over again. But when the time came, he told me, "I have to go with a winner.' "

But Bono disputes the way Corrigan reads all of the document he signed.

"I didn't really like the way the thing was worded," Bono said. "But then I figured, yes, I did give him $2,000. But it was never $2,000 [in one payment]. Whenever there was a fundraiser, I bought a large ticket."

Bono, who did not know he was recorded by FBI microphones until informed by The News, said Corrigan was "pushy" about him signing the document that he said vaguely summarized the conversation.

"If the FBI was pushing him that way, I understand it now," he said. "It was a real dumb mistake."

Asked why his campaign finance reports filed with the State Board of Elections show no payments to either Orsini or the Independence Party, Bono said he filed several as reimbursements from petty cash.

But none of Bono's petty cash reimbursements list payments to either Orsini's personal committee or to the party.

Orsini, meanwhile, said the only money he ever received from Bono was through checks submitted by Democratic congressional candidate Jack Davis, for whom Bono was working at the time.

"Jeff Bono never gave me a dime," he said.

Orsini filed no campaign finance reports with the Board of Elections for the second half of 2006, a violation of election law.

Corrigan said the FBI was excited about the information it expected to glean from wired conversations and tapped telephones. But before the investigation kicked into high gear, Washington officials nixed it in late 2006 because they found nothing in federal law that made the practice illegal.

"The FBI didn't want to give up, but they were ordered off," Corrigan said. "They were very disappointed. The agent was in Washington for a week arguing with the attorney general's staff. It wasn't the FBI that wanted to quit."

Flynn said the public often fails to understand the limits of federal jurisdiction in corruption cases and that most are prosecuted in state and local courts. He said federal prosecutors cannot present a case to a grand jury without solid footing.

A Republican, Flynn acknowledged that he and Orsini discussed him serving as election lawyer for the Independence Party in 2004, before he became U.S. attorney. He said the conversation was between a private attorney seeking business and a potential client, but neither Orsini nor the party ever became his client.

"I was never paid to do legal work or give legal advice," he said. "Like any private lawyer, you seek business."

He emphasized that the decision to drop the Orsini probe in 2006 stemmed not from the 2004 conversation, but from Justice Department concern over a lack of jurisdiction.

Orsini, who as Independence chairman can wield significant political power in Erie County, said he had no idea he was under FBI scrutiny. But he said the fact that the agency refused to advance the investigation proves there should be no question about his activities.

"The bottom line is there was nothing illegal," he said, blaming the entire episode on dissident Independence members who have unsuccessfully attempted to challenge him.

Corrigan, meanwhile, explained the FBI approached him and he cooperated after failing to elicit interest in Orsini from either the Erie County district attorney or the state attorney general. He said he believes others also cooperated with the FBI investigation.

Corrigan said the FBI remains interested in the Independence Party and maintains communication with him. Its interest follows an extensive probe in which agents assigned him a code name and tapped the phone in his bedroom to monitor certain calls, he said.

He was in the midst of arranging a meeting to be recorded, he said, when the FBI pulled out of the probe.

In addition, Corrigan said the FBI secretly photographed dozens of politicians attending a 2006 fundraiser for Orsini's personal committee. "Tony held a big fundraiser, and they were outside - hidden or whatever - taking pictures of everyone they didn't know," Corrigan said. "They brought the pictures to me to identify some of the people and to ask what their connection was."

Corrigan, 71, is a retired engineer and Mensa member who has been active in minor parties for decades. For the past year, he has waged a vicious battle with Orsini over his tactics as chairman of the party, which occupies the third line on the general election ballot and often proves crucial in determining close elections.

The Independence Party has forged a close alliance with the Erie County Democratic Party in recent years that when combined with the Democrats' enrollment advantage of 144,000 over Republicans, has helped notch a string of Democratic successes at the polls.

Orsini and Corrigan have been at odds for some time, including some court battles over disputed Independence Party votes.

Against the backdrop of that public feud, Corrigan said federal agents wanted to determine if the party endorsement could be bought and how Orsini might be involved.

Utah, N.C. Prosecutors Find No Crimes Committed With "Hounddog" (AP)

By GARY D. ROBERTSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 27, 2007

Prosecutors in two states said Friday they found nothing illegal about a movie shot in North Carolina and screened this week at Utah's Sundance Film Festival that depicts a child rape, and instead said "Hounddog" offered viewers a "good message" about child sexual abuse.

The movie has troubled some Christians, who have called for a federal investigation into whether the movie breaks federal anti-pornography laws. A state lawmaker in North Carolina also said he is drafting legislation that would require the state approve the script of any television or movie production seeking a state tax break.

But Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff, who watched the movie this week with his state's child sexual exploitation law in hand, said his concerns didn't materialize on the screen.

"None of the things on the Internet that people were saying about it were true," Shurtleff said. "Not only does it not violate the statute, I think it's a good message for people on the subject."

The opinion is shared by the district attorneys in the two North Carolina counties where "Hounddog" was filmed last summer.

Rex Gore, the Brunswick County district attorney, said prosecutors reviewed the movie in November and interviewed crew members, producers and star Dakota Fanning. The movie includes a scene depicting the rape of a 9-year-old child played the 12-year-old actress.

"I am aware that there is an outcry from some who find the content of the film disturbing and distasteful," Gore said in a statement. "However, public opinion is not the test we must apply as prosecutors; we must apply the law."

Gore said there no evidence that the scene constituted "sexual activity" under North Carolina law, so child exploitation didn't occur. Even if there was simulated sexual activity, Gore said it doesn't cross the line into obscenity so long as the film has serious artistic value or is protected speech.

The rape scene lasts a few minutes, but is not graphic. There is no nudity, the scene is very darkly lit and only Fanning's face and hand are shown.

"Hounddog" is the story of Lewellen, a free-spirit obsessed with Elvis Presley in the 1960s South who is raped by a teenager. Fanning said this week at Sundance that the rape scene isn't the focus of the movie. "It's not really happening," Fanning said. "It's a movie, and it's called acting. I'm not going through anything."

The Christian Film and Television Commission and its chairman, movieguide.org publisher Ted Baehr, had claimed "Hounddog" breaks federal child-pornography law because it "appears" to show minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct. The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights also asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate.

That outcry led state Sen. Phil Berger, R-Rockingham, to begin work on legislation that would require any film seeking North Carolina's 15 percent tax credit for television and movies to receive script approval from the state. Berger said the state should ensure its citizens aren't subsidizing what many may consider inappropriate.

It's an idea flatly rejected by those in the industry.

"Government review of any kind of speech is anathema to the fundamental tenets of American democracy and must be rejected," said Jody Frisch, spokeswoman for the Writers Guild of America.

The department that oversees the North Carolina Film Office said this week it had no information on whether the producers of "Hounddog" had received or would seek the credits.

DOJ_NMG_0123868

The South Carolina Film Commission asks for a script as a part of its tax break application, along with the film's budget and production schedule. But Commissioner Jeff Monks said the office looks at the script largely to determine whether the application makes good business sense, not to check for offensive content.

For the past two decades, North Carolina has ranked as the third busiest state for filmmaking, behind California and New York. But state officials have worried recently about tax incentives offered elsewhere. And Monks suggested tinkering with its film incentives could hurt North Carolina's ability to bring projects to the state.

"There are 300 film commissions worldwide all competing for about 500 films a year," he said. "The competition has never been greater for the industry."

Mayor Says City Is Making Progress Against Violent Crime (AP)

By Mary Foster, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2007

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Two weeks after thousands marched on City Hall to protest violent crime, city officials gathered there again Friday to provide an update on their latest crime fighting efforts, including increased use of remote cameras, beefed up patrols and traffic checkpoints.

The city has identified 20 crime "hot spots" were cameras will be placed, adding to 50 already operating, Mayor Ray Nagin said. There will also be cameras providing coverage along St. Charles Avenue for next month's Mardi Gras parades, Nagin said.

The cameras are not monitored, they can, however, provide evidence for investigations since the images they record are kept in a computer.

Police have begun regular patrols in three districts, superintendent Warren Riley said. And at least one officer is walking for 1 1/2 hours a day in every district, he said.

The police have put another 60 officers on the streets three days a week, Riley said, by pulling them from administrative jobs. He's going to use federal grants to pay overtime for another 40 to 50 patrol officers. Riley is also using undercover officers to converge on scenes of violent crime.

"They'll gather information and look for suspects," Riley said. "Because they don't always flee the scene immediately."

Criminal Sheriff Marlon Gusman is providing 14 deputies to patrol the Fauborg Marigny neighborhood adjacent to the French Quarter.

The city's initiatives are in addition to plans announced Thursday by the U.S. Justice Department. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and U.S. Attorney Jim Letten announced additional federal manpower and equipment being sent to the city to help police fight violent crime that increased as the city repopulates following Hurricane Katrina in August 2005.

Police are also conducting traffic stops every night, Riley said. They have resulted in over 1,600 citations, including 24 narcotics arrests, 35 people with outstanding warrants were apprehended and one person was caught with an illegal weapon.

"We do find that when we put them in areas of violent crime, things quiet down," Riley said.

A meeting with the New Orleans criminal court judges was very positive, Nagin said.

"If we bring good cases to them that are well documented they will push for maximum sentences," Nagin said.

Mother, Daughter Receive Sentences For FEMA Fraud (MR)

Staff Report

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 27, 2007

A Jackson woman who admitted submitting 28 phony applications for assistance following Hurricane Katrina will spend more than six years in prison, while her mother will serve probation for similar offenses, a federal judge in Mobile decided this week.

U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose on Wednesday sentenced Lawanda Williams to six years and three months in prison and ordered her to pay back the $267,377 she received in fraudulent aid from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The judge also ordered her to surrender four automobiles, real estate, televisions, electronics equipment and other items she purchased with the money.

At a separate hearing Friday, DuBose sentenced the woman's mother, Hannah Williams, to three months probation.

The pair are among more than a dozen people who have pleaded guilty to FEMA fraud associated with Katrina, but the younger Williams is responsible for more money than any of the others, according to authorities.

"Ms. Williams used Hurricane Katrina and the relief efforts as an opportunity to make hundreds of thousands of dollars by lying and by stealing other people's identities," U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes said in a prepared statement. "The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force is actively working to bring to justice those who took advantage of the recovery efforts to enrich themselves."

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales created the national task force in September 2005, weeks after Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast. Chaired by the assistant attorney general for the criminal division, the task force includes representatives from the FBI, the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General and other agencies.

Hannah Williams pleaded guilty in October to making a false claim against the government. She admitted that she submitted a false disaster assistance application for an address in Grove Hill where she had not lived for more than 18 months. She received $22,904.31, according to court records.

Judge sentences couple for Ecstasy dealing

A federal judge in Mobile this week sent a man and his onetime girlfriend to prison for their participation in a giant conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine.

Senior U.S. District Judge Charles Butler Jr. on Tuesday sentenced Daniel Issac

LaPorte, 28, to 14 years in prison. He gave Leigh Ann Sciandra, 22, a 10-year sentence.

LaPorte and Sciandra were indicted in October 2005 on one count each of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute the club drug Ecstasy as well as conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine. They were among 20 area defendants ensnared in an international Ecstasy investigation known as Operation Candybox.

Investigators with the Drug Enforcement Administration said they questioned Sciandra and LaPorte in April 2005 and that both admitted to selling Ecstasy, a drug popular at all-night rave parties. That charge against both defendants was dropped as part of their plea bargains.

Bank robbery brings more than nine years in prison

Citing the defendant's lengthy criminal record, a federal judge in Mobile on Friday sentenced a Prichard man to more than nine years in prison for robbing a Regions Bank in Spanish Fort in 2005.

In handing down the prison term of nine years and two months, U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose noted that Kendrick Lamar Perkins, 27, has been arrested 10 to 12 times.

"He has a very extensive criminal history," she said.

Perkins pleaded guilty in October, admitting that he went inside the bank on the morning of Nov. 30, 2005, displayed a gun and made off with $11,835.

DuBose ordered Perkins to pay that money back, but she agreed to let him serve his sentence simultaneously with any sentence he gets from a Mobile County circuit judge on a probation revocation.

Assistant Federal Defender Chris Knight asked DuBose for leniency, noting that his client had been diagnosed with a major depressive disorder, stemming from the death of his brother in 2003.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis said that should not be a factor in sentencing.

"The death of his brother preceded this incident by several years," she said.

'ABSURD' JUDGE OUSTS 2 (NYPOST)

By Stefanie Cohen

The New York Post, January 27, 2007

An irreverent Brooklyn federal judge had to dismiss two jurors from a capital murder case yesterday after his mocking statements about the defendant's possible death sentence wound up splashed across city newspapers.

Judge Frederic Block told lawyers earlier this week that the feds' bid to have drug lord Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff - who is charged in two murder-for-hire schemes - put to death was "absurd."

The jury and the press were not in the courtroom when the judge made the unusual comments, but a copy of the public court transcript wound up in reporters' hands - and then became fodder for the following day's news cycle.

Morning talk-radio shows then picked up the story. And Assistant U.S. Attorney Caroline Pokorny complained to Block yesterday morning, as he launched a bid to discover whether the jury has been tainted.

McGriff, a legendary Queens drug kingpin, is on trial for plotting the deaths of two rivals in 2001. The judge said that, based on the jury's demeanor and the evidence presented during the initial phase of the trial, which ended yesterday, "there's no chance in the world there would be a death-penalty verdict in this case . . . This is an absurd prosecution, based upon what I have heard."

He asked Pokorny to send a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, telling him that he didn't support proceeding with the penalty phase of the trial. Federal death-penalty cases require two trials - one in which jurors decide the defendant's guilt and, if there's a conviction, a separate trial in which they say whether he should face life in prison or death.

DOJ_NMG_0123870

It's unclear what impact the judge's suggestion will have on the case.

Yesterday, he admitted he'd made a mistake by allowing the comments to become public - but didn't seem to regret making them.

"Everything I said I stand by, but, unfortunately, I didn't get around to sealing [the transcript]," he said.

The judge then called the jury into the courtroom and asked whether any of the 12-member panel had seen or heard any news regarding the case.

One juror raised his hand and was dismissed.

Coincidentally, a second juror also had to be let go after recognizing someone in the gallery of the courtroom. The panel is supposed to be anonymous for its own protection.

Before letting them go for the day, Block reminded jurors to "really, really, really not read the newspapers. Stack them up, and you can read them afterward."

Va. Death Penalty Expansion Approved (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

RICHMOND, Jan. 26 -- The House of Delegates voted Friday to expand the use of the death penalty in Virginia by making accomplices and judge killers eligible for execution, virtually assuring that the measures will go to Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), who personally opposes capital punishment.

The legislation to increase the use of capital punishment, which comes at a time when other states are considering repealing the death penalty, would make accomplices to a murder and anyone who kills a judge or a court witness eligible for the death penalty. The Senate passed nearly identical versions of the bills earlier in the week.

Kaine, a Catholic, will now face his first decision on whether to expand capital punishment. He has said he will uphold the death penalty despite his personal opposition. Since taking office, he has signed four death warrants but twice delayed the execution of a murderer suspected of being mentally ill. A spokesman said Friday that Kaine has not taken a position on the bills.

Under the state's triggerman rule, enacted three decades ago, only the person who carries out a killing can be executed. Exceptions have been made over time -- such as for crimes of terrorism, murder for hire or drug conspiracy -- but the rule complicated the state's efforts to try Washington area sniper John Allen Muhammad.

Because there was disagreement about whether Muhammad or Lee Boyd Malvo fired the rifle during the 2002 spree that killed 10 people in the Washington area, prosecutors could try Muhammad on a capital offense only after they built a case using the terrorism exception. Muhammad was convicted and sentenced to death in 2003.

The revision of the triggerman law, approved 83 to 11, allows for the death penalty to be imposed if the accomplice has the same intent as the killer.

"I think it is an important step to make sure that people who participate in a capital crime will understand they will all share the ultimate punishment," said Del. C. Todd Gilbert (R-Shenandoah), sponsor of the bill.

All three death penalty bills were endorsed by the Virginia Crime Commission, a panel that advises the legislature on crime issues. Opponents of capital punishment argue that Virginia should not be expanding its death penalty when courts and lawmakers in some states, including Maryland, are considering moratoriums out of concern that it is unfairly applied. Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) said Thursday that he would work to repeal the death penalty.

"In Virginia, we seem to have an insatiable desire to expand the death penalty," said Del. Kenneth R. Plum (D-Fairfax), who voted against the bills. "It's too bad we have not caught on to what other states recognize and consider a moratorium."

Gilbert countered that the changes would bring Virginia in line with most other states that allow capital punishment, the majority of which permit execution of accomplices.

Virginia is second in the nation to Texas in executions, according to the Death Penalty Information Center. Since 1976, when the Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment, Virginia has put 98 convicts to death.

Besides the death penalty, delegates also tackled the issue of abortion Friday.

By a vote of 71 to 27, the House voted to make it a misdemeanor for someone to force, coerce or intimidate a woman into having an abortion. The crime is elevated to a felony if the woman is younger than 18. The bill now goes to the Senate, which historically has resisted abortion legislation.

After the abortion vote, House Republicans blocked a bill by Del. C. Charles Caputo (D-Fairfax) to prohibit teenagers from talking on a cellphone while driving.

The bill passed the Science and Technology Committee this week with the support of 11 Republicans, including Dels. Timothy D. Hugo (Fairfax) and Jackson H. Miller (Manassas).

DOJ_NMG_0123871

But on the House floor Friday, the 11 delegates joined the rest of their GOP colleagues in voting to table the bill after House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith (R-Salem) said it needed closer scrutiny.

Caputo said the Republican caucus decided to kill his bill because it was sponsored by a Democrat -- a charge Griffith denied.

"They are playing politics with our children," Caputo said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Reputed Klansman Asks Judge To Throw Out '64 Kidnap Case (AP)

By Jack Elliott Jr.

AP, January 27, 2007

JACKSON, Miss.— A reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men has asked a federal judge to dismiss the charges, saying the statute of limitations has expired.

Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester filed the motion Friday in U.S. District Court on behalf of James Ford Seale, who pleaded not guilty Thursday to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said yesterday he had not seen the motion and could not comment.

Seale, 71, could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee.

Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities.

Seale and Edwards were arrested in the case in 1964. But the FBI — consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that summer — turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges.

The Justice Department reopened the case in 2000.
